THE
OF
DANIEL DE FOE,

WITH A MEMOIR OF HIS LIFE AND WRITINGS.

By WILLIAM HAZLITT.

"His was a various pen, that freely roved
Into all subjects,—was in most approved.
Whate'er the theme, his ready muse obeyed;
Love, courtship, politics, religion, trade.
Gifted alike to shine in every sphere,— Nov'list, historian, poet, pamphleteer."

TO WALTER WILSON, ESQ., OF BATH.

London, September, 1840.

MY DEAR SIR,

THERE IS NO ONE TO WHOM I CAN MORE FITLY INSCRIBE THIS VOLUME THAN THE author of 'Memoirs of the Life and Times of Daniel De Foe,' who has so well succeeded in doing justice to the fair fame of that great and excellent man, and in recovering the memory of those public services which entitle him to be enrolled amongst the patriots and benefactors of his country.

Up to the publication of your work, though De Foe had slept with his fathers for nearly a century, no satisfactory attempt had been made to do homage to his worth, and, in fact, there was no English author of equal merit of whom so little was popularly known. The narrative of Mr Chalmers, though valuable in some respects, was far too scanty to satisfy the admirers of De Foe, or to assist them in attaining a just knowledge of his character as a man and as a writer, while the introduction to Mr Cadell's edition of 'Robinson Crusoe' is rather a criticism than a memoir. As you well remark:—"Those who are acquainted with the narratives of De Foe, must be satisfied that no one could be so competent to become his own biographer as the author of 'Robinson Crusoe.' His accurate painting from nature, his skill in the delineation of character, and the interest which he contrives to throw over the commonest incidents, all combine to enchant the reader, and to inspire a wish that so masterly a pen had been employed in telling his own story to posterity. This was in a measure demanded by the eventful nature of his life, and the misrepresentations which he suffered from his political opponents; nor is the regret diminished when we consider the multiplicity of his writings, which being mostly anonymous, are now in some measure difficult to be identified. In the absence of his own pen, a biography of De Foe from the hands of a contemporary, conversant with his history, and competent to appreciate his character, would have been a rich addition to our literature. But he probably out-lived all his friends, and neglected to preserve the requisite materials for such a work."

To supply the deficiency, there required a person thoroughly conversant with the history of the period in which De Foe flourished, and master of his various works, in connection with all that has been said of him by his friends and his enemies; and the result has shown, that no one could have been found more qualified for the task than yourself.

Independently of this claim upon my marked respect, the rare liberality which has afforded me the free use of your valuable library, and which has alone enabled me to proceed with my important undertaking, of furnishing the reading world with the first and only complete collection of the writings of Daniel De Foe, amply entitles you to this public acknowledgment of my gratitude.

Believe me, dear Sir,

Your most obliged and faithful Servant,

WILLIAM HAZLITT.

PREFACE.

MR CHALMERS, in his 'Life of De Foe,' justly remarks, that "it is one of the chief reproaches of our press, that no uniform collected edition of the works of this eminently national writer has ever appeared." Hitherto the possession of anything like a collection of De Foe's writings has amounted to an enviable monopoly, the result of infinite expense and infinite research; and thus it is that productions which ought to be in the hands of every reader, high or low, are encased as rare jewels within the library doors of a few wealthy literati. The present edition will furnish the world with an entire collection of these works, at a price which will render them accessible to the humblest classes, and in a form which will not disgrace the book-case of the highest.

De Foe was a giant in literature: there is no English author who has written so variously, and few who have written so well. It is difficult to imagine a subject which has not been illustrated by his graceful and powerful pen. There is no class of readers to whom he does not successfully address himself. Though known, until of very late years, almost entirely as a writer of fiction, which will probably constitute the basis of his fame in succeeding times, it was for politics chiefly that he acquired distinction with his contemporaries, who bore witness to the influence of his writings. In the conflict of parties from the reign of Charles II to the accession of George I, few persons took a more active share; and in the number of his publications, he probably outstripped all the other writers of his time. During ten of his busiest years, and those the most factious in English history, he was the sole writer of a periodical paper which appeared three times a week, and contained many elaborate essays upon the most important subjects in trade and politics. These, and his other labours, constitute a mine which none can explore without being enriched with much that is precious in wisdom, impressive in eloquence, and striking in truth. Many of the topics upon which he employed his pen, are of vital importance to the interests of the community, extending even to the foundations of government, and the principles that regulate the intercourse of society. If their purpose was temporary, their utility is far from having ceased with the occasion: for without insisting, that it is never unseasonable to recal the attention of mankind to such subjects, it may be observed, that no man who sits down to study the history of his country with minute exactness, can hope for satisfaction upon a variety of points, without a previous acquaintance with the writings of De Foe.

OF

DANIEL DE FOE, or Foe, as the name was originally spelt,* was born in London, in the parish of St Giles, Cripplegate, in the year 1661.† The name is obviously a corruption of foi, and of French origin. For centuries there was a family so called seated in Warwickshire, as we are informed by De Foe himself in his ‘Tour through Great Britain.’ Whether, however, the author of ‘Robinson Crusoe’ was or was not entitled to claim affinity with Norman blood, is as uncertain as it is immaterial. What he may have wanted in titles of honour, and the gifts of fortune, was amply compensated for in the possession of many other excellences of a far more valuable nature.

The grandfather of De Foe, the first person among his ancestors of whom anything is positively known, was a substantial yeoman who farmed his own estate at Elton, in Northamptonshire. The old gentleman kept a pack of hounds, which indicated both his wealth and his principles as a Royalist, for the Puritans did not allow of the sports of the field, though his grandson (contra bonos mores) sometimes indulged in them. In alluding to this circumstance, our author in one of the Reviews, in reference to the practice, common in his time, of bestowing names that were the result of party animosity upon the brute creation, says,—“I remember my grandfather had a huntsman, that used the same familiarity with his dogs, and he had his Roundhead and his Cavalier,

* Upon what occasion it was that De Foe made the alteration in his name, by connecting with it the foreign prefix, nowhere appears. His enemies said he adopted it because he would not be thought an Englishman; but this is a mere absurdity. Oldmixon intimates, that it was not until after he had stood in the pillory that he changed his name; and Dr Browne tells us, that he did it at the suggestion of Harley—

“Have I not chang’d by your advice my name?”

But no reliance is to be placed upon the testimony of either of these writers when speaking of De Foe. His motive was, probably, a dislike to his original name, either for its import, or its harshness; or he might have been desirous of restoring it to its Norman origin. A correspondent having bantered the ‘Review,’ upon its import, he replies, “If the gentleman has a favourable opinion of the ‘Review,’ we fancy he will not dislike it upon the account of the author’s name, as like a thing which he himself is not; being a foe in name only, not in nature to anybody.”

† Until of late years, it was doubtful in what town or county he was born, and even whether he was an Englishman or a foreigner. A Tory writer, who published a lampoon upon him in the reign of Queen Anne, under the title of ‘The True-born Hugonot; or Daniel De Foe, a Satyr,’ supposes him to have been of French extraction, and to have come into England with the persecuted Protestants, or, as this author would term them, the rebellious subjects of Louis XIV. He speaks thus:—

“Out of this rebel herd our rebel sprung,
And brought the virtues of the soil along,
A mild behaviour and a fluent tongue;
With uplift eyes, and with ambitious heart,
On England’s theatre to act his part.”

his Goring, and his Waller, and all the generals of both armies were hounds in his pack ; till the times turning, the old gentleman was fain to scatter the pack, and make them up of more dog-like surnames." It was probably from this relative that De Foe inherited a freehold estate, of which he was not a little vain, and which seems to have influenced his opinions in his theory of the right of popular election, and of the British Constitution. He refers to it in one of the Reviews in the following terms :—" I have both a native and an acquired right of election, in more than one place in Britain, and as such am a part of the body that honourable house represents ; and from hence, I believe, may claim a right, in due manner, to represent, complain, address, or petition them."

Our author's father, James Foe, a younger son of the Elton squire, was a person of a very different cast,—a rigid dissenter, and from him his son appears to have imbibed the grounds of his opinions and practice. He was apprenticed to John Levit, a butcher in London, and afterwards followed this trade upon his own account, in the parish of St Giles, Cripplegate, retiring from business upon a respectable competency, some years before his death, which took place in or about the year 1707.

The following curious memorandum, signed by him in 1705, throws some light on his character, as well as on that of the times :—" Sarah Pierce lived with us, about fifteen or sixteen years since, about two years ; and behaved herself so well that we recommended her to Mr Cave, that godly minister, which we should not have done, had not her conversation been becoming the gospel. From my lodgings, at the Bell, in Broad street, having left my house in Throgmorton street, October 10, 1705. Witness my hand, JAMES FOE."

This is all that is known of our author's immediate ancestors. He had some collateral relations, to whom he alludes occasionally in his writings, but with too much brevity to ascertain the degree of kindred. In his 'Tour through Great Britain,' he mentions a relative who followed the employment of a schoolmaster at Martock, in Somersetshire, and with whom he maintained a friendly intercourse. In one of his works, he alludes to "a near relation" at Sherborne, in Dorsetshire ; and, in another, he draws the character of a cousin, who seems to have resided in London, and was a man of abilities, but in other respects far from estimable.

The mother as well as the father of De Foe being a strict nonconformist, under their guidance, and the ministrations of the Rev. Dr Annesley, an esteemed presbyterian minister, who had been ejected from the living of Cripplegate, he was early initiated in those moral and religious principles which give such a lustre to his subsequent life and writings. While yet a boy, he manifested a cheerfulness, vivacity, and buoyancy of spirits, with a remarkable courage, as was soon displayed in that spirit of independence and unconquerable love of liberty, which he maintained throughout his long and singularly chequered life. In one of his Reviews he remarks, of himself, "From a boxing English boy, I learnt this early piece of generosity, not to strike my enemy when he is down," a disposition he cherished in his literary contests.

An anecdote referring to his boyish days, and preserved by himself, may be recorded here as an honourable testimony to the principles and conduct of his pious and plain-hearted parents :—During that part of the reign of King Charles II, when the nation was under strong apprehensions of a Popish government, and religious persons were the victims of Protestant persecution, it being expected that printed Bibles would become rare, or locked up in an unknown tongue, many honest people, struck with the alarm, employed themselves in copying the Bible into short-hand, that they might not be destitute of its consolations in the hour of calamity. To this task young De Foe also applied himself, and he tells us "That he worked like a horse, till he had written out the whole Pentateuch, when he grew so tired that he was willing to risk the rest."

At the age of fourteen, our author, being intended for the clerical profession, was placed in an academy at Newington green, under the direction of that "polite and profound scholar," the Rev. Charles Morton, whom De Foe delights to praise as "a master who taught nothing, either in politics or science, which was dangerous to monarchical government, or which was improper for a diligent scholar to know."

De Foe's attainments at the academy appear to have been considerable. He tells us, in one of his 'Reviews,' that he had been master of five languages, and that he had studied the mathematics, natural philosophy, logic, geography, and history. With the theory and practice of our constitution he was also well acquainted, and he studied politics as a science. Under the direction of his tutor, he went through a complete course of theology, in which he acquired a proficiency that enabled him to cope with the most acute writers of that disputatious age. His knowledge of ecclesiastical history was also considerable; and possessing an acuteness of intellect thus united with various reading, few persons could be found who were fitter advocates for the cause he espoused. Yet his enemies in after life attacked him as "an illiterate person, without education."—"The enemies of peace," says he, "are not a few; and he that preaches a doctrine men care not to follow, when they cannot object against the subject, they will against the man. He is no scholar, says one; that's true: he was an apprentice to a hosier, says another; that's false; and adds to the number of the intolerable liberties Dr Browne and Mr Observator give themselves, he having never been a hosier, nor an apprentice; but he has been a trader; that's true; and therefore must know no Latin. Excellent logic this! Those gentlemen who reproach my learning to applaud their own, shall have it proved that I have more learning than either of them—because I have more manners. I have no concern to tell Dr Browne I can read English; nor to tell Mr Tutchin I understand Latin: Non ita Latinus sum ut Latine loqui. I easily acknowledge myself blockhead enough to have lost the fluency of expression in the Latin, and so far trade has been a prejudice to me; and yet I think I owe this justice to my ancient father, still living, and in whose behalf I freely testify, that if I am a blockhead, it was nobody's fault but my own, he having spared nothing in my education that might qualify me to match the accurate Dr Browne, or the learned Observator.

"As to my little learning and his (Mr Tutchin's) great capacity, I fairly challenge him to translate with me any Latin, French, and Italian author, and after that to re-translate them cross-ways, for twenty pounds each book; and by this he shall have an opportunity to show the world how much De Foe the hosier is inferior in learning to Mr Tutchin the gentleman."

The writers of those days observed but little decorum in their language. One of his opponents, De Foe says, "makes himself merry with me, that I stand in need of a logician to mend my arguments, and a grammarian to mend my Latin. I wish this mirth may calm his temper, and I will not make myself amends upon him by telling him that he can mend neither for me: that I am master of as many languages as himself, and may have forgot as much Latin as some may have learnt; because I have no mind to quarrel, or put any man into a ferment."—"When they that dispute," observes he, "assume to themselves all the learning and all the sense, I think they ought to have some regard to truth and justice: but it is impossible for some people to keep their temper when they are pinched in argument; which want of temper in them shall be far from moving me to the same error."

The causes that led to the diversion of our author's talents from his original destination as a Dissenting minister into another channel, are now unknown: it is certain that the times were very unfavourable to the exercise of such a function, and occasioned numbers to abandon their pulpits, or withdraw from their native country. A competent witness observes, that "For some time before a Popish prince ascended the throne, Popish counsels so far prevailed, that it was not safe for a Dissenting minister to be seen in the streets of London: many of them were thrown into common gaols; their meetings, which for some years they held by connivance, were everywhere suppressed; and they chose in some places to meet in the night in small numbers, rather than be wholly destitute of the worship of God in that way of administration which they thought most conformable to his word. The civil liberties of the people of England met with a violent shock at the same time; some of the best blood that ever ran in English veins was then spilt as water upon the ground; juries were packed, false witnesses suborned, corrupt judges upon the bench, and mercenary lawyers encouraged at the bar with noisy insolence to hunt down the true friends of the English constitution." Perhaps De Foe was swayed by other considerations. His natural disposition might be unsuited to so grave a profession, at least with the view that he had taken of it; or some circumstance, now unknown, might have rendered it inexpedient for him to follow it.

Upon De Foe's leaving College, after five years' residence there, the events of the period, when viewed in connexion with the principles of his education, had a strong tendency to produce in him an ardent love of liberty, and a fixed abhorrence of tyranny, and he early embarked in an unceasing warfare against all, whether in high or low places, who sought to oppress his country and his creed, and he almost immediately enlisted himself upon the popular side in politics, and engaging in them with all the ardour of youthful blood, his genius and active energy speedily raised him to distinction in his party.

De Foe was only twenty-one when he commenced author, and he hardly ever ceased writing for the rest of his life. His first production was a lampoon levelled at the well-known Roger L'Estrange's 'Guide to the Inferior Clergy,' and was entitled 'Speculum Crape-Gownorum; or a Looking-glass for the Young Academicks, new Foyl'd, &c. By a Guide to the Inferiour Clergie. London: 1682.*'

He borrowed his title from the crape gowns then usually worn by the inferior clergy, and probably thought that many would be ensnared to read his book by the taking effect of a superscription. Availing himself of the licence of the times, he repays the libellers of the Dissenters in their own coin, and shoots his bolts without ceremony at the weak points of the established clergy. To this mode of warfare they had rendered themselves obnoxious by the scurrility of their writings: and the edge of resentment was further sharpened by the oppression of the civil power. Many of the ideas in the former part of the pamphlet are borrowed without acknowledgement from a work published a few years before by Dr John Eachard, entitled, 'The Grounds and Occasion of the Contempt of the Clergy;' but the 'Essay towards a Sermon of the Newest Fashion,' which occupies about a third of the pamphlet, is entirely original, and, as Mr Godwin observes, "is equal in point of humour to anything that occurs in Dr Eachard's performance."

The fertility of the subject soon produced a second part of the 'Speculum Crape-Gownorum;' in which the author deals more seriously with the government, and, by a practical view of the effect of persecution, exposes its absurdity.

The next subject which occupied the pen of De Foe was the war then raging upon the Continent between the Turks and the German Emperor. The occasion was this:—The Hungarian reformers, having been persecuted and proscribed by the Austrian monarch, had risen in arms against him; and the Turks, availing themselves of the opportunity, had marched to their assistance and laid siege to Vienna. Most of the English Protestants (as men ever think the nearest danger greatest and hate their old enemies most) were inclined to rejoice at this tumbling down of a Popish despot, and the success of their Hungarian brethren. But De Foe, who saw further than them, (and perhaps took a little pride in doing so), viewed the matter in a different light, and deprecated the possible triumph of the Crescent over the Cross, and the subjugation of all Christendom, which might be the consequence. Logically speaking, he was right; but prudentially, he was perhaps wrong. The powers of Europe took the alarm as well as he, and combined to rescue the Austrian monarch from the gripe of the Mussulman. They succeeded; but could obtain no terms for the Hungarian peasants. Had the emperor been left to fight his own battles against the Turks, he might have been frightened into measures of moderation and justice towards his own subjects; and there was in the meantime little probability of a Mohammedan army overrunning Europe. The title of De Foe's pamphlet on this subject is not known. When he collected his works in 1703, he did not insert this among them, for what reason it is difficult to conceive.

To return to the affairs of England. Towards the latter end of Charles's reign, when the influence of the Duke of York was on the wane, it is imagined by several historians that a plan for a more popular system of government was in contemplation; but this project, whatever it may have been, was put an end to by the sudden death of Charles, which took place Feb. 6, 1685, in the 54th year of his age, and the 25th of his reign.

This monarch, however, who seemed to oppress his subjects only for his amusement, and played the tyrant as an appendage to the character of a fine gentleman, had never proceeded to the last extremities, nor quite thrown off the mask, whatever his secret wishes or designs might have been, by openly attacking large masses of power and opinion. James, who succeeded him, was a true monk,—a blind, narrow, gloomy bigot: and did not stop short in his mad and obstinate career till he drove the country to rebellion, and himself into exile. As the Archbishop of Rheims well and wittily said of him, on seeing him come out of a Popish chapel abroad, "There goes a very honest gentleman, who gave up three kingdoms for a mass."

Upon his accession to the throne, addresses of loyalty and devotion poured in from all quarters, notwithstanding his well known principles and designs. An address from the Middle Temple expressed the sentiments of that body of scholars and gentlemen, in a strain of fulsome servility. The University of Oxford promised to obey him "without limitations or restrictions;" and the king's promise, in his speech from the throne (says Burnet), passed for a thing so sacred, that those were looked upon as ill-bred who put into their address, "our religion established by law, excepted." The pulpits resounded with thanksgiving sermons, and the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance; and the clergy were forward in tendering the unconditional surrender of their rights and liberties, for themselves, their fellow-subjects, and their posterity. If James did not before think himself God's Vicegerent upon earth, he must have thought so now. But he no sooner took them at their word, and proceeded to appoint Papists to be heads of colleges, and to induct them to Protestant livings, and to send the bishops to the Tower for refusing to set their seal to his arbitrary mandates; that is, he no sooner alarmed the clergy for their authority spiritual, and their revenues temporal, so that judgment began, as Dr Sherlock expressed it, in the house of God,—than they turned round, and sent their loyalty and their monarch a packing together.

The general odium into which James soon fell, encouraged the Duke of Monmouth (the natural son of Charles II, by Lucy Walters) to raise the standard of revolt, and large numbers of the Dissenters, whose consciences had been sorely tyrannized over by the bigoted monarch on the throne, united their forces with those of the unfortunate Prince, when he landed at Lyme, in Dorsetshire, in June 1685.

In the number of those who joined this romantic invasion was De Foe, who, at the age of four-and-twenty, showed to the world that he could handle his sword no less than his pen, in the cause of liberty.

The issue of the enterprise is well known. Yet had Monmouth delayed his expedition but a few months, or taken the precaution to secure the assistance of a few experienced officers, there is no saying what might have been the consequence. As it was, the sudden progress of the insurrection alarmed the king; and De Foe, who was an eye-witness, says, he was within a trifle of ruin.

Upon the dispersion of the Duke's forces, De Foe, owing probably to his being a native of London, and his person being consequently unknown in the part of the country where the movement took place, had the good fortune to escape from the terrible vengeance which was heaped upon his less fortunate companions, and returned in safety to the metropolis.

He now turned his attention to trade, and the business in which he engaged appears to have been that of a hose-factor, or middle man between the manufacturer and the retail dealer. In various publications of the period he is disparagingly styled "hosier," but he always stoutly repels the imputation, which he seems, somewhat absurdly in such a man, to have taken in great dudgeon. This agency concern our author carried on for some years (1685-1695), and after he had been in business about two years he was admitted a liveryman of London upon the 26th of January, 1688, having claimed his freedom by birth.

In the Chamberlain's book his name was written Daniel Foe. Mr Chalmers, to whom the public is indebted for the knowledge of these facts, says, "I was led to these discoveries by observing that De Foe had voted at an election for a representative of London, whence I inferred that he must have been a citizen either by birth or service." In his 'Review' for July 21, 1711, he mentions his having been born a freeman, and says he had been nearly thirty years a liveryman of the city.

CHAPTER II.

UPON the death of Monmouth (15th July, 1685), the king, dropping the thin mask he had hitherto worn, entered upon that series of arbitrary measures which brought about his downfall; and our author's next appearance in print was in an address to the Dissenters to caution them against accepting the terms of a general toleration, which James now insidiously held out to all parties, and which was to include Papists as well as Dissenters. This was not a bait for De Foe's keen jealousy and strong repugnance to the encroachments of power to be taken in by. "Was ever anything more absurd," says he, "than this conduct of King James and his party in wheedling the Dissenters; giving them liberty of conscience by his own arbitrary dispensing authority, and his expecting they should be content with their religious liberty at the price of their constitution? A thing, though a few were deluded with, yet the body of Dissenters soon saw through. The train, indeed, was laid deep and subtilly; but this was plain to everybody, that it was wholly inconsistent with the Popish interest to protect the Dissenters any otherwise than it was made a project to create a feud between them and the church, and in the end to destroy both." There was, indeed, some danger that the Dissenters might be tempted to purchase the proffered grace at the price of allowing the Papists the same liberty; which was (at this period) under the bare-faced pretence of liberality, and a tenderness for scrupulous consciences, to throw open the floodgates of the most unbounded bigotry and intolerance. But the hatred and dread of Popery was at this time the ruling passion, in which the Dissenters shared in its utmost rancour and virulence; and this old grudge and hereditary antipathy prevailed. It was in vain that the king tried every means of conciliating the Nonconformist body. The great majority of the Dissenters stood firm, and, to strengthen them in their resistance to the Court, De Foe put forth two tracts, the titles of which are not known, though we have his own declaration in the 'Review,' that he had composed them. The title of the pamphlet usually ascribed to him, is, 'A Letter to a Dissenter, upon occasion of his Majesty's late gracious Declaration of Indulgence. London, printed for G. H. 1687.' 4to. But this was the work of that accomplished statesman, George Saville, Marquis of Halifax. De Foe, however, in his view of the subject, is known to have coincided with the noble lord.

The conduct of the king having at length alarmed the whole nation, the eyes of all parties were now directed to the Prince of Orange as their natural protector; not only from his affinity to the crown, but as being at the head of the Protestant interest in Europe. Application was therefore made to him by the disaffected in England, and the negotiation being brought to a conclusion, the prince prepared for his expedition.

"The slavish principles of passive obedience and non-resistance," observes Bolingbroke, "which had skulked, perhaps, in some old homily before King James I, but was talked, written, and preached into vogue in that inglorious reign, and in those of his three successors, were renounced at the Revolution by the last of the several parties who declared for them. Not only the laity, but the clergy embraced and co-operated in the deliverance which the Prince of Orange brought them. Some of our prelates joined to invite him over, and their brethren refused to sign an abhorrence of this invitation. Tho University of Oxford offered him their plate, and associated for him against the king. In one word, the conduct of the Tories at this crisis was such as might have inclined a man to think they had never held resistance unlawful, but had only differed with the Whigs about the degree of oppression, or of danger, which it was necessary to await, in order to sanctify resistance."

The Prince having provided for the defence of his own country, put to sea the 19th of October, 1688; and after encountering some damage from a storm, which obliged him to put back and re-fit, he reached Torbay in safety, the 4th of November, being the anniversary both of his birth and marriage. The following day he landed his army, consisting of about fifteen thousand men, and having refreshed his troops, marched them to Exeter.

The impression produced in the kingdom by the intelligence of his arrival is thus described by De Foe in the 'Review.' "At the landing of the Prince of Orange, in order to deliver these nations, at their own request, from the tyranny and bondage of absolute dominion, the people of England, with one voice, and as with one consent, rose in arms for their deliverance. Where they could, they joined with their deliverer; where they could not do that, they assembled together, headed by their respective gentlemen and the nobility of the country, and drew into one great body, as at York, Boden-down, Nottingham, and the like. And as things grew higher, the common people drew into bodies, rabbles, tumults, and mobs. What violences were committed, I care not to examine; I shall not justify the conduct of the mob, no, not against the worst instrument of King James's ill conduct. They acted without bounds, government, reason, or honour; and the Parliament thought fit to bury it in silence, by passing an act to prevent prosecutions upon trespasses of that kind. The people of Scotland taking arms at the same time, acted their part; and as they had in many places been treated in a most bloody and inhuman manner by the episcopal people in power, under King James' and King Charles's reign, of which I would advise those people never to oblige us to be particular, it was feared, and indeed expected, that the poor people would have been so exasperated by the dreadful usage they had received, that they would have run into some terrible excesses, and in their fury have torn many of their murderers in pieces. For as there were few families in the West but what had lost some near relation or other in the butcheries of those times, so many of the very instruments of those cold-blooded murders were then actually living among them. However, I do not find that one drop of blood was spilt by them anywhere, which I think is what could not be promised from any people in the world in their circumstances."

De Foe, who entered heartily into the Revolution, was among those who joined William at Henley, and marched with him to London; and we find an account of him as one of those who went in procession with the king and queen to Guildhall, as a guard of honour, the year following. Oldmixon, who gives the account, has infused into it some of his unfounded prejudices against our author. "Their majesties," he says, "attended by their royal highnesses and a numerous train of nobility and gentry, went first to a balcony prepared for them at the Angel in Cheapside, to see the show; which, for the great number of liverymen, the full appearance of the militia and artillery company, the rich adornments of the pageants, and the splendour and good order of the whole proceeding, out-did all that had been seen before upon that occasion: and, what deserved to be particularly mentioned, says a reverend historian, was a royal regiment of volunteer-horse, made up of the chief citizens, who, being gallantly mounted, and richly accoutred, were led by the Earl of Monmouth, now Earl of Peterborough, and attended their majesties from Whitehall. Among these troopers, who were for the most part Dissenters, was Daniel Foe, at that time a hosier in Freeman's yard, Cornhill; the same who afterwards was pilloried for writing an ironical invective against the church, and did after that list in the service of Mr Robert Harley, and those brethren of his who passed the Schism and Occasional bills, broke the confederacy, and made a shameful and ruinous peace with France." Oldmixon might have told his readers that, although De Foe was the private friend of Harley, from whom he had received personal favours, yet he wrote against all the measures which he here reprehends: but so much justice was not to be expected from so consistent a party-writer.

Oldmixon, however, evidently singles out his brother author in this gallant procession, with an eye of envy rather than friendship, and the invidious turn given to his politics only means that all those were black sheep who did not go the absurd lengths of Oldmixon and his party in everything.

It does not lie within our province to detail the events attending the deposition of James and the accession of his successor. Many highly interesting incidents which occurred will, however, be found in 'The Tour through Great Britain,' and other works of our author.

As an ardent friend of the Revolution, and no less an admirer of the hero who achieved it, De Foe annually commemorated the 4th of November in token of our deliverance:—"A day," says he, "famous on various accounts, and every one of them dear to Britons who love their country, value the Protestant interest, or have an aversion to tyranny and oppression. On this day he was born; on this day he married the daughter of England; and, on this day he rescued the nation from a bondage worse than that of Egypt, a bondage of soul, as well as bodily servitude; a slavery to the ambition and raging lust of a generation set on fire by pride, avarice, cruelty, and blood."

When the Revolution took place, and probably for some little time before, De Foe was a resident at Tooting in Surrey, where he was the first person who attempted to form the Dissenters in the neighbourhood into a regular congregation. The reverend and learned Dr Joshua Oldfield, author of a valuable treatise on 'The Improvement of Human Reason,' was their first pastor. It appears from a passage in his 'Tour through Great Britain,' that De Foe was several years a resident in this part of Surrey. Perhaps he had a country-house there during the time that he carried on his hose-agency business in Cornhill.

CHAPTER III.

DE FOE'S commercial speculations were of a multifarious nature. Some years had now (1692) elapsed since he embarked in the Spanish and Portuguese trade, from whence he must have derived considerable profit; but much of it was dissipated in subsequent losses. Oldmixon, who delights to undervalue him, says, "he had never been a merchant, otherwise than peddling a little to Portugal;" but, as Mr Chalmers justly remarks, "peddling to Portugal makes a trader." His concerns, however, were more considerable than Oldmixon would wish us to believe. From a passage in one of his works, it is very clear that he had been a merchant-adventurer; for, speaking of the high rate of insurance, and its excess over the profits of the merchant, he says, he had paid a hundred pounds in that way upon a voyage that had afforded him a profit of only fifty pounds. Whether it was before or after the Revolution that he went to Spain is uncertain; but his connexions with the trade of that country rendered it expedient for him to undertake a voyage thither; and it appears from his own account that he took up his residence there, and became familiar with the language.

In one of his 'Reviews' De Foe gives an account of the loss of a vessel in which he was a shareholder, upon the Spanish coast, and records the inhospitable treatment which the crew received from the natives; but this he charges to the account of the English themselves, who had treated them with the like, or rather worse usage.

"A ship I had some concern in myself," says he, "in a violent storm came ashore on the coast of Biscay, and, stranding, the men made signals of distress to a Spanish vessel that lay at anchor under the shore, the captain of which would not take the least notice of them, though, had he manned out his boat, he might have saved the whole crew. At last, upon repeated signals, two boats from the shore went off and saved the master and five men, the rest perishing before they came. The master afterwards meeting the captain of the Spanish ship, asked him why he would not afford his succour as he might have done? The Spaniard answered with an oath, that if he and all his men had swam to the ship's side, he would not have taken one of them up, though they had been to be drowned in his sight; and he gave the reason for it: that having been shipwrecked somewhere on the coast of England, the people, instead of saving him and his ship, came off and robbed him, tore the ship almost to pieces, and left him and his men to swim ashore for their lives, while they plundered the cargo; upon which he and his whole crew had sworn never to help an Englishman in whatever distress he should find him, whether at sea or on shore."*

It was about this time that De Foe had some concern also in the trade with Holland. A writer in the reign of Queen Anne, who styles himself "A well-wisher to trade and credit," and wrote in an opprobrious manner against De Foe, in commenting upon his career in trade, speaks of him as having been formerly "a Civet-cat merchant;" although it was probably the drug rather than the animal in which he traded.† The Dutch were at that time the most considerable of the European traders in that article, which they brought from the east.

De Foe, who seems to have been a citizen of the world, made an excursion to France some time in the early part of his life. He went there in the company of some merchants, in a large yacht, and landed at Caen, in Normandy; but whether he was drawn thither by business or pleasure is not mentioned. Either at this or some other time he visited Paris, and other parts of that country, and was much struck both with the magnificence of the scenery, and the grandeur of the private as well as of the public buildings: but in some of these respects he seems to have given the preference to his own country. De Foe also visited other parts of the continent, particularly Germany, and staid some time at Aix-la-Chapelle, perhaps for the benefit of the waters, which he considered much superior to those at Buxton. He also mentions his having drunk the Bath waters in the early part of his life, and notices their value in colics and scorbutic complaints. It is probable, from some circumstances in his life, that De Foe visited Germany in the next reign.

In the midst of his foreign speculations De Foe still continued his hose-agency concern in Freeman's court, Cornhill. But literary genius does not assort well with what is emphatically called business, and De Foe did not present in his own person the complete tradesman, whom he described so well in after years. "Wit, like mercury and quicksilver," says he, "is of use to make the silver ore run, and separate the sterling from the dross; but bring it to the crucible by itself, it flies up in the air like a true spirit, and is lost at once." "A wit turned tradesman!" says he elsewhere, "no apron-strings will hold him, 'tis in vain to lock him in behind the compter, he's gone in a moment. Instead of journal and ledger, he runs away to his Virgil and Horace; his journal entries are all Pindaricks, and his ledger is all Heroicks. He is truly dramatic from one end to the other, through the whole scene of his trade: and as the first part is all comedy, so the two last acts are always made up with tragedy; a statute of bankrupt is his exeunt omnes, and he generally speaks the epilogue in the Fleet prison, or the Mint."*

With the usual imprudence of superior genius, he was carried by his vivacity into companies who were gratified by his wit. He spent those hours with a small society for the cultivation of polite learning, which he ought to have employed in the calculations of the counting-house; and being obliged to abscond from his creditors in 1692, he naturally attributed those misfortunes to the war which were probably owing to his own misconduct. An angry creditor took out a commission of bankruptcy, which was soon superseded on the petition of those to whom he was most indebted, who accepted a composition on his single bond. This he punctually paid by the efforts of unwearied diligence, and some of these creditors who had been thus satisfied, falling afterwards into distress themselves, De Foe voluntarily paid them their whole claim, being then in rising circumstances from King William's favour: an example of rare honesty. The amount for which he failed is not known, but it must have been considerable, and shows that he was no petty trader. Being reproached by Lord Haversham for mercenariness, he tells him in 1705, that "With a numerous family, and no help but his own industry, he had forced his way with undiscouraged diligence through a sea of misfortunes, and reduced his debts, exclusive of composition, from seventeen thousand to less than five thousand pounds."

It deserves to be remembered that, at the time when our author fell into misfortune, the laws against bankrupts were much more severe than they are at present; insomuch that it was a matter of some hazard for a man to surrender to his creditors, unless there had been some previous understanding for a composition. "The cruelty of our laws against debtors," says De Foe, "without distinction of honest or dishonest, is the shame of our nation. I am persuaded the honestest man in England, when by necessity he is compelled to break, will early fly out of the kingdom rather than submit.

* Complete Tradesman.

To stay here—this is the consequence : as soon as he breaks, he is proscribed as a criminal, and has thirty to sixty days to surrender both himself and all that he has to his creditors. If he fails to do it, he has nothing before him but the gallows, without benefit of clergy ; if he surrenders he is not sure but he shall be thrown into gaol for life by the commissioners, only on pretence that they doubt his oath. What must the man do ? If he carries away his effects he is a knave and cheats his creditors ; if he stays here he is starved in a gaol, and must end his days by a lingering death. It is certainly the interest of the creditor, that when a debtor has failed, he should come and throw himself into the creditors' hands, and there be safe." In arguing the subject some years afterwards, De Foe observes with equal judgment and shrewdness, " Sometimes I was apt to suggest the following important trifles, viz. That a prison paid no debts ; that the more a bankrupt spent, the less he had left ; and that the less he had, the less the creditors would have at last ; that he who had nothing to pay, could pay nothing ; and that to keep a man in perpetual prison for debt, was murdering men by law."*

These extracts will serve to shelter the character of De Foe from any dishonourable imputation in absconding from his creditors ; a step which he thought himself justified in taking during the negociation for an amicable settlement, in order that he might escape the horrors of a dungeon.

Although the habits of De Foe were but little suited to those of trade, it is probable that other circumstances contributed to his insolvency. He seems to have fallen into an error by no means uncommon to persons in business ; that of extending their trade beyond their capital. " I think I may safely advance, without danger of reprehension," says he, " there are more people ruined in England by over-trading than for want of trade ; and I would, from my own unhappy experience, advise all men in trade to set a due compass to their ambition. Credit is a gulph which is easy to fall into, hard to get out of. Caution, therefore, is the best advice that can be given to a young tradesman ; and moderation is a useful virtue in trade as well as in politics."

But if De Foe fell a victim in part to his own imprudence, it was not the sole cause of his ruin. " If I am asked," says he, " why honest tradesmen are ruined, and undesigning men come to destruction, the answer is short : knaves run away with their money ; knaves break first, and pull honest men down with them."† That his misfortunes were partly owing to some such cause may be inferred from various passages in his writings. In one of his ' Reviews,' speaking of the frauds committed by bankrupts, he says, " The evil was indeed grown up to a monstrous height in those days. Nothing was more frequent than for a man in full credit to buy all the goods he could lay his hands on, and carry them directly from the house he bought them at into the Friars, and then send for his creditors and laugh at them, insult them, showing them their own goods untouched, offer them a trifle in satisfaction, and if they refuse it, bid them defiance : I cannot refrain vouching this of my own knowledge, since I have more than many times been served so myself."‡

During the reign of Romish belief in England there were several places in and about the City of London, which were allowed as sanctuaries for criminals and debtors ; and even since the Reformation, the latter had claimed the privilege of resorting to them for protection. One of these places, called the White-Friars, was become a notorious receptacle for broken and desperate men, in the very heart of the metropolis. There they resorted in great numbers, to the dishonour of the Government, and the great prejudice of the people, defending themselves with force and violence against the law and the public authorities. This intolerable grievance the Parliament redressed by " An Act for the more effectual Relief of Creditors in cases of Excesses, and for preventing Abuses in Prisons, and pretended Privileged Places ;” in which such effectual provision was made to reduce these outlaws, that immediately after the act was published, they abandoned their posts to better inhabitants. The Mint in Southwark, another of these sanctuaries, and the pest of the neighbourhood, was also suppressed by the same act of parliament, 8th and 9th of William III, c. 27.

It deserves to be recorded to the honour of De Foe, that he was the first to awaken the attention of the legislature to this subject, and that to him the nation was indebted for the abatement of the nuisance. “I had the good fortune,” says he, “to be the first that complained of this encroaching evil in former days, and think myself not too vain in saying, my humble representations, in a day when I could be heard, of the abominable insolence of bankrupts, practised in the Mint and Friars, gave the first mortal blow to the prosperity of these excesses.”

Another method by which De Foe suffered in his fortunes, was the collusive dealing too frequently practised between debtor and creditor. He seems also to have been the dupe of some knavish projector. Fortunately, however, for De Foe, he never had occasion to appear before those harpies of the law, the Commissioners of Bankrupts, against whose ruinous proceedings he exclaims so bitterly in several of his ‘Reviews.’ It was no uncommon thing, he tells us, for these men to consume the whole of a bankrupt’s estate in feastings and vexatious law suits, in the profits of which they largely participated, being generally men in the law. “Commissions of Bankrupt, as now practised,” says he, “are such depredations and invasions of common justice, such oppressions upon the sinking fortunes of distressed families, that I cannot think any debtor obliged to the same measures with such people, as they are with others. The law of self-defence arms the debtor against these ravenous harpies, as it arms him against the assaults of a highwayman or a cut-throat. In short, the English Rogue would be a fool to the horrid collection of villanies practised by these law-tyrants, who revel in the blood of families, and eat up the food of the starving debtors ; who sell debtor and creditor for the maintenance of their lusts, and devour, not the widow’s houses only, but the widows themselves. It may be suggested by the conjecturing part of mankind, that since the author has fallen into very ill hands, he therefore exclaims so warmly against the commissioners ; but this is false. Though I have had a large share of misfortunes in the world, and no man more, yet it has pleased Providence hitherto to keep me out of such hands ; and my knowledge of the barbarous usage of the debtor, by those abstracted thieves I call commissioners, is hitherto not at my own cost, but at the cost of others, whose families I have seen undone, and whose creditors I have seen cheated, while these people have made merry with the disaster.”*

Whilst the affairs of De Foe were going backwards, he probably resorted to those shifts and expedients for the purpose of maintaining his credit, which eventually aggravated his distress. The errors he committed against his better judgment were a source of remorse upon calm reflection ; and he had the manliness to avow them in connexion with his penitence. “While I speak with more than common concern of these things,” says he, “perhaps it may lead some men of retort to say, he speaks experimentally ; to which I answer freely, ’Tis a shame to do evil, but none at all to acknowledge and reform. I freely rank myself with those that are ready to own, they have in the extremities and embarrassments of trade, done those things which their own principles condemned, which they are not ashamed to blush for, which they look back upon with regret, and strive to make reparation for with their utmost diligence.”†

Whatever might have been the immediate cause of De Foe’s failure, he supported himself under it with exemplary fortitude ; a circumstance the more remarkable when we consider his natural vivacity, which was not at all subdued by misfortune. To his heaviest trials he brought a strength of mind that enabled him to cope with them; and fearless of injury, he both spoke and wrote like a man who was sustained by conscious rectitude. With honest concern for the interests of his creditors, he only desired time to satisfy their demands. "He that cannot pay his debts," says he, "may be an honest man; he that can and will not must be a knave. He that can pay his debts at leisure, may not be able to do it all at once, and if it were required of all men, the Lord have mercy upon half the tradesmen in England." Of himself, therefore, he says, "He that will not believe the public disaster has been a blow to his affairs, and disabled him from immediate compliance with just demands, must be a fool. He that will have patience will find him honest; he that will not, seems to have more cruelty than human nature can excuse, and labours as much as in him lies to prevent the trial of his integrity, and foreclose himself."*

In the midst of his misfortunes De Foe found the value of personal character; for so high a sense of his honour was entertained by his creditors, that they agreed to take his own personal security for the amount of composition upon his debts—a fine illustration of the effect of moral principle, and an exemplification of the advice he gave to others. "Never think yourselves discharged in conscience," says he, "though you may be discharged in law. The obligation of an honest mind can never die. No title of honour, no recorded merit, no mark of distinction can exceed that lasting appellation, an 'honest man.' He that lies buried under such an epitaph, has more said of him than volumes of history can contain. The payment of debts, after fair discharges, is the clearest title to such a character that I know; and how any man can begin again, and hope for a blessing from heaven, or favour from man, without such a resolution, I know not."†

To what part of the kingdom De Foe retired when he escaped from the fangs of the law is not known; perhaps to Bristol, where he certainly resided for a time, when he was under apprehension from his creditors." "A friend of mine in that city,‡" adds Mr Wilson, "informs me of a tradition in his family, that rather countenances this supposition. He says, that one of his ancestors remembered De Foe, and sometimes saw him walking in the streets of Bristol, accoutred in the fashions of the times, with a fine flowing wig, lace ruffles, and a sword by his side. Also, that he there obtained the name of 'The Sunday Gentleman,' because, through fear of the bailiffs, he did not dare to appear in public upon any other day. The fact of De Foe's residence in Bristol, either at this, or some later period of his life, is further corroborated by the following circumstance. About a century ago, as the same friend informs me, there was a tavern in Castle street, known by the sign of the Red Lion, and kept by one Mark Watkins, an intelligent man, who had been in better circumstances. His house was in considerable repute amongst the tradesmen of Bristol, who were in the habit of resorting there after dinner, for the purpose of smoking their pipes, and hearing the news of the day. De Foe, following the custom of the times, occasionally mixed with them at these seasons, and was well known to the landlord under the same name of 'The Sunday Gentleman.' The house is still standing, and is now a mere pot-house. The same Mark Watkins, it is said, used to entertain his company, in after-times, with an account of a singular personage, who made his appearance in Bristol clothed in goat-skins, in which dress he was in the habit of walking the streets, and went by the name of Alexander Selkirk, or Robinson Crusoe.

CHAPTER IV.

DURING the two years which he thus spent in retirement, our author sketched out his 'Essay on Projects,' which appeared in print five years afterwards. In the meantime, De Foe's knowledge of foreign trade, and more particularly of that to Spain and Portugal, procured him an opportunity, presented by some merchants with whom he had corresponded abroad, of settling as a factor at Cadiz, where, so advantageous was the offer, he might with ordinary care have realized a good fortune. But our author thought proper to reject the proposal. For "Providence," says he, "which had other work for me to do, placed a secret aversion in my mind to quitting England upon any account, and made me refuse the best offers of that kind, to be concerned with some eminent persons at home, in proposing ways and means to the government for raising money to supply the occasions of the war, then newly begun."

The war referred to was that in which England was engaged with France in support of King William's title. Upon the subject of ways and means, De Foe proposed a general assessment of personal property, the amount to be settled by composition, under the inspection of commissioners appointed by the King. Of the efficacy of his scheme our author was so well satisfied, that he offered to farm the revenue arising from it, at a rent of three millions annually, giving good security for the payment.

If the finances of De Foe were at this time any way commensurate with the ways and means which he provided for the public, he must have been in the high road to wealth. But whatever emolument he may have otherwise derived from his speculations for the government, he now (1695) procured from its agents an appointment which yielded him a certain revenue, that of accountant to the commissioners of the glass duty, in whose service he continued to the determination of their commission, by the suppression of the tax by act of parliament, August the 1st, 1699.

It was subsequently to his misfortunes in business, and probably about this time, that De Foe became secretary to the tile-kiln and brick-kiln works at Tilbury, in Essex, in which concern he was also a large proprietor; and he is said to have filled the office several years. In allusion to this employment, his enemies said sarcastically, that "he did not, like the Egyptians, require bricks without straw; but like the Jews, required bricks without paying his labourers." The failure of this speculation seems to have been owing rather to the want of encouragement upon the part of the public, than to any imprudence in the projector. Pantiles had been hitherto a Dutch manufacture, and were brought in large quantities to England. To supersede the necessity of their importation, and to provide a new channel for the employment of labour, the works at Tilbury were laudably erected; and De Foe tells us, that he employed a hundred poor labourers in the undertaking. The capital embarked in the concern must also have been considerable; for he informs us, that his own loss by its failure was no less a sum than three thousand pounds. But, besides so serious a misfortune to himself, it was no less so to the public, not only by the failure of an ingenious manufacture, but for the sake of the numerous families supported by it, who were now turned adrift in the world, or thrown upon some other branch of trade. De Foe continued the pantile works, it is believed, until the year 1703, when he was prosecuted by the government for a libel; and being deprived of his liberty, the undertaking soon came to an end.*

* In his 'Review' for March 24, 1705, De Foe alludes to these circumstances thus:—"Nor should the author of this paper boast in vain, if he tells the world, that he himself, before violence, injury, and barbarous treatment demolished him and his undertaking, employed a hun-

De Foe's engagements at Tilbury requiring his residence there, he took a house near the water side, and occasionally amused himself by excursions upon the Thames. Upon one of these occasions a circumstance of unusual occurrence in this country fell under his notice, and is thus related by himself. After descanting upon the natural history of the Ant, who is furnished with wings at a certain growth, as if it were a direction to change its habitation, he says, "Being thus equipped, they fly away in great multitudes, seeking new habitations, and not being well practised in the use of their wings, they grow weary, and pressing one another down by their own weight, when they begin to tire, they fall like a shower. I once knew a flight of these ants come over the marshes from Essex, in a most prodigious quantity, like a black cloud. They began to fall about a mile before they came to the Thames, and in flying over the river, they fell so thick that the water was covered with them. I had two servants rowing a small boat over the river just at that time, and I believe near two pecks of them fell into the boat. They fell so thick, that I believe my hatfull came down the funnel of two chimnies in my house, which stood near the river's edge; and in proportion to this quantity, they fell for the space, as I could observe, of half a mile in breadth at least: some workmen I employed there said they spread two miles, but then they fell not so thick, and they continued falling for near three miles. Anybody will imagine the quantity thus collected together must be prodigious; but, if again they will observe the multitude of these ant-hills, and the millions of creatures to be seen in them, they will cease to wonder."* The surprising shower of flies seen in the streets of London, in July 1707, De Foe supposes to have been no other than a fall of these ants.

The occupations of De Foe must now have afforded him a comfortable subsistence, for which he was indebted partly to his own industry, and partly to the favour of King William, and other friends, through whose kind offices his affairs seem to have continued in a prosperous condition through the remainder of this reign. As yet, he had given no offence to any political party by the keenness of his satire; and being of companionable habits, the vivacity of his conversation, joined to a readiness of wit, threw a charm around his society which recommended him to a large circle of acquaintance. His honourable conduct in business had raised him up numerous friends during the season of distress; and his connexions at court now procured him the notice of persons eminent for their rank, and for their wealth. In the number of his friends at this time he makes mention of Sir John Fagg, M.P. for Steyning, in Sussex, where he had a noble seat, and hospitably entertained De Foe in the summer of 1697.

The reign of King William, partly owing to the long war with France, and partly to political causes, was eminently an age of inventions; or, as De Foe expresses it, "The Projecting Age." Towards the close of the war, in Jan. 1697, our author published his 'Essay upon Projects,' a work full of shrewd and sagacious remarks, whose utility is as marked now as at the period when they were written. It was dedicated to Dalby Thomas, "not," says he, "as commissioner under whom I have the honour to serve his majesty, nor as a friend, though I have great obligations of that sort also; but as the most proper judge of the subjects treated of, and more capable than the greatest part of mankind to distinguish and understand them." It is always curious to trace a dred poor people in making pantiles in England, a manufacture always bought in Holland; and thus he pursued this principle with his utmost zeal for the good of England: and those gentlemen who so eagerly persecuted him for saying what all the world since owns to be true, and which he has since a hundred times offered to prove, were particularly serviceable to the nation, in turning that hundred of poor people and their families a begging for work, and forcing them to turn other poor families out of work to make room for them, besides three thousand pounds damage to the author of this, which he has paid for this little experience."

thought in order to see where it first originated, or how it was afterwards expanded. Among other projects which show a wide range of knowledge, De Foe suggests to King William the imitation of Louis XIV, in the establishment of a society "to encourage polite learning, to polish and refine the English tongue, and advance the so much neglected faculty of correct language; also, to establish purity and propriety of style, and to purge it from all the irregular additions that ignorance and affectation have introduced; and all those innovations of speech, if I may call them such, which some dogmatic writers have the confidence to foster upon their native language, as if their authority were sufficient to make their own fancy legitimate." *

A similar idea was started in the reign of Charles II, by Lord Roscommon, who had the assistance of Dryden; but he did not live to bring his plan to any degree of maturity. Some years after it was revived by De Foe, Prior renewed it in his 'Carmen Seculare,' a poem addressed to King William, who was too deeply immersed in foreign politics to give it his attention. In the reign of Queen Anne it was renewed by Swift, in his 'Letter to the Earl of Oxford, for correcting, improving, and ascertaining the English language. 1711.' Writing to the Archbishop of Dublin, he says, "I have been engaging my lord treasurer, and the other great men, in a project of my own, which they tell me they will embrace, especially his lordship. It is to erect some kind of society or academy, under the patronage of the ministers, and protection of the queen, for correcting, enlarging, polishing, and fixing our language." In this project Swift had the co-operation of Bolingbroke, Berkeley, and other great men of the day; but the hands of the ministers were then too fully employed to attend to it, and the subsequent changes prevented its final accomplishment. Since that time the scheme has been dormant, and Johnson was doubtful how far, in the event of its revival, it would be attended with success. It has succeeded, however, both in France and Italy, nor does there seem to be any valid reason why an academy for literature should not succeed equally well in our own country.

The whole work abounds in strong sense, couched in nervous language, and contains some specimens of good writing. His sentiments upon the various topics discussed are delivered with diffidence, but at the same time with becoming freedom; and they discover a versatility of genius accompanied by correct thinking, that are not often united in the same individual. But of the merit of the performance there needs no other testimony than that of the late Dr Franklin, who found it in his father's library, and speaking of it says, "from which, perhaps, I might receive some impressions that have since influenced the principal events of my life." Besides the projects detailed in it, De Foe informs us that he had written "a great many sheets about the coin, about bringing in plate to the Mint, and about our standard; but so many great heads being upon it, with some of whom his opinions did not agree, he would not adventure to appear in print upon that subject." His work came to a second edition in 1702; or rather, the bookseller placed a new title-page before the remaining copies of the same impression.

In the year 1698 began that warm controversy concerning occasional conformity, which produced so much noise in and out of Parliament in the following reign. Up to this period occasional conformity had been practised by Dissenters, who accepted official employments, with legal qualification, without much offence to any party. Sir

* The academy here alluded to was instituted in 1635, by Cardinal Richelieu. Its object was to perfect the French language, and it comprehended everything relating to grammar, poetry, and eloquence. It consisted of fifty members, and had a director and chancellor, chosen by ballot every three months; and a perpetual secretary. A gold medal was given once a year, as a prize for poetry and eloquence.

Humphrey Edwin, however, the Lord Mayor of London (1697-8), who was a non-conformist, not content with following the example of his Presbyterian predecessors in that office, and attending his own place of worship on the Sunday afternoons, caused, upon one occasion, the regalia of his office to be carried before him to Pinner's Hall Meeting-house, which step raised a loud clamour in the High Church party, and very great heats were caused in the public mind on the subject.

The question arising out of this circumstance was treated by De Foe with appropriate gravity. His publication bore the title of 'An Inquiry into the occasional Conformity of Dissenters in Cases of Preferment, &c. Lond. 1697,' in which the author appears before us in the character of an acute casuist. Assuming as a principle, that Dissenters in his day continued to separate from the Established Church from the same motive that actuated the early Puritans, that is, to obtain a greater purity of worship, he argues that the fast and loose game of religion, which was then played by too many, will not admit of any satisfactory excuse. There is great sincerity, warmth, and truth in the whole strain of this pamphlet, and it excited much attention.

The next question which occupied our author's pen was one of considerable interest. Upon the cessation of hostilities with France, under the Treaty of Ryswick (signed 20th September, 1697), it became a point of much importance, and difficult to determine, what was to be done with the British army upon its return to England. The public at large was decidedly adverse to the maintenance of a standing army. Yet the slowness of the French king in executing the treaty made it necessary for William to pause before he proceeded far in disbanding his troops. The subject was warmly discussed both in parliament and by the press, and numerous pamphlets were sent forth by both parties. The most powerful production which appeared against a standing army was written by Mr Trenchard, and was entitled 'An Argument, showing that a Standing Army is inconsistent with a free Government, and absolutely destructive to the Constitution of the English Monarchy. London, 1697.' Among the answers to this was a tract by De Foe, entitled, 'An Argument, showing that a Standing Army, with consent of Parliament, is not inconsistent with a free Government, &c.'—a treatise abounding in strength of argument conveyed in elegant language. Another pamphlet, written by our author on this subject, was entitled, 'Some Reflections on a Pamphlet lately published, entitled 'An Argument, &c.''

It must not be supposed, however, that De Foe was the unqualified supporter of a standing army; all that he contended for was this, that in the peculiar circumstances of the country, with a government that could scarcely be said to be established, and with a pretender to the throne, whose claims were acknowledged by a large class of disaffected persons at home, acting in concert with a powerful neighbour, it was necessary for the security of liberty, and of a Protestant dynasty, to maintain a limited number of forces under the control of parliament, trained according to the modern method of warfare, and ready to take the field at a moment's notice.

From the discussion of politics De Foe made an easy transition to the reformation of manners, and his next publication had reference to the laudable efforts of William III to correct the depravation of morals that followed upon the Restoration. A proclamation having been issued and an act of parliament passed for the prevention and punishment of profaneness and immorality, our author deemed it important to point out where, in his opinion, the reformation should begin, in order to insure its success; and he accordingly published 'The Poor Man's Plea in relation to all the Proclamations, &c., for a Reformation of Manners and suppressing Immorality. London, 1698.' Several years afterwards, De Foe looked back with satisfaction upon the sentiments he had delivered in this pamphlet, and took frequent occasion to insist upon the impartial enforcement of the law on the subject.

De Foe's next appearance in print was on the occasion of the death of Charles II of Spain, and the disputed succession to the crown of that monarchy. As we have explained the nature of this question elsewhere, it is unnecessary for us to state anything further here, than that upon this subject our author's ready pen produced three able pamphlets in quick succession. The first was entitled—'The Two great Questions considered. 1. What the French King will do with respect to the Spanish Monarchy. 2. What Measures the English ought to take. London, 1700.' This tract being rudely assailed by an anonymous writer, in 'Remarks upon a late Pamphlet, entitled "The Two Great Questions, &c." '—De Foe replied in 'The Two Great Questions further Considered, with some Reply to the Remarks ;' and shortly after, finding that he had far from exhausted the argument in these two publications, he returned to it in a well-written pamphlet, published in the same year, called 'The Danger of the Protestant Religion from the present Prospect of a Religious War in Europe.' These three pamphlets are characterised in the highest degree by sound sense, cogent reasoning, and superior language.

The ascendancy and increased activity of the Popish party in the days of De Foe alarmed his fears, in common with those of other Protestants, and they were not altogether groundless. The expelled monarch was known to be a bigoted Papist, and had a powerful party in England, that looked to him as their rightful sovereign. His friend and ally, Louis XIV, was a merciless persecutor of his Protestant subjects, and had recently added to his former power the influence and resources of Spain, Italy, and the Netherlands. Some German princes had lately withdrawn from their alliance with Protestants ; and the emperor, who had been a bitter persecutor of his Hungarian and Bohemian subjects, was now only restrained by his contest for power with the French king, from renewing his hostilities against the Reformed Faith ; and these circumstances considered, no one could pretend to say that the Protestant religion, which depended for support chiefly upon England and Holland, under the auspices of King William, was not in considerable jeopardy.

CHAPTER V.

THE exultation of De Foe on the occasion of the Revolution, had not been of long duration, but was soon turned to gall and bitterness. "Though that his joy, was joy," yet both friends and foes laboured hard to "throw such changes of vexation on it, that it might lose all colour." His admiration of King William was the ruling passion of his life. He was his hero, his deliverer, his friend ; he was bound to him by the ties of patriotism, of religion, and of personal obligation. But this ruling passion was also the torment of his breast, because his well-grounded enthusiasm was not seconded by the unanimous public voice, and because the services of the great champion of liberty and of the Protestant cause did not meet with that glow of gratitude and affection in the minds of the people (when their immediate danger was blown over) that they richly merited. De Foe had not only ridden in procession with his majesty, but he was afterwards closeted with him, and consulted by him on more than one question ; so that his self-importance, as well as his sense of truth and justice, was implicated in the attacks which were made on the person of his royal patron and benefactor. Nothing can, in our opinion, exceed the good behaviour of William, nor the ill return he received from those by whom he had been sent for, to deliver them from Popish bondage and darkness. Being no longer bound to the earth by a yoke that they could not lift, and having got a king of their own choosing, they thought they could not exercise their newly acquired liberty and independence better than by using him as ill as possible, and reviling him for the very blessings which he had been the chief means of bestowing on them, and which his presence was absolutely necessary to continue to them. Having seen their hereditary, passive-obedience monarch, King James, quietly seated on the other side of the Channel, and being no longer in bodily fear of being executed as rebels, or burnt as heretics, the good people of England began to find a flaw in the title of the new-made monarch, because he was not, and did not pretend to be, absolute, and to sacrifice to the manes of divine right, by taking every opportunity and resorting to every artifice to insult him, to revile his person, to injure his reputation, to wound his feelings, and to cramp and thwart his measures for his own and their common safety. The Tories and highflyers lamented that the crown was without its most precious jewel and ornament—hereditary right; and though they acknowledged the necessity of the case upon which they themselves had acted, yet they thought the time might come when this necessity might cease, and for their lawful king to be brought back again, “with conditions.” Pulpits, long accustomed to unqualified submission, now echoed the double-tongued distinction of a king de jure and a king de facto. This party, whose habits were inimical to the new order of things, but who made a virtue of necessity, tendered their allegiance to the Prince of Orange reluctantly and ungraciously, while the Non-jurors bearded him to his face. The country gentlemen (at that time a formidable party, “not pierceable by power of any argument,”) only felt themselves at a loss from not having the Dissenters and Non-conformists to hunt down as usual. William they regarded as an interloper, who had no rights of his own, and who hindered other people from exercising theirs, in molesting and domineering over their neighbours. What made matters worse was his being a foreigner; his Dutch origin was one of the things constantly thrown in his teeth, and that staggered the faith and loyalty of many of his well-meaning subjects, who could not comprehend the relation in which they stood to a sovereign of alien descent. The phrase True-born Englishman became a watchword in the mouths of the malcontent party; and at that name, as often as it was repeated, the Whig and Protestant interest grew pale. It was to meet, and finally quell this charge, that De Foe penned his well-known poem of ‘The True-born Englishman’—a satire, which, if written in doggrel verse, and without the wit or pleasantry of Butler’s ‘Hudibras,’ is a masterpiece of good sense and just reflection, and shows a thorough knowledge both of English history and of the English character. It is indeed a complete and unanswerable exposure of the pretence set up to a purer and loftier origin than all the rest of the world, instead of our being a mixed race from all parts of Europe, settling down into one common name and people. De Foe’s satire was so just and true, that it drove the cant, to which it was meant to be an antidote, out of fashion; and it was this piece of service that procured the writer the good opinion and notice of King William. It did not, however, equally recommend him to the public. If it silenced the idle and ill-natured clamours of a party by telling the plain truth, that truth was not the more welcome for being plain or effectual. Though this handle was thus taken from malevolence and discontent, the tide of unpopularity had set in too strong from the first arrival of the king, not to continue and increase to the end of his reign; so that at last, worn out with rendering the noblest services, and being repaid with the meanest ingratitude, he thought of retiring to Holland, and leaving his English crown of thorns to any one who chose to claim it.

The state of parties at this period of our history presents a riddle that has not been solved. It has been referred to the gloom and discontent of the English character; but other countries have since exhibited the same problem, with the same results. It may be resolved into that propensity in human nature through which, when it has got what it wants, it requires something else which it cannot have. The English people, at the period in question, wanted a contradiction,—that is, to have James and William on the throne together; but this they could not have, and so they were contented with neither. If they had recalled James, they would have sent him back again. They wanted him back again with conditions and security for his good behaviour. They wanted his title to the throne, without his abuse of power; an absolute sovereign, with a reserve of the privileges of the people; a Popish prince, with a Protestant church; a deliverance from chains without a deliverer; and an escape from tyranny without the stain of resistance to it. They wanted, not out of two things one which they could have, but a third which was impossible; and, as they could not have all, they were determined to be pleased with nothing. This greatly annoyed De Foe, who set his face against so absurd a manifestation of the spirit of the times. It embittered his satisfaction in the virtues of the sovereign, and the glories of his reign,—in his exploits abroad,—the moderation and justice of his administration at home; nor was he consoled for the malignity of his prince's enemies or the indifference of his friends, either by writing odes on his battles and victories, or elegies and epitaphs on his death.

The Tories having now succeeded to office, proceeded to concert measures for strengthening their power and weakening the influence of their rivals. Their first step was to procure a dissolution of Parliament, which took place, Dec. 19, 1700. During the elections, the press was actively employed by both parties in recommending the choice of such members as corresponded with their wishes. Many excellent pamphlets were produced upon the occasion, pointing out those marks by which the people might distinguish between the friends of the Revolution, and guarding them against the influence of bribery and corruption.

It was at this time that De Foe published his 'Six Distinguishing Characters of a Parliament Man. London: 1701;' in the sentiments of which every person who entertains a proper regard for his country must heartily concur. At the time they were penned, the author had passed through the fervour of youth, and was arrived at an age when the judgment becomes matured by experience. They are to be considered as the deliberate views of a man approaching to forty, and indicate a mind strongly imbued with good sense, unfolding itself in a love of rational freedom, and having a proper regard for the interests of religion and virtue.

During the dissolution of parliament, De Foe returned to the subject of his former Essay, and published his "persuasive performance," as Mr Chalmers justly terms it, 'The Freeholder's Plea against Stock-jobbing Elections of Parliament Men. London. 1701.' By the time his former pamphlet was delivered from the press, De Foe returned to the charge in 'The Villany of Stock-jobbers Detected, and the Cause of the late Run upon the Bank and Bankers Discovered and Considered. London: 1701.' In this work he confines himself to the more immediate subjects of trade, and has many judicious remarks upon the methods by which it was then carried on.

CHAPTER VI.

THE earliest of De Foe's printed poems, was 'A New very of an Old Intrigue: a Satyr, levelled at Treachery and Ambition;' a lampoon upon city politics, written soon after the discovery of Lord Preston's plot. Early in 1697, he composed for the noted John Dunton 'The Character of Dr Annesley, by way of Elegy.' The factious spirit that pervaded the nation after the peace of Ryswick gave rise to another poem, published in February, 1699-1700, intitled 'The Pacificator. A Poem. London: 1700,' wherein, leaving the contentions of politicians, De Foe ingeniously transfers the theatre of war to the field of literature, and enlists the chief poets and wits of the day as combatants: "The men of sense against the men of wit."

At the request of Dunton our author wrote some Pindaric verses in honour of the 'Athenian Society,' whose labours were communicated to the world in 1691 and some following years: they were prefixed to Mr Gildon's History of its proceedings, and reprinted in the second volume of 'The Athenian Oracle.' Dunton, with whom the Athenian Society was a favourite project, "glories in the thought that it has elicited poems written by the chief wits of the age, viz., Mr Motteux, Mr Foe, Mr Richardson, and, in particular, Mr Tate, now poet laureat." Some bickerings of a private nature seem to have passed between our author and Dunton, and they are glanced at by the latter in the narrative of his life; but his account of De Foe is, upon the whole, favourable: "Mr Daniel De Foe," says he, "is a man of good parts and clear sense: his conversation is ingenious and brisk enough. The world is well satisfied that he's enterprising and bold; but, alas! had his prudence only weighed a few grains more, he'd certainly have writ his 'Shortest Way' a little more at length. There have been some men in all ages, who have taken that of Juvenal for their motto:

'Aude aliquid brevibus Gyaris et carcere dignum
Si vis esse aliquis.'

Had he writ no more than his 'True-Born Englishman,' and spared some particular characters that are too vicious for the very originals, he had certainly deserved applause."

The month of January 1701 produced the far-famed poem of the 'True-Born Englishman, a satire, printed in quarto, without a bookseller's name, of which the author himself published nine editions, and which was printed twelve times by other persons without his concurrence; for at this period authors had not even the limited protection which they now enjoy. A work once printed was at the mercy of any Tegg of the day who chose to appropriate it. Of the cheap editions no fewer than 80,000 were disposed of.

'The True-Born Englishman' was always a favourite production with De Foe, who associates himself with it in the title-page of various of his writings. Its publication had a favourable effect upon our author's fortunes, as it recommended him to the personal favour of King William; for though his royal patron was no great lover or judge of poetry, he had discernment enough to perceive that De Foe would be a valuable ally, and he immediately expressed a desire to become acquainted with the author, who, on being sent for to the palace, conversed with the king, and had repeated interviews with him afterwards. The manners and sentiments of De Foe appear to have made such a favourable impression upon his Majesty that he ever afterwards regarded him with kindness, and employed him in many secret services, to which he alludes occasionally in his writings, though he nowhere specifies the particular nature of them, and the omission is not supplied by all the researches that have been made among the works of his contemporaries, whether friends or foes to the Government of King William. De Foe's next publication was 'The Succession to the Throne of England Considered. London: 1701;' arising out of the death of the Duke of Gloucester, son of the Princess Anne, a circumstance which rendered it necessary to provide otherwise for the Protestant succession in England. Next followed the celebrated 'Legion Letter,' and 'The History of the Kentish Petition;' after which came 'The Original Power of the Collective Body of the People of England Examined and Asserted,' a very powerful performance, the main argument of which is irresistible, as its language is forcible, and which produced a considerable impression upon the public mind. The subject is discussed with a gravity suited to its importance, and the illustrations are pointed and appropriate. It is a treatise of standing value, and worthy of an attentive perusal.

Upon the death of James II, (16th Sept. 1701,) the French king caused his son to be proclaimed King of England, Holland, and Ireland, and prevailed upon the King of Spain, the Pope, and the Duke of Savoy to follow his example. Indignant at this proceeding, the British monarch ordered his ambassador, the Earl of Manchester, to leave France, and directions were given for the removal of Monsieur Poussin, the French agent, from England. Louis published a memorial in justification of his conduct, and dispersed it in all the courts of Europe; but it was far from satisfying either King William or his subjects, who were indignant at the interference of a foreign power in prescribing to them a king against their consent. Everything now indicated a speedy war, which seemed to have the concurrence of all parties here.

Although our author had a proper sense of the indignity offered to his sovereign by the acknowledgment of the Pretender, yet he did not think it amounted to a legitimate ground for war. Conceiving this, however, a favourable time for inviting the Jacobites to transfer their allegiance, he addressed them with that view in a pamphlet, entitled, 'The Present State of Jacobitism Considered, &c. London: 1701;' which was followed, shortly afterwards, by 'Reasons against a War with France. London: 1701,'—one of the finest and most useful political tracts in the English language. It is distinguished for temperate discussion, for solid reasoning, and for well-pointed ridicule; its arguments are applied with judgment, and they are such as would proceed from a man whose mind was well stored with political knowledge. King William having resolved upon a war, De Foe, notwithstanding the opinion he had expressed on the general question, was consulted by his sovereign upon several points relating to the impending hostilities, as he himself relates in one of his 'Reviews' (1711), in the following terms: "I gave you an instance of a proposal which I had the honour to lay before his late majesty, at the beginning of the last war, for the sending a strong fleet to the Havannah, to seize that part of the island in which it is situated, and from thence to seize and secure the possession of at least the coast, if not by consequence, the Terra Firma of the empire of Mexico, and thereby entirely cut off the Spanish commerce, and the return of their plate fleets, by the immense riches whereof, and by which only, both France and Spain have been enabled to support this war. But the king died, in whose hands this glorious scheme was in a fair way of being concerted, and which, had it gone on, I had had the honour to have been not the first proposer only, but to have had some share in the performance." The death of William, however, which occurred 8th of March, 1702, put a stop to these projects. By the demise of this excellent monarch, "more mortally wounded with the pointed rage of divided parties and an ungrateful people, than by the fall from his horse," as De Foe expresses it, our author lost a kind friend and a powerful protector. In various parts of his writings he takes occasion to cherish his memory, and to embalm his name with the affection of a faithful servant for the best of masters, whilst, in the stinging language of reproof, he reminds the nation of the baseness and ingratitude of those who had so deeply wounded him by their conduct.

The unmanly conduct of a base faction towards the departed hero of England vented itself in the most indecent manner, before the breath was departed from his body, and afterwards in the most malignant speeches, toasts, and lampoons. As well to show his sense of a conduct so unnatural, as to testify his admiration for departed excellency, De Foe now produced 'The Mock Mourners; a Satire, by way of Elegy on King William. London: 1701:' a work which met with the most favourable reception, and ran through five large editions in a few weeks.

Towards the latter end of this reign, De Foe took up his abode at Hackney, and resided there several years. Here some of his children were born and buried.

CHAPTER VII.

QUEEN ANNE, who succeeded to the crown on the death of William, was placed in no very graceful or dutiful position, as keeping her brother from the throne, which she occupied as the next Protestant heir, but to which, in the opinion of many, and perhaps in her own, he had a prior indefeasible right. She had been brought up with bigoted notions of religion ; and in proportion as she felt the political ground infirm under her feet, she wished to stand well with the Church. There was, through her whole reign, therefore, a strong increasing bias to High Church principles. The promise of toleration to the Dissenters soon sunk into an indulgence, and ended in the threat and the intention of putting in force the severest laws against them, under pretence that the Church was in danger. The clergy sung the same song as the Queen, adding a burden of their own to it ; breathing nothing in their sermons but abject submission to the throne, and suspicion and hatred of the Dissenters, reviving and inflaming old animosities, and encouraging their parishioners to proceed even to open violence against the frequenters of conventicles. Their services in bringing about the revolution were forgotten, and nothing was insisted on but their share in the great rebellion, and the beheading of Charles I. A university preacher (Sacheverell) talked of “hoisting the bloody flag against the Dissenters, and treated all those of the moderate party and Low Church as false brethren who did not enlist under the banner.” Another proposed shutting up not only the Dissenters’ meeting-houses, but their academies, thus taking from them the education of their children. A third was for using gentle violence with the Queen, to urge her to severe and salutary measures against Nonconformists, and considered her as under duress in not being allowed to give full scope to the sentiments labouring in her bosom in favour of the Church of England.

De Foe perceived all this with quick and anxious eye ; he saw the storm of persecution gathering, and ready to burst with ten-fold vengeance from its having been so long delayed, and he thought it high time to warn his brethren of the impending mischief. His first attack upon the High Church party was in a pamphlet called ‘A New Test of the Church of England’s Loyalty ; or, Whiggish Loyalty and Church Loyalty compared. London : 1702 ;’—in which he makes excellent use of the slavish tone of the sermons of the High Church clergy ; and he next proceeded to point out to the government, in a terrible and palpable way, the dangerous and mad career to which the zealots of a party were urging them headlong ; “so should his anticipation prevent their discovery.” He collected all the poisoned missiles and combustible materials he could lay his hands on, and putting them together in one heap, brought out his ‘Shortest Way with the Dissenters ; a Proposal for the Establishment of the Church. London : 1702 ;’—one of the finest, ablest, and most seasonable pamphlets ever published.

Knowing the nature of the game played by the High Church party, and the little impression that was to be made by sober argument, De Foe here resolved to change his mode of attack. The course of his studies, no less than taste and inclination, led him to acquaint himself with the writings of his opponents ; and seeing the absurd lengths to which their intemperate zeal urged them, it occurred to him that, by personating the character of a High Church-man, and judiciously wielding the weapon of irony, he should have a fine opportunity of exposing their folly, and the wickedness of the cause they were so furious in promoting ; and he so artfully concealed his design, that, strange to tell, no one, either among those he wrote for, or among those he wrote against, had wit enough to comprehend it ; and yet one cannot peruse the ‘Shortest Way with the Dissenters’ at this distance of time without being astonished with the extent of their stupidity. Every argument of intolerance and bigotry is therein set forth with the most laborious assumption of gravity, and such an invincible air of earnestness, that the zealots of both sides were alike taken in. The 'High Flyers,' as he called them, did not dare to espouse openly the cause of one whom they considered in the light of a too bold and incautious adherent; while the deceived Dissenters, and their friends in Parliament, were loud in their cries of revenge against the best writer their cause could then boast.

" Such is the fate of too much wit, Mistook and cursed by those that most are served by it."

And their conduct added not a little to his sufferings. De Foe, in his explanation of his pamphlet, published immediately afterwards, seems, very naturally, particularly hurt with the Dissenters for continuing to misunderstand him, even after he had fully declared his meaning. Indeed, of their behaviour to De Foe, it is impossible to speak in terms creditable to their understandings; for even after it was discovered that his arrows were shot at the 'High Flyers,' they united with their adversaries in attempting to crush him.

When the author and his design became fully known, and he was threatened with the vengeance of those whom he had so successfully opposed, he complained, "How hard it was that his intentions should not have been perceived by all the town, and that not one man could see it, either Churchman or Dissenter." Mr Chalmers observes, "This is one of the strongest proofs how much the minds of men were inflamed against each other, and how little the virtues of mutual forbearance and personal kindness existed amidst the clamour of contradiction which then shook the kingdom, and gave rise to some of the most remarkable events in our annals." "That De Foe," remarks Mr Hazlitt, "should have incurred the hatred, and been consigned to the vengeance of the High Church party for thus honestly exposing their designs against the Dissenters, is but natural; the wonderful part is that he equally excited the indignation and reproaches of the Dissenters themselves; who disclaimed his work as a scandalous and inflammatory performance, and called loudly, in concert with their bitterest foes, for the condign punishment of the author. They almost with one voice, and as if seized with a contagion of folly, cried shame upon it, as an underhand and designing attempt to make a premature breach between them and the Established Church; to sow the seeds of groundless jealousy and ill-will, and to make them indirectly participators in, and the sufferers by, a scurrilous attack on the reverence due to religion and authority. De Foe was made the scape-goat of this paltry and cowardly policy, and was given up to the tender mercies of the opposite party, without succour and sympathy. This extreme blindness to their own interests can only be explained by the consideration that the Dissenters, as a body, were at this time in a constant state of probation and suffering; they had enough to do with the evils they actually endured, without "flying to others that they knew not of;" they stood in habitual awe and apprehension of their spiritual lords and masters;—would not be brought to suspect their further designs lest it should provoke them to realise their fears; and as they had not strength nor spirit to avert the blow, did not wish to see till they felt it. The alacrity and prowess of De Foe was a reproach to their backwardness; the truth of his appeal implied a challenge to meet it; and they answered with the old excuse, "Why troublest thou us before our time." The Dissenters, too, at this period, were men of a formal and limited scope of mind, not much versed in the general march of human affairs; they required literal and positive proof for everything, as well as for the points of faith on which they held out so manfully; and their obstinacy in maintaining these, and suffering for them, was matched by their timid circumspection and sluggish impracticability with respect to everything else. Their deserting De Foe, who marched on at the head of the battle,—pushed forward by his keen foresight and natural impatience of wrongs, is not out of character, though equally repugnant to sound policy or true spirit. They fixed a stigma on him, therefore, of a breeder of strife, a false prophet, and a dangerous member of the community ; and what is certainly inexcusable, when, afterwards, his jest was turned to melancholy earnest ; when everything he had foretold was verified to the very letter ; when the whole force of the Government was arrayed against them, and Sacheverell in person unfurled his "bloody flag," and paraded the streets with a mob at his heels, pulling down their meeting-houses, burning their private dwellings, and making it unsafe for a Dissenter to walk the streets ; they did not take off the stigma they had affixed to the author of 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters ;' did not allow that he was right and they were wrong, but kept up their unjust and illiberal prejudices, and even aggravated them in some instances, as if to prove that they were well founded. Bodies of men seldom retract or atone for the injuries they have done to individuals.*

The first detection of our author is said to have been owing to the industry of the Earl of Nottingham, one of the secretaries of state, whose vigilance and perseverance in the affair are highly lauded by Leslie. When his name became generally known, people were at no loss to decipher his object ; and all parties now concurred in pouring vengeance upon him for his unlucky wit, which no one had the charity to advance in his extenuation. As the party in power was inimical to the man, rather than to the principles of his book, it was resolved to crush him by a state prosecution. During the first ebullition of fury, De Foe, in contemplation of the rigour he was likely to meet with, sought concealment from the gathering tempest. A proclamation was issued by the government, offering a reward of fifty pounds for the discovery of his retreat, and advertised in the 'London Gazette,' for January 10, 1702-3. It ran as follows :

"Whereas Daniel De Foe, alias De Fooe, is charged with writing a scandalous and seditious pamphlet, entitled, 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters ;' he is a middle-sized spare man, about forty years old, of a brown complexion, and dark brown-coloured

* "De Foe had before this given violent offence to the Dissenters by dissenting from and disobliging them on a number of technical and doubtful points—a difference of which they seemed more tenacious than of the greatest affronts or deadliest injuries. Among other things, he had opposed the principle of occasional conformity, that is, the liberty practised by some Dissenters of going to church during their appointment to any public office, as they were prohibited from attending their own places of worship in their official costume. Nothing could be clearer than that, if it was a point of conscience with these persons not to conform to the service of the Established Church, their being chosen Mayor, Sheriff, or Aldermen, did not give them a dispensation to that purpose. But many of the demure and purse-proud citizens of London (among whom Mr Auditor Benson, his persecutor in after years, was a leader and shining light) resented their not being supposed at liberty to appear at church in their gold chains and robes of office, though contrary to their usual principles of non-conformity ; as children think they have a right to visit fine places in their new clothes on holidays. Their rage against De Foe was at its height, when he had nothing to say against Harley's Tory Administration for bringing in The Occasional Conformity Bill, to debar Dissenters of this puerile and contradictory privilege. It was to the kindness and generosity of Harley, on this as well as on former occasions, in affording our author pecuniary aid, of which he was in the utmost need (being without means, friends, and in prison), and in rescuing him from the grasp of his own party, that we owe his silence on political and public questions during the last years of Queen Anne, and a line of conduct that, in the present day, seems wavering and equivocal. His gratitude for private benefits hardly condemned him to withhold his opinions on public matters ; but, at that time personal and private ties bore greater sway over general and public duties than is the case at present. We entirely acquit De Foe of dishonest or unworthy motives. He might easily have gone quite over to the other side if he had been inclined to make a market of himself ; but of this he never betrayed the remotest intention, and merely refused to join in the hue and cry against a man who had twice saved him from starving in a hair, but wears a wig; a hooked nose, a sharp chin, grey eyes, and a large mole near his mouth; was born in London, and for many years was a hose-factor, in Freeman's yard, in Cornhill, and now is owner of the brick and pantile works near Tilbury Fort in Essex; whoever shall discover the said Daniel De Foe to one of her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, or any of her Majesty's justices of peace, so as he may be apprehended, shall have a reward of fifty-pounds, which her Majesty has ordered immediately to be paid upon such discovery."

In the further prosecution of the resentment he had excited, a formal complaint was made of his publication in the House of Commons, the 25th of February, 1702-3, when some of the obnoxious passages being read, it was resolved, "That this book, being full of false and scandalous reflections on this parliament, and tending to promote sedition, be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, to-morrow, in New Palace yard." This pitiful vengeance upon a work, which was offensive only for its wit, was unworthy the dignity of a grave assembly, and conferred no reproach upon the victim it sought to dishonour. The printer and bookseller being now taken into custody, De Foe nobly issued forth from his retirement, to brave the storm, resolving, as he expresses it, "to throw himself upon the favour of government rather than that others should be ruined by his mistake."

In order to remove the veil from the eyes of those who were too blind to perceive the drift of his argument, De Foe employed his retirement in composing 'A Brief Explanation of a late Pamphlet, entitled the "Shortest Way, &c."'

De Foe was particularly hurt with the Dissenters: of them he says, "All the fault I can find in myself as to these people is, that when I had drawn the picture, I did not, like the Dutchman with his man and bear, write under them, 'This is the man, and this is the bear,' lest the people should mistake me: and having in a compliment to their judgment, shunned so sharp a reflection upon their senses, I have left them at liberty to treat me like one that put a value upon their penetration at the expense of my own."

But De Foe's political sins were manifold; he had been the favourite and panegyrist of William; he had fought for Monmouth; he had opposed James; he had vindicated the Revolution, and defended the rights of the people; he had bantered, insulted, and offended the whole of the Tory leaders of the House of Commons; and neither his submission to the ruling powers, nor his generosity towards his printer and publisher, sufficed to shield him from the resentment of his enemies. He was indicted for libel at the Old Bailey Sessions, 24th February, 1703, and proceeded to trial in the following July. The Attorney-General, Sir Simon Harcourt, appears to have attacked our author with the utmost severity, which drew from De Foe, at a subsequent period, these remarks:—"To hear of a gentleman telling me 'The Shortest Way' was paving the way over the skulls of Churchmen, that it is a crime to justify it, should have been said by no man but him who could first answer this question: Whether all that was ironically said in that book was not seriously, as well as with a malicious earnest, published in print with impunity a hundred times before and since? To say, then, that this was a crime, flies so much in the face of the Churchmen, that it upbraids them with blowing up their own cause, and ruining their friends by a method they at the same time condemn in others. Upon this foot I again say, the book was just, its design fair, and all the facts charged upon them very true.*" dungeon. Be this as it may, De Foe never recovered from the slur thus cast upon his political integrity, and was under a cloud, and discountenanced during the following reign; though the establishment of the Protestant succession had been the object of the labours of his whole life, and was the wish that lay nearest his heart to his latest breath."—Hazlitt.

* Review, ii, 367.

Some years afterwards, when Sacheverell excited so much attention by his sermon at St Paul's, De Foe thus recals his treatment by the Attorney-General. "Where were the brains of the wise Sir Simon Harcourt, when, according to his custom, bullying the author then at the bar, he cried, "Oh but he would insinuate that the Churchmen were for these barbarous ways with the Dissenters," and therefore it was a mighty crime! And now, good Sir Simon, whose honesty and modesty were born together,—you see, sir, the wrong done them; for this very man, whom you so impudently said was then abused, has doomed them all to the devil and his angels, declares they ought to be prosecuted for high treason, and tells us that every Dissenter from the Church is a traitor to the state."*

In another place, he observes, in reference to the same time, "When Sir Simon Harcourt aggravated it against the author, that he designed the book to have the world believe the Church of England would have the Dissenters thus used, 'tis presumed, without reflection upon that gentleman's penetration, that he had not heard how eagerly they granted the suggestion, by espousing the proposal, and by acknowledging it was the way they desired. Now, here is another test put upon the world of this true high-church principle. Destruction of Dissenters is proved to be no more persecution than hanging of highwaymen. This is saying in earnest what the author of 'The Shortest Way' said in jest; this is owning that to the sun, which Sir Simon Harcourt said before, was a crime to suggest. Now the blessed days are come that the great truth is owned barefaced; and the party that ruined and abused the author for telling the truth out of season, makes no scruple of taking this as a proper season to tell the same truth in their own way. From this the author observes, every man ought to have the telling of his own story himself; and that book deserved a censure, not that it was untrue, but because it was not spoke by the right person."†

It may be gathered from his own account of the prosecution, that when his enemies had him in their power, they were at a loss to know what to do with him. Doubtful of the consequences of a trial should he enter upon his defence, they were desirous of avoiding the exposure that would result from a conflict with so powerful an adversary. He was therefore advised to throw himself upon the mercy of the queen, with a promise of protection; which induced him to quit his defence, and to acknowledge himself as the author of the accused work. The jury, upon this, found him guilty of composing and publishing a seditious libel; but the Court, having obtained its object, failed him when he stood in need of assistance.

In a work published by him soon afterwards, he expresses his regret that he did not make a vigorous defence at his trial, instead of listening to the advice of the lawyers; his ready acknowledgment of the work being considered tantamount to his pleading guilty. De Foe seems to have been as badly used by his own counsel, as by those of the opposite side; which afforded him just matter of complaint. Indeed, it is impossible not to acquiesce in the justice of his displeasure against those who had undertaken his defence. Nothing but the utmost weakness, or wickedness, on the part of the bar, bench, and jury, can account for the issue of the trial. Such was the animosity that pervaded the rulers of the state, that it is probable nothing would have availed in his defence; for party-feeling pervaded even the seat of justice. This was apparent in the severity of his sentence, which was to the following purpose: That he should pay a fine of 200 marks to the queen; stand three times in the pillory; be imprisoned during the queen's pleasure; and find sureties for his good behaviour for seven years.‡

‡ Tutchin has the following remarks upon his sentence, in his 'Observator' for Saturday, the 10th of July, 1703. Countryman. Truly, Master Observator, I have no very good news for you:

This very infamous sentence reflected much more dishonour upon the Court by which it was pronounced, than upon De Foe upon whom it was inflicted. And so it was considered by many persons at the time ; for he was guarded to the pillory by the populace, as if he was about to be enthroned in a chair of state, and descended from it with the triumphant acclamations of the surrounding multitude. In allusion to this, one of his adversaries has the following couplet :

“ The shouting crowds their advocate proclaim,
And varnish over infamy with fame.”

De Foe has himself told us, “ That the people, who were expected to treat him very ill, on the contrary pitied him, and wished those who set him there were placed in his room, and expressed their affections by loud shouts and acclamations when he was taken down.” It is more important to observe, that during his exhibition he was protected by the same friends from the missiles of his enemies ; and that the mob, instead of pelting him, resorted to the unmannerly act of drinking his health.

“ As round him Philistines adoring stand,
And keep their Dagon safe from Israel's hand.
That, dirt themselves, protected him from filth,
And for the faction's money drank his health.*

Tradition reports, that the machine, which was graced with one of the keenest wits of the day, was adorned with garlands, it being in the midst of summer. The same authority states, that refreshments were provided for him after his exhibition. It was indeed as great a triumph to him as could possibly happen in his existing circumstances, all the odium of his situation being transferred to those who placed him there. As the High Churchmen were in power, he had no lenity to look for, so that the whole sentence was executed upon him with great exactness, and the particulars published in the London Gazette.†

In the midst of his sufferings, De Foe armed himself with a resolution of mind that enabled him to meet them, and to triumph over his enemies. To the fortitude he displayed upon this occasion, Pope has the following allusion in his ‘ Dunciad,’ as ungenerous as it is false :

“ Earless on high stood unabashed De Foe.”

Mr. Daniel De Foe has pleaded guilty to the indictment against him for writing and publishing ‘ The Shortest Way with the Dissenters ;’ and he is sentenced to stand three times in the pillory, to pay a fine of two hundred marks, and to find security for his good behaviour for seven years. — Observer. The court could do no otherwise than convict him, upon his pleading guilty ; habemus confitentem reum is very often the voice of courts of judicature ; ‘ tis the case of judges and juries. If Daniel De Foe was in expectation of Coleman's Black Box, he has found a pillory instead of it. I don't trouble my head about the custom of giving the pillory to authors, which is the punishment to bakers. You talked just now of turning author ; have a care of your candle. You see which is the shortest way with authors ; you must all enter yourselves in the regiment of Colonel Foe. The law of England directs that no man shall be fined ultra tenementum ; and I make no question but the justice of the court has fined Mr. Foe answerable to his estate. His security for his good behaviour for seven years, no doubt, was rationally considered, as to the legality thereof. For my part, I am only acquainted with the old laws of England, the ancient birthrights and immunities of Englishmen : this I take to be the foundation of new laws.” This is one of the passages for which Tutchin was afterwards prosecuted.

* True-Born Hugonot.

† The ‘ London Gazette,’ No. 3936. Thursday, July 29, to Monday, August 2, 1703.

“ London, July 31. On the 29th instant, Daniel Foe, alias De Foe, stood in the Pillory before the Royal Exchange, in Cornhill, as he did yesterday near the Conduit, in Cheapside, and this day at Temple Bar, in pursuance of his sentence given against him at the last Sessions, at the Old Bailey, for writing and publishing a seditious libel, intituled, ‘ The Shortest Way with the Dissenters.’ By which sentence he is also fined 200 marks, to find sureties for his good behaviour for seven years, and to remain in prison till all be performed.”

It was a bad taste that placed so ingenious a writer as De Foe in the society of dunces ; but Pope was as defective in judgment as in good feeling, and sported with the character of men, as he was led by the impulse of passion. In another part of his poem, he makes another illiberal allusion to our author and his sufferings, associating him with a name famous in the annals of his country, and a victim also to the rage of relentless churchmen.

“ She saw old Prynne in restless Daniel shine.”*

The author of the ‘Notes to the Dunciad’ seems to doubt the propriety of the association, as he owns him to be “a man of parts ;” and Pope himself appears to have entertained a respect for him as a writer : Spence reports him as giving the following opinion :—“The first part of ‘Robinson Crusoe’ is very good. De Foe wrote a vast many things, and none bad ; though none excellent, except this. There is something good in all he has written.” In reference to this misapplication of satire, Cibber observes, “De Foe can never, with any propriety, be ranked amongst the dunces ; for whoever reads his works with candour and impartiality, must be convinced that he was a man of the strongest natural powers, and lively imagination, and solid judgment, which, joined with an unshaken probity in his moral conduct, and an invincible integrity in his political sphere, ought not only to screen him from the petulant attacks of satire, but transmit his name with some degree of applause to posterity.”

Upon the same point, Hazlitt remarks :—“De Foe’s apparent indifference is easily accounted for, from a consciousness of the flagrant rectitude of his case ; but Pope’s imagination had too much effeminacy to stomach, under any circumstances, this kind of petty squalid martyrdom ; nor had he strength of public principle enough to form to himself the practical antithesis of ‘dishonour honourable ;’ the amiable in private life, the exalted in rank and station, alone fixed his sympathy and engrossed his admiration. The exquisite compliments with which he has embalmed the memory of some of his illustrious friends, who stand ‘condemned to everlasting fame,’ are a discredit to his own. His apostrophe to Harley, beginning contrasts strangely with the time-serving, vain, versatile, and unprincipled character of that minister. It was a bold step in Pope to put the author of ‘Robinson Crusoe’ into the Dunciad at all. Swift also had a fling at him, as ‘the fellow that was pilloried ; I forget his name ;’ and Gay is equally sceptical and pedantic as to his possessing more than ‘the superficial parts of learning.’ We know of no excuse for the illiberality of the literary junto with regard to a man like De Foe, but that he returned the compliment to them ; and in fact, if we were to take the character of men of genius from their judgment of each other, we must sometimes come to a very different conclusion from what the world has formed.”

Above all pain, all passion, and all pride,’—

“When De Foe,” says Mr Chalmers, “had arrived at sixty-five, while he was encumbered with a family, and, I fear, pinched with penury, Pope endeavoured, with repeated strokes, to bring his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave, and as far as it appears, without provocation ; for our author is not in the black list of scribblers, who by attempting to lessen the poet’s fame, incurred the satirist’s indignation. The offence and the fate of Bentley and De Foe were nearly alike. Bentley would not allow the translation to be Homer, and De Foe had endeavoured to bring Milton into vogue seven years ere the ‘Paradise Lost’

* Prynne, it will be recollected, suffered the same punishment in the age before by reason of the relentless animosity of Laud.

and 'Chevy Chase' had been criticised in the Spectators and Tatlers. Our author had said, in his 'More Reformation ;'

' Let this describe the nation's character,
One man reads Milton, forty Rochester ;
The case is plain, the temper of the time,
One wrote the lewd, the other the sublime.'

"An enraged poet alone could have thrust into the Dunciad, Bentley, a profound scholar, Cibber, a brilliant wit, and De Foe, a happy genius. This was the consequence of exalting satire as the test of truth, while truth ought to have been enthroned as the test of satire. Yet it ought not to be forgotten, that De Foe had some sarcasm in his 'System of Magic,' or the Sylphs and Gnomes, which Pope may have deemed a daring invasion of his 'Rosicrucian Territory.'

"Undaunted by all the malignant efforts of his enemies, De Foe's ready pen converted his own punishment into a satire upon its authors. He published on the very day of his exhibition, 'A Hymn to the Pillory,' in which the reader will find satire pointed by his sufferings, generous sentiments arising from his situation, and an unexpected flow of easy verse. In this he had ample revenge upon his enemies ; as the ministry did not think proper to prosecute him for this fresh insult against them, that forbearance was construed a confession of guilt in their former proceedings."

The nature of De Foe's punishment excited much mirth in his enemies, who sported their wit in lampoons and madrigals, in which they endeavoured to hold him up to ridicule, as well as to the hatred of the town. One of them imitated the title of his last work in some doggrel lines, called 'A Hymn to Tyburn ; being a Sequel to the Hymn to the Pillory.' Another lavished his abuse upon him in 'The True-born Hugonot ; or Daniel De Foe, a Satyr ; 1703.' The author, a Jacobite of the genuine breed, speaks of him as the idol of the mob, and the oracle of the city, where he had many friends who stood by him in his adversity. He tells us that the five Kentish Gentlemen, mentioned in a former part of the work, made an effort to intercede with the government in his behalf ; and, also, that two peers visited him in Newgate. With a brazen effrontery he says that the sect to which De Foe belonged should be made answerable for his offences ; and as the party had plenty of money, so they should be heavily fined as the shortest way of reforming them. 'An Equivalent for Daniel De Foe' was the title of another poetical satire. The noted Thomas Brown produced 'A Pleasant Dialogue between the Pillory and Daniel De Foe ;' but it is rather a satire upon "the peevish secretary," than upon De Foe. Ned Ward, in a book written against him shortly afterwards, has the following allusion to his late publication :—

" The pillory was but a hook,
To make him write another book :
His lofty Hymn to th' wooden-ruff,
Was to the law a counter-cuff ;
And truly, without Whiggish flattery,
A plain assault and downright battery."*

The poem quickly passed through several editions, being eagerly read by the people, as well for the wit of the author, as for sympathy with his sufferings. The third edition, "corrected, with more additions," was printed in the same year.

This prosecution, however, had a most disastrous effect upon De Foe's fortunes. Before it occurred, it appears that his circumstances were such as to enable him to keep a coach, and maintain a considerable establishment ; but in consequence of his imprisonment, he could no longer attend to his pantile works, which produced the major part of his revenue, and they were consequently given up. Altogether, he lost by this affair, as he tells us, upwards of 3,500*l.*, and was again reduced to ruin, having now a wife and six children depending on him, with no other means for their support than his pen. In this trying situation, the virtue of De Foe was put to a severe test. Had he chosen to desert his principles, and to enlist himself in the service of the government, he might have escaped with a slight punishment, and probably have enriched his family. Whilst his enemies, secretly mortified at the justice and severity of his sarcasm, were treating him with so much rigour, they had the highest opinion of his talents, of which they would have gladly availed themselves. We are told by Oldmixon, that the Earl of Nottingham sent, if he did not go, to him in Newgate, and offered him the mercy of the government, if he would discover who set him on to write his 'Shortest Way.' But this was needless; for all who were acquainted with De Foe, as the same writer observes, "know he needed no setting on to put such a trick upon a party, of whose understandings as well as principles he had no good opinion."

These particulars may serve to refute a calumny propagated against him by Leslie, in his 'Rehearsal';—that he would have made any submission to have been excused the pillory. "Which," says De Foe, "till he can tell the world what submissions they were he offered to make, must stand for one of the most scandalous slanders any man that pretends to truth can be guilty of."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE leisure of De Foe, in the time of his captivity, was not that of idleness or dissipation. Some of his subsequent writings show, that he now stored his mind with those facts relative to the habits and pursuits of the prisoners, which he has detailed with so much nature as well as interest. The low characters that form the subjects of some of his novels, were probably taken from real life, and the sketches drawn at this period of his history. But a part of his leisure was devoted to the composition of some political works, which it will be our business now to notice.

A little before his prosecution, De Foe had amused himself by composing a poem, entitled, 'Reformation of Manners; a Satire: 1702';—and during his confinement, he pursued the same subject, in 'More Reformation; a Satire upon Himself; London, 1703.'

Whilst he was under prosecution, and still uncertain as to what might be its issue, our author sent forth 'The Shortest Way to Peace and Union. London, 1703'; wherein he lays aside the character of a partisan, and assumes that of a peace-maker; stimulated in part, no doubt, by the prospect of his impending trial, and no less by the ill effects that he had witnessed from the intemperance of other writers.

During the early part of De Foe's confinement, some speculating printer or bookseller, taking advantage of his popularity, formed a scheme for collecting his pieces, and publishing them together in a volume for his own benefit. The work was but indifferently executed in every respect; being printed upon coarse paper, and abounding in typographical and other errors. Besides these defects, it comprised only a small portion of De Foe's writings, and included some pieces that he disclaimed. The piracy is thus noticed by Cibber:—"A printer of a bad reputation collected a spurious and erroneous copy of several pieces of De Foe, and entitled them 'The Works of the Author of the True Born Englishman'; and though he was then embroiled with the government for one of the pamphlets which this collection contained, yet had this man the face to print amongst them the same pamphlet, presuming so far upon the partiality of the public resentment, that he should pass with impunity for publishing that very thing for which the author was to be pursued with the utmost severity."

“This, however, was an irresistible testimony that the resentment shown to the author was on some other, and less justifiable account, than the publishing that book ; so was it a severe satire on the unwariness of the ministry, who had not eyes to discern their injustice plainly exposed, and their general proceedings bantered by a printer, for publishing in defiance of them, that same book for which another man stood arraigned.”

Indignant at this barefaced imposition upon the public, and not less at the injury done to himself, De Foe prepared to defeat it, by publishing a genuine collection, with his own impress. This he gave to the world with the following title : ‘A true Collection of the Writings of the Author of “The True-Born Englishman.”’ Corrected by himself. London, 1703.’ 8vo.

The volume comprises twenty-two treatises in prose and verse, being most of the pieces he had formerly published ; but some few are omitted for reasons that he has not assigned. A likeness of the author, engraved by M. Vandergucht, from a painting by Taverner, is prefixed. It is the first portrait of De Foe, and probably the most like him. No portrait can have more verisimilitude, to say the least of it. It exhibits a set of features rather regular than otherwise, very determined in their outlines, more particularly the mouth, which expresses great firmness and resolution of character. The eyes are full, black, and grave-looking ; but the impression of the whole countenance is rather a striking than a pleasing one. Daniel is here set forth in a most lordly and full-bottomed wig, which flows down lower than his elbow, and rises above his forehead with great amplitude of curl. A richly laced cravat, and fine loose flowing cloak, complete his attire, and preserve, we may suppose, the likeness of that civic “gallantry,” which Oldmixon ascribes to Daniel, on the occasion of his escorting King William to the Lord Mayor’s feast. It is altogether more like the picture of a substantial citizen of the “surly breed” De Foe himself has so often satirized, than that of a poor pamphleteer languishing in jail after the terrors of the pillory. It is the portrait prefixed to the present edition.

This collection of his works De Foe introduces to the world with great modesty, in the following ‘Preface to the whole.’ “’Tis not from any opinion I have of the value of my own performances,” says he, “nor from the fondness of appearing in print, having so lately and so unjustly suffered for it, that I have consented to this publication. But it is owing to a certain printer, who had forged a surreptitious collection of several tracts ; in which he had the face to put several things which I had no hand in, and vilely to dismember and mangle those I had, giving the whole a title of collection of my writings ; and his publisher, of the same kidney, to put my name to it, and all this to get a penny, at the price of exposing me and the book in a most uncivil as well as dishonest manner. I have consented therefore to this publication, in order to do myself justice to the world, and that I may not be imposed upon, nor the world abused, by a spurious collection of what I have no legitimate claim to, and an erroneous copy of what I have.

“Before I resolved on this course, I set about correcting the mistakes of the book they have published, till I came to above three hundred errors ; and then being weary of amendment, I resolved to disabuse the world with a corrected copy. Nor is this all the injury done me by this piratical printer, as such are very rightly called who unjustly print other men’s copies ; but I think it is a most unaccountable piece of boldness in him, to print that particular book called, ‘The Shortest Way with the Dissenters,’ while I lay under the public resentment for the same fact. And though the government, indeed, may punish one criminal and let another go free ; yet, it seems a little hard, that I should suffer for printing a book, and another print it in the face of government to get money by it.

“I have no reason to be glad, though it is too true I am a large sufferer for writing that book, though the government were to quit me to-morrow, which I see no reason to expect ; and it cannot correspond with my sense of justice, that another should have a tacit allowance to repeat the crime. The honesty of the matter I shall not meddle with, because I find it is what the person does not concern himself about, but justifies ; which he can do upon no other foundation than he may the taking my hat from my head, or my purse on the road. These, in short, are the true causes of this publication ; but since it is thus ushered into the world, I must ask leave to make some further use of the book itself.

“ First, with submission to a judgment of charity, I cannot pass for an incendiary. Of all the writers of this age, I have, I am satisfied, the most industriously avoided writing with want of temper ; and I appeal to what is now published, whether there is not rather a spirit of healing than of sedition runs through the whole collection, one misunderstood article excepted. And as to the excepted piece, since the general vogue has condemned it, I submit to censure, but must enter a protestation that my intention was not seditious. I avoid vindicating the measures I took in the method of the argument, and rather acknowledge myself in the wrong than dispute it ; but, however, I might by my ill conduct draw a picture which showed a face, I did not design to paint ; yet, I never designed such a face as should scare mankind, and make the world think me mad. I have been a man of peace and charity, and in all the tracts of this volume I think it will appear ; if I have offended in rhyme, I am ready to own my error when convinced of it. The enemy I have pursued is so, both to God and man. If I have run down vice with too full a cry, still it is as vice, and I am persuaded none but the vicious will be angry ; and for them, like acids in physic, I hope the more it disturbs them the better it will work.

“ I am very sorry to find some gentlemen angry at me for a fault wholly their own, and which, I could not have thought would ever happen. The case is this : they fancy themselves lampooned and exposed, in some characters which were never designed for them ; and so take a coat which never was cut out for that use. The truth is, these gentlemen are satires upon themselves, by fixing the characters, as things which must be suitable, since the likeness was such they could not know themselves from a stranger. I am rather sorry the coat fits them, than that they have called it their own, since their persons were never known to me, before they described themselves in this accident.

“ I am assaulted by two or three gentlemen of another sort, and of no mean quality, who are angry that they are left out in some characters in the satire called ‘ Reformation of Manners ;’ the gentlemen are displeased, thinking I did not suppose them bad enough to be lampooned, in which I must do myself this justice to let them know they were mistaken ; for, indeed, I thought them too bad to meddle with, but that being hardened in all manner of vice, beyond reclaiming, I thought satire, whose end is reformation, had no business with them ; therefore, as it is feared their Maker has done before me, I left them to themselves, that whenever Heaven shall think fit to recover them, they may stand as monuments of wonder, and serve to convince the world that miracles are not ceased.

“ This collection also may disabuse the world, who tacitly charge me with writing disrespectfully of the Queen. I appeal to the book itself ; and as I really never did publish the least clause that way, so I think I never failed, either in verse or prose, to address her Majesty with all the deference of a dutiful subject, and to add so much of the debt due to her exalted merit as I was capable of ; and if I have ever failed, in cases less public, though it can never admit of a proof, I shall not fail of such humble acknowledgments as become me.

“ The vicious party, who are touched too warmly in some of the satires, are most industriously ransacking my character, to make it, if possible, look like themselves ; the meaning is, that being as bad myself, I have really no right to find fault with them. Of this I might say much, but shall contract it to this short hint—I never pretended to want either sins or misfortunes, and no man is more willing to acknowledge his mistakes, both to God and man, than myself. But I make the complainants this fair challenge, if it can be made appear that I am guilty of any of the crimes for which I have reprov'd, satirized, and animadverted upon others, so far my satire is unjust, and I am an improper person to write it.

“I shall say nothing to the particular subjects treated of in this book, let them answer for themselves; only I think myself obliged to take notice of a clamour raised by some uncharitable people, about my writing against ‘Occasional Conformity,’ and ill treating Mr How.

“As to the first, it has ever been my declared principles, I have endeavoured with a constant diligent inquiry into truth, to come to a true understanding in that case; and, after all, it remains clear to me, that a Dissenter conforming merely to qualify himself for an office, is sinful against God, scandalous to the Dissenters, and will be fatal to their interest, and in all three, I thought myself concerned to bring it upon the stage. They who tax me with being the author of persecution by it, I think deserve no answer; for since occasional communion with the church is their opinion, they are in no danger of persecution: persecution, if ever it happen, as I see no prospect of it, must not be for occasional compliance, but for not complying at all.

“As for my ill-treating a certain gentleman, to whom I wrote a short preface on this head, I appeal to all impartial unbiassed judgments in the world, if there is any just occasion given by me in the said preface for such a reply as that learned gentleman gave me, and I refer to the preface itself; and I farther appeal, if my reply be in anything indecent, or unsuitable to the necessity of my argument, and the respect due to a man of his merit.

“I see nothing remains to say of me, or of my book; they that search for faults may find them plenty, and they that will mend them for me shall always have my acknowledgment for the kindness; but he that would make faults when there is none, has little charity and less honesty.

“But since the world has been pleased to ruffle me a little too severely concerning my own errors, I purpose to visit them shortly with a state of the case between my errors and theirs; not at all to lessen my own, but settle matters between vice and repentance a little; and that they may have no excuse to reject the admonition, because the reprov'er is not an angel; and if all men would but acknowledge their faults as freely as I shall do mine, amendment would certainly follow;

“‘For crimes confess'd are more than half reform'd.’

“D. F.”

Our author's next production, like his ‘Shortest Way,’ was couched in an ironical style. It is entitled ‘King William's Affection to the Church of England Examined.’ London, 1703. Behind a masked battery, he points his ridicule at the high party, with whom the reign of William was a sore subject; nor did the government concern itself in the vindication of his character. Upon this account the writer had nothing to fear, even if he had been ever so serious.

If the design of the writer is not so artfully concealed as in ‘The Shortest Way,’ his sarcasm is sufficiently pointed to convey the bitterest reproach; and the present work must have been an useful auxiliary to that performance, in unmasking the real designs of the party in power. De Foe next published ‘The Sincerity of the Dissenters Vindicated from the Scandal of Occasional Conformity.’ London, 1703. This, the best pamphlet he wrote in this controversy, was in reply to a treatise by Mr James Owen, a learned Dissenting minister, under the title of ‘Moderation, a Virtue; or, the Occasional Conformity justified from the Imputation of Hypocrisy.’

Upon the meeting of Parliament, Nov. 9, 1703, the Queen in her speech earnestly desired them to cultivate peace and union, and to avoid heats and divisions which would give encouragement to the common enemies of church and state. The Commons promised obedience ; but the Lords engaged, not only to avoid, but to oppose whatever might tend to create contention amongst her subjects.

The pacific tendency of the Queen's speech presented to De Foe an opportunity for enforcing it, that was not to be resisted. He therefore seized the occasion for publishing 'A Challenge of Peace, addressed to the whole Nation. 1703.'

De Foe's next pamphlet was entitled 'Peace without Union : by way of Reply to Sir Henry Mackworth's Peace at Home. London, 1703 ;' which, in 1704, was followed by 'Original Right ; or the Reasonableness of Appeals to the People.' Next came 'The Dissenters' Answer to the High Church Challenge. 1704 ;' a masterly correction of Leslie, who had just outraged all sense and decency in a virulent pamphlet, entitled 'The Wolf stripped of his Shepherd's Clothing,' which contained much severe animadversions upon our author. This was followed by 'The Christianity of the High Church considered,'—and next came 'Royal Religion ; being some Enquiry after the Piety of Princes.' As notices of the circumstances under which all these works were written precede them in the body of the work, it is not necessary to enter into any description of them here.

In the same year, 1704, our author's prolific pen indited 'An Essay upon the Regulation of the Press,' a subject which had now begun to excite considerable attention, and upon which De Foe also wrote largely in his 'Review.' While fully alive to the abuses of the press, especially the continual practice then in use of pirating popular works, he protested against the revival of a state licenser, which would throw the press into the hands of one party, and place it at the mercy of a hireling, who would be the creature of those who paid him.

The subject which next engaged our author's attention was the aggressions of the Scottish Episcopalian Dissenters on the Presbyterians in that country ; and, besides writing largely upon the controversy in his Reviews, De Foe sent forth a separate pamphlet, entitled 'The Liberty of Episcopal Dissenters in Scotland truly stated. London : 1703.' Our author, who spent much of his time in Scotland, was an eye-witness to the disorders which took place, and the accounts published by him from time to time are deserving the attention of all who are desirous of gaining an accurate acquaintance with the politics of the period.

From Scotland De Foe turned his attention to the state of the Protestants, and more particularly, of the Dissenters, in Ireland, where the same game of high church politics was in play, and with somewhat better success than in the sister kingdom, and upon this subject he now published 'The Parallel ; or Persecution of Protestants the shortest Way to prevent the Growth of Popery in Ireland.' Here, though De Foe's propensity to satire led him to prefix an ironical title to his work, yet it is written with great gravity and force of argument.

The distressed state of his circumstances it is probable made our prisoner soon feel it necessary to undertake some regular work, by which he might support himself during his confinement ; and the plan which he accordingly laid down for himself, and the manner in which he carried it on for a great number of years, are alike honourable to his judgment and his perseverance.

'The Review,' which he now started, is one of the most remarkable features in the history of literature. Of the nine quarto volumes which constitute this work, De Foe was the sole writer, an unparalleled effort of combined intellect and industry ; especially when it is considered that the publication was issued three times a week without intermission, despite of difficulties and impediments of every description, and amid innumerable other engagements of a literary nature. Dr Drake in his 'Essays on the Tatler,' &c., describes the 'Review' in the following terms:—"Contemporary with 'Leslie's Rehearsals,' came forward, under a periodical dress, and of a kind far superior to anything which had hitherto appeared, the 'Review' of Daniel De Foe, a man of undoubted genius, and who, deviating from the accustomed route, had chalked out a new path for himself. The chief topics were, as usual, news, foreign and domestic, and politics; to these, however, were added the various concerns of trade; and to render the undertaking more palatable and popular, he, with much judgment, instituted, what he termed, perhaps with no great propriety, a 'Scandal Club,' and whose amusement it was to agitate questions in divinity, morals, war, language, poetry, love, marriage, &c. The introduction of this club, and the subjects of its discussion, it is obvious, approximated the 'Review' much nearer than any preceding work, to our first classical model."

But the 'Review' was not only superior to its predecessors in the graces of style, and in vigour of intellect, but also in the importance of its matter. To cultivate a taste for polite learning and solid attainments; to diffuse information, and arouse a spirit of inquiry upon political, commercial, and other subjects; to stimulate the improvement of females, as well by a more refined behaviour in the other sex, as by an increased attention to their education; and above all, to give a more decided tone to the moral and religious character of his readers, were the leading objects of De Foe, in the composition of the 'Review.' In the prosecution of his purpose, he often brings sound learning and chastened wit to the aid of acute reasoning; and unites an accurate judgment to the effusions of a mind stored by various and extensive reading. His style is vigorous, shrewd, and often eloquent; and he has some passages that for pathos, dignity, and well-pointed satire, are not exceeded in the writings of his successors. For keenness of satire, tempered with liberality of feeling, and decorum of expression, his work had, probably, no equal.

As it forms part of my plan, in the body of the work, to give a full notice of, and large extracts from, each volume of this extraordinary publication, it will not be necessary for me to occupy space by any further mention of it here.

The reader will elsewhere find an account of the circumstances under which the bill against the occasional conformity of Dissenters was introduced to Parliament, and of its repeated rejection by the House of Lords, at that period the safeguard of popular rights. While this measure was formerly under the consideration of parliament, De Foe had penned some further thoughts upon the subject, with a view to their publication; but the rejection of the measure determined him to suppress them. The subject, however, being still kept alive by the high party, he was induced to change his resolution, and commit his papers to the press. They were accordingly published under the title of 'A Serious Inquiry into this grand Question, Whether a Law to prevent the Occasional Conformity of Dissenters, would not be inconsistent with the Act of Toleration, and a Breach of the Queen's Promise? London: 1704.'

This is one of De Foe's best pamphlets in this fruitful controversy, and evinces much good sense, couched in forcible yet becoming language. As a piece of serious argument it is irresistible; and the adroitness with which he manages it shows that he was a master of human nature, no less than of his subject. Versed in the arts of mankind, he detects the sophisms resorted to by the dishonest to delude the unwary, and penetrates the designs of a party hostile to liberty, unmasking them to the world in their true colours. Having good feeling as well as reason upon his side, he enlists the language of persuasion in the cause of charity and mutual forbearance; whilst, touched with the wrongs of his party, he asserts their just claims with a manly spirit, befitting the cause he had undertaken to defend. His work is an able defence of the doctrine of Toleration in a large and liberal sense.

In the month of April De Foe produced his pamphlet, intitled, 'More Short Ways with the Dissenters. London: 1704.' Instead of adopting the disguise he assumed in a former pamphlet with a similar title, he now told his story in plain and intelligible language. His satire, however, is sufficiently caustic and severe. He was aroused to the attack by the continued insults of the highflying clergy, whose sermons and writings were a series of libels against the Dissenters. The works he had particularly in view, were Wesley's attack upon Dissenting Academies, and an assize sermon of Sacheverell's, preached before the University of Oxford, the Judges and Grand Jury, March the 9th, 1703-4, in which he repeats the slanders of Wesley.

Immediately afterwards, De Foe published 'The Dissenters Misrepresented and Represented. Lond. 1704.' 4to. In this work he points out a variety of particulars in which the Dissenters were calumniated by high-churchmen; and remarks, that they showed themselves better qualified to blacken the characters of others than to clear up their own.

De Foe renewed his attack upon the high party in the month of July, in a work entitled 'A New Test of the Church of England's Honesty. Lond. 1704.' This was designed as a sequel to his former pamphlet, entitled 'A Test of the Church of England's Loyalty,' the object of which was to show that certain churchmen had but indifferent pretensions to that political virtue. In the present performance, he brings forward a charge as little favourable to their morals, and sustains it in a variety of particulars as it regarded their behaviour to the Dissenters.

Our author's next publication was a narrative of the fearful storm which arose in the night of the 27th November, 1703, and which for violence, extent, and duration, as well as for the dismal consequences that accompanied it, was unprecedented in history. It is to the pen of De Foe that we are indebted for the completest account of this visitation. After being frequently announced for publication, it was published towards the end of July with the following title:—'The Storm, or a Collection of the most remarkable Casualties and Disasters which happened in the late dreadful Tempest, &c.; London: 1704.' The materials upon which De Foe founded the work consist chiefly of letters from the clergy and other principal inhabitants of the parishes to which the narrative relates. These are mostly presented in their documentary form, which, whilst they give it the stamp of authenticity, prevented those exertions of genius that distinguish the other writings of the author. His work, however, is of the greatest interest. In explaining the natural causes of winds, he shows more science, and in delivering the opinions of the ancients, that this island is more subject to storms than other parts of the world, he displays more literature than he has been generally supposed to possess. He is moreover entitled to the yet higher praise, that he seized that awful occasion to inculcate the fundamental truths of religion: the being of a God, and the doctrine of future reward and punishment.

CHAPTER IX.

UPON the accession of Harley to office, in the spring of 1704, he wisely judged that a writer of De Foe's talents and perseverance would be of essential service to the new Ministers, if he could be brought to their support; and as his own politics were in the main not dissimilar from those of De Foe, he had reason to expect a more favourable attention to his overtures than his Tory predecessors had received. He accordingly made a private communication to him with that view, but no arrangement seems to have taken place between them, as De Foe continued in prison some months afterwards. It was to this minister's influence, however, that he eventually owed his release. It was most likely through the same medium that the Queen became acquainted with his merits, and was made conscious of the injustice of his punishment, which she now appeared desirous to mitigate. For this purpose she sent some relief to his wife and family, through her treasurer, the Lord Godolphin; and transmitted to himself a sufficient sum for the payment of his fine, and the expenses attending his discharge from prison.

By this powerful interposition, De Foe obtained his release in the beginning of August, 1704, and through the same interest was employed in several honourable services, which he discharged with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of his employers, as we learn from himself.

As well to avoid the town-talk as to breathe a salubrious air after so long a confinement, De Foe immediately retired to Bury St Edmund's, in Suffolk, where he passed some time, amusing his leisure hours by composing new works for the press.

The first publication after his release was a poem, written during his confinement, and adapted to his own circumstances at the time. It is called 'An Elegy on the Author of the "True Born Englishman;" London: 1704,' in the preface to which he complains loudly of the ill-usage he was continually receiving from the pamphleteers of the day.

The successes of the English army, under the Duke of Marlborough, in the preceding summer, had furnished the poets of the age with a prolific subject for the exercise of their muse. De Foe was not backward in contributing his share to the general stock, and produced on the 29th August, 'A Hymn to Victory,' to which are prefixed two pages of dedication to the Queen, also in verse, and to these he has signed his name, a course not usual with him.

De Foe's pen was next exercised upon a subject that needlessly occupied the attention of Parliament, and was made of more importance, both by divines and politicians, than it really demanded.

John Asgill, a gentleman who had already distinguished himself by his learning and ingenuity, having his attention directed to the study of divinity, had adopted a theory upon the subject of death and a future state, which, however absurd, was fortified by precedents, and was, to say the worst of it, but an innocent delusion. Unhappily for himself, he lived at a period when the smallest deviation from orthodoxy was regarded by theologians as an offence that demanded a visitation from the civil power. This irrational mode of confuting error, so disgraceful to learning, and so foreign to the spirit of Christianity, was resorted to in the case of Asgill, who evinced its futility by adhering to his opinions.

The obnoxious doctrine propounded by Asgill, was contained in a pamphlet with the following title: 'An Argument, proving, that according to the Covenant of Eternal Life, revealed in the Scriptures, Man may be translated from hence into that Eternal Life, without passing through Death, although the Human Nature of Christ himself could not be thus translated till he had passed through Death; 1703.' The work was no sooner published than a general clamour was raised against the author as an infidel and a blasphemer, though Asgill had said nothing to warrant these charges. Upon these imputations reaching Ireland, where he had been chosen a member of the House of Commons, an order was made for his expulsion, with a provision that he should be thereafter incapable of sitting in the House.

De Foe took a much better method of confuting his opinions, in a pamphlet published towards the end of September, and entitled 'An Enquiry into the case of Mr Asgill's General Translation; showing that it is not a nearer way to Heaven than the Grave, &c. London: 1704.' This work strongly illustrates, not only the versatility of De Foe's genius, but the solidity of his mind, when attracted to religious subjects. Although trade and politics had engrossed so much of his time and attention, they had not obliterated his early theological studies, for which he always preserved a taste. As a critic and commentator upon the Scriptures, he often shows great judgment as well as acuteness, and writes with an earnest seriousness that befitted the gravity of his subject. Unlike the railing theologians of his day, he treats a whimsical writer with decency and good manners, confines himself closely to the subject in dispute, and never allows his zeal for orthodoxy to detract from the character, or draw unwarrantable conclusions from the premises of his opponent. Although it was a subject upon which a writer of less seriousness would have employed his wit, he paid more homage to the cause with which it was connected, than to indulge in a talent which he knew so well how to direct upon proper occasions.

De Foe had scarcely escaped from the terrors of a prison, before new scandals were raised by his enemies for the purpose of mortifying him. Whilst he was enjoying himself in his retreat from the bustle of the metropolis, and quietly pursuing his literary occupations, some of the news-writers propagated a report that he was fled from justice, and that warrants were out for his apprehension.

In his 'Review' for October 7, 1704, he gives this account of the affair:—"Whereas, the author of this paper has been, and still is, in the country, upon his extraordinary and lawful occasions, and some persons maliciously and scandalously reported and caused it to be written in news-letters, that he is absconded and fled from justice: he gives this notice to all persons whom it may concern, that he knows no guilt for which he has any occasion to fly; so, as soon as ever he saw in the written news the malice of the world, he took care to give public notice to the government where he is, and shall always be ready to show himself to the faces of his enemies, let the occasion be what it will."

The slander being repeated, he published the following notice in his 'Review' for November 4, in which he traces it to its authors: "Whereas, in several written news-letters dispersed about the country, and supposed to be written by one Dyer, a news writer, and by Mr Fox, bookseller in Westminster Hall, it has falsely, and out of mere malice, been scandalously asserted, that Daniel De Foe was absconded, and fled from justice; that he had been searched for by messengers, could not be found, and more the like scoundrel expressions; the said Daniel De Foe hereby desires all people who are willing not to be imposed upon by the like villanous practices, to take notice, that the whole story is a mere genuine forgery, industriously and maliciously contrived, if possible, to bring him into trouble; that the said Daniel De Foe, being at St Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk, when the first of these papers appeared, immediately wrote to both her Majesty's secretaries of state, to acquaint them with his being in the country on his lawful occasions, and to let them know, that on the least intimation from them, he would come up by post, and put himself into their hands, to answer any charge that should be brought against him. That as soon as his business was over in the country, he made his humble complaint of this unprecedented usage to the secretary of state, and had the honour to understand, that no officer, messenger, or other person, had received any order, warrant, or other direction, to search for, apprehend, or otherwise disturb the said Daniel De Foe, or that there was any complaint, or charges brought against him. And further, having been informed, that Mr Robert Stephens, the messenger, had reported that he had an order or power from the secretaries of state, to stop and detain the said Daniel De Foe, and that he made several inquiries after him to that purpose; the said Daniel De Foe hereby gives notice, that as soon as he came to town, and before his application to the secretary of state, he went, and in the presence of sufficient witnesses, spoke with the said Robert Stephens the messenger, as he calls himself, of the press, and offering himself into his custody, demanded of him if he had received any order to detain him; and he denied that he had any such order, notwithstanding he had most openly and in villanous terms, repeated before, that he would detain him if he could find him, and had in a scandalous manner made inquiries after him. The said Daniel De Foe, having no other remedy against such barbarous treatment, but by setting the matter in a true light, thinks he could do no less in justice to the government and himself, than make this publication; and further, he hereby offers the reward of 20*l*. to any person that will discover to him, so as to prove it, the author and publisher of any of those written news-letters, in which those reports were published, which shall be paid immediately, upon such proof made, at the publisher's of this paper. Witness my hand, DANIEL DE FOE."

CHAPTER X.

THE next subject that engaged the pen of De Foe, was one that still preserves its importance, and will continue to do so, as long as the support of the poor remains an object of legislation.

Towards the latter end of the year, Sir Humphrey Mackworth introduced a bill into the Commons for the employment of the poor; the object of which was to establish in every parish a parochial manufactory, and to provide a fund for its support. Whilst under the consideration of the House it was printed by direction of the member who had framed it; and, having thus become public property, it was open to public scrutiny. From an apprehension that Sir Humphrey had mistaken the right method of remedying the grievance of which he complained, De Foe now penned his masterly treatise, entitled, 'Giving Alms no Charity; and employing the Poor a Grievance to the Nation; being an Essay upon this great question, whether Workhouses, Corporations, and Houses of Correction for employing the Poor, as now practised in England, or Parish Stocks, as proposed in a late Pamphlet, entituled, "A Bill for the better Relief, Employment, and Settlement of the Poor, &c." are not mischievous to the Nation, tending to the Destruction of our Trade, and to increase the Number and Misery of the Poor. London, 1704.'

This able and well-timed treatise upon an important subject is distinguished alike by comprehensive knowledge, acuteness of penetration, and soundness of judgment; and it may still be perused with advantage. De Foe wrote much upon the same question in his 'Review' both now and afterwards, when the bill, having been rejected by the Lords, was again brought before Parliament.

At the opening of the year 1705, De Foe was in an ill state of health. For some time previously he appears to have laid aside from a regular application to his studies; but occasional intervals of ease enabled him to continue his 'Review,' which met with but slight interruption in its ordinary course of publication. The nature of his illness is not mentioned, but it was of some months' continuance, and remained with him during the whole of January. It is not improbable that his constitution had received a shock by his long confinement.

Upon the Duke of Marlborough's return to England, towards the close of the former year, he was welcomed with that favour and distinction which his splendid services so amply merited. Besides the honour conferred upon him by the state, garlands of praise were prepared for him by the poets of the age. De Foe published upon this occasion, 'The Double Welcome to the Duke of Marlborough. London, 1705.' Whilst he eulogizes the Duke for his victories abroad, and makes him second in fame to none but his beloved William, he hails his return as the harbinger of that internal peace to which the nation had been so long a stranger.

De Foe's next publication was entitled 'Party Tyranny; or an Occasional Bill in Miniature, as now practised in Carolina. London, 1705.' This is a treatise in defence of the Dissenters of Carolina, who though they formed the bulk of the population in that colony were grievously oppressed by the dominant High Church party there. Soon after this appeared, 'Advice to all Parties,' by the author of the 'True-born Englishman. London: 1705;' a tract which had been written a considerable time, and was seized with other papers by the Earl of Nottingham.

In the early part of 1705, De Foe committed to the press a second volume of his writings, containing most of the political pamphlets and satires published by him since the close of his former volume. He announces the collection in the following Preface:—

"The same reasons which obtained upon me to expose to the world some of the loose pieces I had formerly published single, in a stated collection, and a book by themselves, hold good for my proceeding to a second volume, viz. that if I do not, somebody else will do it for me.

"The scandalous liberty of the press, which no man more than myself covets to see rectified, is such, that all manner of property seems prostrated to the avarice of some people; and, if it goes on, even reading itself will in time grow intolerable.

"No author is now capable of preserving the purity of his style, no, nor the native product of his thoughts to posterity, since after the first edition of his work has shown itself, and perhaps sinks in a few hands, piratic printers or hackney abridgers fill the world, the first with spurious and incorrect copies, and the latter with imperfect and absurd representations, both in fact, style, and design.

"'Tis in vain to exclaim at the villany of these practices, while no law is left to punish them. The press groans under the unhappy burthen, and yet is in a strait between two mischiefs.*

"1. The tyranny of a licenser. This in all ages has been a method so ill, so arbitrary, and so subjected to bribery and parties, that the Government has thought fit, in justice to the learned part of the world, not to suffer it, since it has always been shutting up the press to one side and opening it to the other; which, as affairs are in England often changing, has, in its turn, been oppressive to both.

"2. The unbridled liberty of invading each other's property; and this is the evil the press now cries for help in.

"To let it go on thus, will, in time, discourage all manner of learning; and authors will never set heartily about anything, when twenty years study shall immediately be sacrificed to the profit of a piratical printer, who not only ruins the author, but abuses the work.

"I shall trouble myself only to give some instances of this in my own case.

"1. As to the abusing the copy, the 'True-born Englishman' is a remarkable example, by which the author, though in it he eyed no profit, had he been to enjoy the profit of his own labour, had gained about 1,000%.; a book that, besides nine editions of the author, has been twelve times printed by other hands; some of which have been sold for 1d. others 2d. and others 6d., the author's edition being fairly printed, and on good paper, and could not be sold under a shilling. Eighty thousand of the small ones have been sold in the streets for 2d. or at 1d.: and the author, thus abused and discouraged, had no remedy but patience.

"And yet he had received no mortification at this, had his copy been transmitted fairly to the world; but the monstrous abuses of that kind are hardly credible: twenty, fifty, in some places sixty lines left out in a place, others turned, spoiled, and so intolerably mangled, that the parent of the brat could not know his own child. This is the thing complained of, and which I wait with patience, and not without hopes, to see rectified.

* It is said that the vigorous remonstrances of De Foe on this subject procured the Act of Anne, "For the Encouragement of Learning by vesting the Copies of printed Books in the Authors or their assigns."

“ A certain printer, whose practice that way's too well known to need a name, having frequently practised the same thing in particulars, made the first essay in general, and printed a spurious and erroneous copy of sundry things, which he called mine, and entitled them ‘ A Collection of the Works of the Author of the “ True-born English-Man.” ’ ”

“ And though the author was then embroiled with the Government for one of the pamphlets he collected, yet had this man the face to print among them the same pamphlet, presuming so far upon the partiality of the public resentment, that he should pass with impunity for the publishing that very thing for which the author was to be pursued with the utmost severity.

“ This, as it was a full proof, and most undeniable testimony, that the resentment showed to the author was on some other and less justifiable account than the publishing that book, so was it a severe satire on the ignorance and unwariness of that ministry, who had not eyes to see their justice plainly exposed, and their general proceedings bantered by a petty printer, in publishing barefaced, and in defiance of them, that same book for which another man stood arraigned, and was to be exposed.

“ Nor was the insult to the Government all the circumstance of guilt in this publication, but the most absurd and ridiculous mistakes in the copies were such as rendered it a double cheat : first, to the author, to whom it was a most aggravated theft ; first, as it was invading his right, and, secondly, as it was done while he was in trouble, and unable to right himself. Secondly, to the buyers, to whom it was a most ridiculous banter, and mere picking their pockets, the author having, in his first perusal of it, detected above three hundred and fifty errors in the printing, marring the verse, spoiling the sense, and utterly inverting the true intent and meaning.

“ The author having expressed himself, though in decent terms, against the foulness of this practice : the printer having no plea to the barbarity of the fact, justifies it, and says, he will do the like by anything an author prints on his own account, since authors have no right to employ a printer unless they had served their times to a bookseller.

“ This ridiculous allegation seems to me to be as if a man's house being on fire, he had no right to get help for the quenching it, of anybody but the insurer's fire-men.

“ The instance of this case was not worth notice, nor the man touched in it significant enough to mention, were it not at the same time to let the world see the weak reasons given for so fatal a mischief, and a thing so discouraging to all manner of learning and industry, as this exorbitant licence of the press is.

“ It may be inquired here how will you find a remedy for this mischief? How will you have the drones that work none, but devour the labour and industry of the bees, kept out of the hive?

“ It is an unhappiness that, in answering this point, there is not difficulty enough either to excuse the Government in letting it lie so long neglected, or to procure me any reasonable applause for the contrivance.

“ The road is as plain as the table of multiplication, and that a conjunction of parts makes an addition of quantity ; two short clauses would heal all these evils, would prevent seditious pamphlets, lampoons, and invectives against the Government, or at least prevent their going unpunished, and preserve to every man the fruit of his own labour and industry.

“ First. That every author set his name to what he writes, and that every printer or publisher that prints or publishes a book without it, shall be deemed the author, and answerable for the contents.

“ Secondly. That no man shall print another man's copy ; or in English, that no printer or bookseller shall rob another man's house, for it really is no better, nor is it any slander, notwithstanding the aforesaid pretence, to call it by that title.

"I had purposed to have given a short history here of the several tracts in this collection, and something of the reason of them, but I find it too long for a preface.

"The 'Hymn to the Pillory' seems most to require it; the reader is desired to observe this poem was the author's declaration, even when in the cruel hands of a merciless as well as unjust ministry, that the treatment he had from them was unjust, exorbitant, and consequently illegal.

"As this satire, or poem, call it which you please, was wrote at the very time he was treated in that manner, it was taken for a defiance of their illegal proceedings, and their not thinking fit to prosecute him for it was a fair concession of guilt in the former proceeding, since he was in their power, and, as they thought, not like to come out of it.

"'Tis true some faint show of resentment was made, and the author, though then in prison, never declined the test of it, but they began to see themselves in the wrong from the very first exerting their cruelty and treachery upon this author, and the interest of the party sensibly decayed from that very moment of time.

"Multitudes of occasions have since that served to convince the world that every word of the book he suffered for was both literally and interpretively the sense of the party pointed at, true, in fact, and true in representation, and therefore he cannot but repeat the conclusion as relating to himself, which he has seen made good even to public satisfaction.

"Tell them the men that plac'd him there
Are scandals to the time,
Are at a loss to find his guilt,
And can't commit his crime."

"I should enlarge on this subject, but that, perhaps, the world may in some proper season be troubled with the journal of all the proceedings, trials, treaties and debates upon that head, and the barbarity as well as folly of their conduct be set in a true light to the world.

"As to the other pieces, the world has seen them so lately in their proper seasons, and the subjects are so plain, I think 'tis needless to say anything more to them; let them speak for themselves.

"D. F."

The articles in the volume are eighteen in number. It has the following advertisement:—"Advertisement of a spurious edition of the first volume of the works of the author of 'The True-born Englishman.' There being a pretended collection of some of those tracts, published under the same name, it is thought fit to give notice, that there are several things inserted in the said book which were not his, and those that are, being full of errors, omissions, and mistakes, which in many places invert the sense and design of the author. N. B. The true collection contains above double the number of tracts that were printed in the pirated edition, as is at large mentioned in the preface to the second edition lately published with additions. Corrected by himself. Price, bound, 6s." His works came to a third edition in 1710, with the addition of a key. The satire being now pointed by the specification of characters, and obscurities being illuminated by the annexation of circumstances, a numerous class of readers were induced by their zeal of party, or desire of scandal, to look for gratification from our author's treatises. He complains, that his writings had been most neglected of them, who at the same time have owned them useful.

De Foe now employed himself in composing a political satire in prose, which he published the 26th of March, under the title of 'The Consolidator; or Memoirs of sundry Transactions from the World in the Moon. London: 1705.' This is by no means one of De Foe's best performances, but it deserves notice, if on no other account, for this reason, that it certainly contains the first hints of many of the ideas which Swift, many years afterwards, embodied in Gulliver, particularly in his account of Laputa, the book-making machine, &c. &c. It contains, moreover, a great many bye-hits against all the authors of the time, from Dryden to Tim. D'Urfey.

Our author next sent forth 'The Experiment; or, the Shortest Way with the Dissenters exemplified. Being the case of Mr Abraham Gill, a Dissenting Minister in the Isle of Ely, and a full account of his being sent for a Soldier by Mr Fern (an Ecclesiastical Justice of Peace) and other Conspirators. 1705,' the subject of which is sufficiently explained in the title.

It was about this time also, that De Foe committed to the press 'The Dyet of Poland,' a political satire levelled at the late ministers. In point of merit, this is one of De Foe's best poetical satires. Although in general it partakes of the same uncouthness that characterizes the rest of his poetry, yet there are some well-turned passages, and his characters are drawn with animation.

The masked battery from behind which De Foe had issued his missiles against the Tories did not secure either the author, or his object, from detection. His poem was reprinted with annotations and animadversions, under the following title: 'The Dyet of Poland, a Satire, considered paragraph by paragraph. To which is added, a Key to the whole, with the names of the Author, and the Nobility and Gentry that are scandalously pointed at in it. Lond. printed and sold by Ben. Bragge, in the year 1705.' 8vo. The work was also handled with great severity by another writer, in 'The Case of the Church of England's Memorial fairly stated.'

Whilst De Foe was preparing his 'Dyet of Poland,' he was appointed by Harley to execute some mission, of a secret nature, which required his presence upon the continent. Of the nature of the service it is now impossible to give any account; but it appears to have been attended with some danger, and to have required his absence for about two months. The minister, who was well acquainted with his enterprising character, was justified in his choice, by the able and fearless manner in which he discharged his trust; and he appears to have been so well satisfied, that upon his return he procured him an appointment at home as a reward for his services. Before his departure he had several interviews with Harley, and a letter written by him to that minister, but a few days before, is still preserved in the British Museum. It is as follows:—

"Sir,—I cannot but retain a very deep sense of the candour and goodness wth w^{ch} you rec^d me last night. The perticulars, Sir, admitt of no epithets to illustrate y^m; it remaines to me onely to tender you all y^e acknowlegem^t of a grateful temper highly obliged. Pursuant, Sir, to y^e plainness I have yo^r leave to use, the enclosed papers are written for y^r perusall. They are observations from y^e discourse of y^e town on y^e affair of y^e fleet; 'tis an unhappy subject, and I assure you there is much less than is discoursed on that head. I have onely one thing to premise, and which I entreat you to believe of me—that I have no manner of personal design as to Sir George R——; I neither kno' him, nor am concerned with him, or wth any that does kno' him, directly or indirectly. I have not the least disrespect for him, or any personal prejudice, on any account whatsoever. I hope you will please to give full credit to me in this, otherwise it would be very rude and presuming to offer you y^e paper. I am preparing wth joy to execute your commands for Thursday next, and furnishing myself with horses, &c.; and entreat y^e liberty, since y^e time is short, and I cannot expect to see you often, of troubling you the more wth my visits of this sort, and fill you wth my short requests. First S^r that you will be pleased to order y^r letter of leave for Mr Christopher Hurt,* [probably a name he assumed for the occasion] to be absent on his private affaires for two months or more. That you will please to think of some instrucion for my speciall conduct; and whether it may not be proper for me to have something about me like a certificate, pass, or what you think fit, to prevent being questioned, searcht, or detained, by any accident, w^{ch} often happens on the road ; the nature and manner of such a thing I remit to y^r judgment. It will be very necessary that I should be provided against y^e impertinence of a country justice. The poem, S^r of y^e Diet of P—d, I omitted to mention to you last night ; but certainly t'will be very necessary to carry into y^e country with me ; and as I am sure of its being very usefull, I cannot but importune you to let me perfect it, and turn it abroad into the world. I expect strange effects from it as to y^e house. The other papers which I purposed to furnish, I referr, wth y^r license to send you per post : Perticularly some notes relating to y^e Parliam^t and a scheme of an office for secret intelligence, at home and abroad. This last, as I kno' you are not ignorant of the vallue, y^e magnitude, and necessity of y^e design, wth y^e want of such a thing in this naⁿion, so I shall tak while I am abroad to finish a perfect scheme, and such a one as I hope you will approve and put in practice ; that, if possible, the affaires of all Europe may lye constantly before you in a true light, and you may kno' what is a doing all over Europe, even before 'tis a doing ; and in this weighty particular go beyond all that ever were in that place before you. I confess S^r I had the enclosed papers in my pocket when I was wth you, but was unwilling to rob myself of so much of y^r obliging conversation as to produce y^m. I commit y^m to your serious thoughts as a subject (pardon me if I think amiss), not at all trivial, and at present much wisht for in y^e naⁿion. When I, S^r, take the freedom to lay any of these things before you, 'tis for you to judge from as you think fit ; I hope you will not find me assuming either a positive determinatⁿ, or so much as arguing absolutely ; I may mistake, the whole town may mistake ; though in this case I doubt they do not. However, I am forward to lay such things before you, because I cannot but think 'tis necessary you should kno' in this, as well as anything else, what the people say.

I am, S^r,

Y^r most obed^t. &c."

CHAPTER XI.

THE length to which political parties now carried their animosities was strikingly exemplified in the personal treatment of our author. For the freedom with which he spoke his mind against the temper and conduct of the high flyers, he was not only subjected to their scandal and abuse, but even threatened with violence. Writing in July this year, he says, " 'Twould reflect upon the nation in general, should I give the particulars of about twenty or thirty letters, most of which threaten my life ; so that they would think England coming into the mode of Italy." To these angry persons he says, " Let them step to Maidstone jail, and there discourse a little with their brother-murderers ; and if their condition pleases them, let them follow their steps if they can. Indeed, gentlemen, the mean, despicable author of this paper is not worth your attempting his correction at the price. Gaols, fetters, and gibbets, are odd, melancholy things. For a gentleman to dangle out of the world in a string has something so ugly, so awkward, and so disagreeable, that you cannot think of it without regret ; and then the reflection will be very harsh, that this was for killing a poor mortified author, one that the government had killed before. It can never be worth your while ; and, therefore, he hopes you will let him alone to time and age, which are hastening upon us all, and will certainly at last do the work to your hand."

But little regardful of these threats, he says, " I move about the world unguarded and unarmed ; a little stick, not strong enough to correct a dog, supplies the place of Mr O——r's great oaken towel ; a sword, sometimes, perhaps, for decency, but it is all harmless, a mere nothing, and can do no hurt anywhere but just at the tip of it, called the point : and what is that in the hand of a feeble author ? Let him alone, gentlemen, and have patience : you will all come to be of his mind ere long ; and then, if you had killed him, you will be sorry for it.”*

Besides threats of personal violence, his enemies resorted to other methods of ill-usage. Crowds of sham actions and arrests poured in upon him ; debts in trade, of seventeen years’ standing, and compounded for, were revived ; writs were taken out without the knowledge of the creditor, and sometimes after he had been paid ; assignments of debts were eagerly sought for and purchased ; and collateral bonds sued where the securities had been resigned. “It would take up too much of the reader’s time,” says he, “to trouble the world with the barbarous treatment of a man just stripped naked by the government ; should I descend to particulars, they would be too moving to be read.” In the number of reports raised to injure him, it was given out that he had been taken to Newgate ; and he tells us, that some persons were so kind as to go there to visit him. “Common compassion,” says he, “would lead most men to pity those who have been ruined by any public disaster ; but this lot must be expected by all who venture in plainness, and without flattery, to tell men their crimes ;” and, as he was determined not to restrain his pen from writing the truth, he had confidence “that the Author of Truth will, one time or other, own the work, if not the unhappy author.”

In another place, he says, “I am not going to move the compassion of anybody by telling the ungrateful particulars how the unhappy author is treated ; how his life is threatened by bullying letters ; his creditors roused to a general prosecution of him for debts, though under former treaties and agreements ; as if he was more able to discharge them now, reduced by a known disaster, and ruined by a public storm, than before, when in prosperous circumstances he was gradually clearing himself of everybody, and all waited with patience, being themselves satisfied ; how his morals were assaulted by impotent and groundless slanders ; his principles cried down by envious friends, as well as malicious enemies. His endeavours for the public advantage thus prove none to himself ; his family and fortunes sink under his constant attempts for his country’s welfare ; and all this for inviting you to peace, for telling you what sort of people obstruct it, and for answering the impudent attempts of the nation’s enemies to break and divide us.”†

Dismissing the terrors of a jail, and the threats of assassination, from the first of which he looked to the law for protection, and was willing to venture the last, he proceeds to inform us, that his enemies opened upon him the more harmless battery of banter and ridicule. Annoyed by his perseverance, and stung by his satire, they were desirous that he should lay down his paper, and it was for that purpose they resorted to so many engines of persecution ; but they failed in their object. Undeterred by their threats, and neglecting their contempt, he defies their malice, and laughs at its impotency. Secure in the strength of his cause, he armed himself at all points for their attacks, and showed an undaunted resolution to meet them. In his arguments for peace and charity, for a respectful demeanour to superiors, for the toleration of religious opinions, and for the civil rights of mankind generally, he had greatly the advantage of his opponents. If he was inferior to some of them in learning, he was superior in the more useful branches of knowledge, having a competent acquaintance with the history and opinions of mankind, and the talent of applying it to practical purposes. Having the full command of his temper, he triumphs over the loss of it in his adversaries, and employs his sarcastic powers against them with irresistible effect. In pleading the cause of moderation, he says, “Without doubt, they that believe civil dissention, strife, and oppression, to be needful for this nation’s happiness, differ from me, and I from them ; and I doubt we shall always do so. Now, if these gentlemen will prove that the laws for the prosecution of Dissenters, that feuds and breaches in the legislature, that heats and animosities of parties, are particularly for the public service, I confess, all my notions of things are wrong; for indeed I did not know that when our Lord said, 'a kingdom divided against itself cannot stand,' that the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, were excepted out of the rule, with a cujus contrarium verum est."*

"I have been told that 'tis no wonder all the threatenings, sham actions, and malicious prosecutions I speak of, are practised upon me, since I am pushing at a party in daily lampoons, ballads, and clandestine scandals; and that I must expect no other till I lay down this paper, and all other scribbles of such a nature; and if I am really for peace, I should show all the hackney authors of the town that I am so, by laying down the weapons first, to show them a good example. I have frequently answered this, as to all the papers cried about in my name, assuring the world they have none of them been wrote by me. The suggested scandals of these things increase the crime of them; and I have been wholly unconcerned at the injury of it, not dreaming my worst enemies could so far injure their judgments as to father on me the crowds of doggrel mischief the world abounds with.

"As to laying down the pen or discontinuing the subject I am upon, though I claim a privilege to be judge when I think I ought to go backward or forward, yet to answer the proposal as to a cessation of pen and ink debates, I shall make them a fair offer, which he that gives himself the trouble to move me in it, may make use of to the other party. Whenever he will demonstrate they are inclined to peace; whenever the High Church party will cease tacking of bills, invading the toleration, raising ecclesiastical alarms against the dissenters and Low Church; will cease preaching up division, persecution, and ruin of their Protestant brethren; when all the crowd of High Church advocates, Rehearsers, Observers, Reflectors, Whippers, and Drivers, will declare a truce;—when these conditions may be observed, I fairly promise to be so far contributor to the public peace, as to lay this down, and turn the paper to the innocent discourses of trade, and the matters of history first proposed. Indeed, I must do so, as a matter of course; for the peace will then be made, the end answered, and consequently the argument useless."†

During the summer, De Foe took a journey into the west of England, but whether upon any public service, or for his private business, does not appear. All that he tells us is, "That he was upon a journey about his lawful occasions, accompanied by a friend, and his friend's servant, and that he met with several unmanly and unreasonable insults upon the road." The High Church party no sooner got scent of his presence than they devised means to get rid of him. Whilst at Weymouth, his letters being delivered to a wrong person, were shown about the town; and a friend having written in one of them, "as a piece of news, and too true, that a certain person had the impudence to say, that the queen had broken her coronation oath, and the like," the wise mayor of the town, imagining there was treason in the business, examined such persons as had conversed with our author, and had them conveyed to the assizes at Dorchester; but the judge soon dismissed them. Notwithstanding this rebuff, the mayor thought fit to send an account of the matter to one of the secretaries of state, who made no return to his officiousness.

The story, being transmitted to Exeter, was sufficiently magnified in that Tory city, where some malicious persons misleading the judge, occasioned him to remark in his charge to the jury that many seditious persons were come to stir up the country, and disturb the peace; with directions to apprehend them. The enemies of De Foe immediately spread a report that the judge had particularised him by name, and issued an order for his apprehension. Being then at Bideford, and hearing the news, he resolved to present himself before the mayor of the town ; but he being absent, he applied to the next principal magistrate, offering himself to justice, if any man had any matter of accusation, that he might meet it to his face. Being dismissed, as reason required, he proceeded to Tiverton, where he learnt that a warrant had been issued against him by a justice of the name of Stafford, who lived near Crediton, and ordered that he might be brought before him. As the warrant did not state any information upon oath, De Foe contented himself with sending him a letter, acquainting him where he was, which way he was going, and the names of the towns where he intended to stay. But no further notice was taken of him.

In allusion to this 'Much ado about Nothing,'* he says, "He cannot but laugh at the wisdom and courage of a country justice, who, having carefully issued out his warrant for the author, after he could not but know he was gone, and searched every house but that where he lodged, showed his folly and his temper both at a time. Had these wise gentlemen designed really to have come to hand, as they call it, with the author, nothing was more easy. A small difficulty would make it out that they knew which road he was gone, and to what towns ; but, like the famed hero that always looked for his enemy where he knew he could not be found, they sent their warrants just the contrary way, having more desire that it should be said they granted a warrant, than that they had executed it." The information was upon the charge of dispersing libels ; but so innocent was he of this, that he offered to go down from London on purpose, if the justice would undertake to commit him upon his warrant. Nothing arms a man so securely against the shafts of malice as conscious innocence ; and De Foe found it to be his safeguard in the day of trial. He says, "he had learnt long since to condemn the curse causeless, and to slight the malice of men who fly in the face of truth, and hate the author merely because he moves them to that peace which is their only happiness."†

Towards the end of the year there appeared a tract with the following title :—'A True Relation of the Apparition of one Mrs Veal, the next day after her death, to one Mrs Bargrave, at Canterbury, the 8th of September, 1705, which Apparition recommends the perusal of Drelincourt's Book of Consolations against the Fear of Death. London, 1705.' When Drelincourt's book first appeared in the English language the publisher was disappointed in the sale, and being a heavy work, he complained to De Foe of the injury he was likely to sustain by it. Daniel asked him if he had blended anything marvellous with his pious advice, which the bookseller answered in the negative. "If you wish to have your book sell," replies he, "I will put you in the way of it ;" and he immediately set down and composed the story of the Apparition, which was made to recommend Drelincourt's book, and has been appended to every subsequent edition. After this, there was no complaint for want of a sale ; and since then the work has passed through more than forty editions.

In this extraordinary narrative, rendered so by its mode of execution, no less than by the occasion that produced it, De Foe gave an earnest of those inventive powers which he afterwards exercised upon more interesting subjects.

The year 1706 was opened by De Foe with 'A Hymn to Peace, occasioned by the two Houses joining in one address to the Queen ;' a poem in Pindaric verse, a metre much in vogue at that time, and strongly reprobated by Johnson.

In the early part of the year a bill was brought into the Commons, entitled, 'An Act to prevent frauds committed by bankrupts.' De Foe, who appears to have had a considerable hand in forwarding the measure, both by his writings and his personal solicitations, bestows some useful remarks upon it in his 'Review.'

It appears that some of the members opposed the bill for the sake of the retrospective part; and there were strong reasons to suspect them of being influenced by personal motives. To such, De Foe says, "It is very hard to make men more criminal because they fell into the pit a year or so before their neighbours. This is singling out some men from the rest, and making a difference of persons where there is no difference of crime." De Foe had a strong impression that this clause was opposed by some persons with a particular view to himself; and he attended in the lobby of the peers, with the intention of proposing that his own interests should be sacrificed by a specific provision, rather than that he should stand in the way of so useful a measure.*

The Bill, having passed the Lords, received the royal assent the 19th of March. It is highly praised by De Foe, who calls it one of the best bills passed by parliament since the Habeas Corpus Act. The only clause to which he objected was, that which empowered the commissioners to withhold from the bankrupt his certificate, without assigning a cause for it; a discretion which he considered too important, when viewed in connexion with the dependent situation of the sufferer.

After the rising of Parliament, De Foe published his thoughts on the subject in a separate pamphlet, entitled—'Remarks on the Bill to prevent Frauds committed by Bankrupts; with Observations on the Effect it may have on Trade. London, 1706;' an able review of the whole question.

A victory obtained by the Duke of Marlborough over the French forces in the spring of this year inspired the muse of De Foe, with a poem 'On the Fight of Ramillies,' which occupied the whole of the 'Review' for the 21st of May. The suddenness of the victory, before it could be imagined that the troops could be brought together, diffused a general feeling of surprise and exultation. De Foe informs the reader that his poem cost him but three hours in composing. The Queen having appointed the 27th of June as a day of thanksgiving, when she went in procession to St Paul's, our author devoted his 'Review' for that day to another poem upon the subject.

Early this summer De Foe also contributed a preface to a new edition of a popular work which had been often printed for the Non-conformists in behalf of their principles. entitled 'De Laune's Plea for the Non-conformists.' De Foe's object in reviving the work at this time was "to let the world see the necessity of toleration, the mischief of persecution, and that there are better reasons to be given for the Dissenters differing from the Church of England than some people imagine."

The publication of this work brought upon our author a host of enemies, who accused him of exposing the church, by recounting her former ill-treatment of the Dissenters.

* Concerning this affair De Foe writes thus:—"I will not be positive how far this may affect one particular gentleman, whom, in respect to himself, I forbear to name, and who has a relation in either House of Parliament; who, as I am informed, pursues this bill to destroy it, merely as he thinks it will be of service to the author of this paper, against whom he has a legal though no equitable demand. But, as I am credibly informed, he has expressed himself something plainly by the mouth of his said relatives in this case, I humbly make him this offer:—1. That waiving his advantage of law, which was obtained when the author was embroiled in a public disaster and not able to defend himself, he is ready to come to a hearing in equity of the justice of his debt, and to give him good security to stand by the award. 2. That if his debt be real, which is in itself small, it would be but a weak argument against the bill, since some to whom he owes thirteen times as much gave their attendance daily at the House to declare their willingness to have it pass. And lastly, such is my sincere zeal for the public benefit of this clause, and my just concern for the number of families that will be relieved by it, that I attended at the House of Lords myself, ready to have declared my willingness to be excepted out of it, rather than so necessary a bill should have been lost for want of my being removed out of the way."

To this he replies, in his 'Review' for July 4, "That the Dissenters were persecuted, plundered, and murdered in gaol, there is no room to deny. To say, it was not for their religion, because they might meet five in a place, is a most miserable shift, and merits no answer. Assembling themselves together, which the Scripture commands them not to forsake, can never be understood to signify five in a place; a pretty sort of liberty indeed! For obeying this command of God rather than man, they were persecuted, fined, jailed, plundered, and murdered; and this I call persecution for religion, let others call it what they please. I forbear entering into the list of the 8,000 I mentioned, which is not hard to procure if Mr White be inquired of; but I bury the memory of it in silence, as the law has buried the practice in a legal toleration. There are some gentlemen, indeed, who appear angry at this, and would account it a sufficient toleration to have the Dissenters gratified with that wonderful liberty of meeting five at a time." Those who supposed that this complaint of persecution was an arrow shot at the church, he observes, "did both him and the church great wrong; for he always considered it a state plot, invented for the purpose of embroiling the two parties, although too many of the clergy and other persons fell in with it. Those who brought the charge against him, therefore, really attacked the church themselves; the general body being far from accountable for all the actions of those who call themselves members of her communion."

De Foe had long been meditating a work of considerable extent which should embody his notions on government in a poetical dress, and in his 'Review' for July 18, the 'Jure Divino' is announced for publication upon the following Saturday; and in the same paper is an advertisement, warning the public against a pirated edition, of which notice had been given. In his number for 27th July he announces the actual publication of the spurious work; and in that for August 3, he again advertises it with a proper exposure of the imposition. The genuine work bears the following title, 'Jure Divino, a Satire, 1706, folio.' As a political argument the work is triumphant, but the poetry is not entitled to much commendation.

This year brought along with it a revival of our author's troubles, arising out of his former engagements in business. In consequence of the act lately passed for the relief of debtors, De Foe surrendered to the Commissioners, who investigated his accounts in order to his discharge. This was opposed upon some frivolous pretences by an unprincipled lawyer, employed, it seems, by creditors equally unprincipled. The affair, however, will be best understood as related by himself, and it unfolds a melancholy tale of his misfortunes. The 'Review' for August 20, 1706, contains the following extraordinary narrative:—

"I confess myself surprised at my own affair, and should not have troubled the world with it, if it was not something peculiar, and that was never heard of before. Several debtors have been used hardly by creditors, and their discharge vigorously opposed; but was ever the world so mad? The unhappy author of this, claiming a discharge from old misfortunes, by a clear surrender as by law directed, finds himself opposed,—not by those he owes money to, but by those who owe him money; not by those who by disaster are wronged, but by those who have wronged, cheated and plundered him of the money which should have helped to discharge others; to whom he never owed a shilling, of whom he never borrowed, but to whom he always lent; and who have actually defrauded him of near 500*l.* advanced in compassion to save them from destruction. Would any unhappy man have looked for opposition from such people as these? Has any bankrupt been thus treated before?

"In the behalf of these people a certain lawyer opposed the discharge of the unhappy insolvent, with a fury and malice singular to himself, and suitable to the cause. I should indeed have done him justice, and told the world, he was at last so ashamed of his clients as to disown them, and say he appeared for another, who was really a creditor; but then I must be obliged to expose his morals, the gentleman he named having since declared, before good witness, he gave him no orders, and was under a promise not to appear. If the truth of this be questioned, and it be doubted whether there are any such monsters in the world, the reader may at any time have the persons and particulars; for I scorn to conceal names in a charge so direct as this. If this has not in it all the villany of abstract malice, I know not where to search for it, and hope no real creditor of mine can be offended, either that I then told him so, or that I now publish it to the world; the first, to convince them how this man's design is to screen those whom the creditor ought to call to account for above 400% of their money; and the last, to let the world know what monsters there are in it. If this paper should acquaint the world how these people have hitherto treated its author; how they have seized upon his writings, left only in trust; how conveyed away their relation, a partner, that he might not be an evidence, and compounded his private debts for him without which he would not go; how they have sued for bonds given and afterwards discharged in partnership, and sued in the name of the persons to whom they were paid, without their knowledge; how, after beginning a suit, they have not dared to go on, and after proposing a reference, have not dared to stand to it, though accepted, and offered to be determined by their own arbitrator: if I should run into all these particulars, the story would be too black to read.

"I ask pardon of the unconcerned part of the world, that this paper should take up any of their time in reading the melancholy story of my private oppressions; and I break it off here, because I propose to lay it wholly open to the world by itself; where the persons concerned may reflect upon the methods taken by them or their lawyer, for I question if they are privy to it at all, to ruin the family of a man that twice endeavoured to save theirs." De Foe resolves the opposition to him into mere spleen, and says, "As to the lawyer's declining afterwards to own he appeared for these people, and affirming he appeared for another, 'tis plain it was a forgery of his own, to prevent his being turned out of the room with the infamy he deserved. That gentleman has since owned, as by his affidavit will appear, that he gave him no orders, nor had any such design. If by such art and fury I fall, let no man wonder; for who can stand against envy? who can resist refined malice?"

"This case gives a sad instance of the madness of the age; wherein nothing but the entire destruction of the debtor and his family can expiate the crime of his own disaster. Having been fourteen years in retreat, in jeopardy, in broils, and most of the time in banishment from his family, he had swallowed up all he had gained, though that has been very considerable, in the gradual payment of his creditors, and in defending himself against those who would have it, not only faster than their fellow-creditors, but faster than it could be got. They have since seen him stripped naked by the government, and the foundations torn up, on which he had built the prospect of paying his debts and raising his family. And yet, now, when by common reasoning they ought to believe the man has not bread for his children, they have redoubled their attacks with declarations, executions, escape-warrants, and Gods knows how many engines of destruction. As if a gaol and death would pay their debts; as if money was to be found in the blood of a debtor, and they were to open his veins to find it.

"That bind the ready hands of industry,
Pinion the willing wings, and bid men fly;
Resolv'd to ruin me the Shortest Way,
They strip me naked first, then bid me pay."

"But this is not yet all. For, though I confess I did not expect it, yet, as some whisperings have been spread of a further plot, even against the life of this unhappy debtor, and that amongst his friends, he cannot but take notice of it here, as what he thinks the only proper season, as it is indeed one of the chief reasons of this publication. It is no other than a vile and scandalous suggestion, that he made concealments to defraud his creditors; or, in plain English, has not made a fair surrender of his effects. Now, if this be true, he must be the greatest fool as well as knave, knowing how many bloody enemies, as well as base and hypocritical friends, he is encompassed with. But, if it be not true, it is a most vile and barbarous scandal. Omissions are certainly possible; the author is no more infallible than other men. He may, and 'tis much if he has not, in the life of constant hurries that he has lived, have erred in some part of his account; and if this is your charge, if you are men of like frailties, and whose case may one time or other want the like charity—if you have anything left in you that is human—if any compassion for a man in danger, with a family of seven children, that must perish in his disaster, inform him of it, and show him this gulf of destruction before it be too late. If this is not the point, if it be a snare or an advantage you have gotten to expose, and as far as in you lies, to ruin and disappoint him, pray come in with your charge at the meeting, and let it appear. But, if it be nothing but blood, and death is in your imagination, know, gentlemen, the murder is already committed, and your guilt determined in the intention. But, as to himself, he frankly defies your attempt, as he is out of fear at your rage. He has already appealed to sovereign truth in his case, and willingly throws himself into the hands of justice, fairly challenging all the malice of hell, and the rage of men, to fasten the crime upon him.”*

Having placed his affairs in a train for settlement, as far as he was able, he resolved to quit a scene that was productive of so much disquiet and vexation. His steps were now directed to Scotland, where we afterwards find him actively employed in promoting the union. But, before his arrival there, he had to encounter fresh scenes of persecution; they are thus related by him:—

“I was no sooner upon my own affairs come out of London, with a design to travel for some time, but these sons of slander reported I was fled; and having nothing to fix a flight upon, it must be for debt. This, however, would not hold, having, just before this pretended flight, made a full, free, and honest surrender of all my affairs which the law directed, and this after four severe trials upon oath. Then I was fled from the resentment of a certain eminent and honourable person, at something printed in the ‘Review,’ and for which the printer and publisher were called to answer. But this slander was, unhappily for its author, contradicted, in that the paper so giving offence was not written till since I left London. And, as I have on all occasions declared, I had not the least thought of reflecting on that honourable person, so had I offended him, I am too sensible of his lordship’s candour and justice to have fled anywhere but to himself; and I would have entirely submitted to ask his lordship’s pardon in the humblest manner, making all the satisfaction either his clemency or his justice should have awarded.

“But neither of these things happening to hold water, then it comes out that I have given in a wrong statement of my affairs.” De Foe here publishes a letter sent to the commissioners, the purport of which was that some nameless person could discover an estate of 400*l.* per annum, belonging to De Foe, which he had omitted in his schedule; but, before he revealed the secret, he expected the expenses of his journey to be defrayed, and a reward secured to him, of which notice should be given in the Gazette. Upon this malicious hoax he observes, “This gentleman had been unknown till now, for any answer that had been given to so plain a sham; because, had D. F. 400*l.* per annum, he would certainly have had no creditors to surrender to; and the money to be paid before the discovery intimated so much of a cheat, that it was not worth an advertisement in the ‘Gazette,’ which would have cost ten shillings to answer such a fellow, who was left to go on with his discovery his own way. But since he, or some other person like him, has taken upon him to raise such a report, I shall answer in short—that if any man can make out any concealment, fraud, or wilful reserve of anything relating to my account or effects surrendered, and pleases to offer proof of it, in whatever nation, kingdom or country I may happen to be, I will, on the first notice, come to England, and put myself into the hands of justice, to suffer whatever the law shall inflict. In the meantime, I beg of all impartial persons who regard the reputation and character of an injured and innocent man, that they will treat such stories with the contempt they deserve till fair proof be made ; and this is all the favour I ask.—D. F.”*

CHAPTER XII.

THE most important subject that occupied the attention of Parliament, and of the nation in the year 1706-7, was the union with Scotland. In the success of this measure De Foe was warmly interested, and he discovered his zeal by composing and publishing a variety of works ; in some of which he exhibited its policy and utility, and in others replied to the arguments of its opponents.

As De Foe had resided a considerable time in Scotland, he had ample opportunities for making his observations upon the country and its inhabitants ; and the result was favourable to both. In debating the Union, he says—“Those who fancy there is nothing to be had there but wild men and ragged mountains, storms, snows, poverty, and barrenness, are quite mistaken ; it being a noble country, of a fruitful soil and healthy air, well seated for trade, full of manufactures by land, and a treasure great as the Indies at their door by sea. The poverty of Scotland, and the fruitfulness of England, or rather the difference between them, is owing not to mere difference of climate, or the nature of the soil ; but to the errors of time, and their different constitutions. And here I must tell our friends in England, who are so backward to set their country free, and so willing to enslave us again, that the different face of the two countries, to whoever will please to survey them as I have done, is the best lecture upon politics. All the land in England is not fruitful, nor that in Scotland all barren. Climate cannot be the cause ; for the lands in the north of Scotland are in general better than the lands in Cornwall, which are near six hundred miles south of them ; but liberty and trade have made the one rich, and tyranny the other poor.”†

In prospect of the intended union, he devoted one of his ‘Reviews’ to a poem upon the subject, entitled, ‘Peace and Union.’ His rhyming genius being as prolific as the subject, it produced two other poems, which appeared in some subsequent numbers. But he rendered more important services to the promoters of the measure by his publications in prose. The act of security, which had been lately revived in Scotland, and conceded by the necessities of the English ministers, had caused much unnecessary alarm amongst the Tories of England. To allay their fears, De Foe published his pamphlet, entitled—‘The Advantages of the Act of Security, compared with those of the intended Union, 1706.’ Whilst the treaty was in progress, he published several other works, both in England and Scotland, for the purpose of forwarding the business. One of these was—‘An Essay at removing National Prejudices against a Union with Scotland. To be continued during the Treaty here. Part I : London, 1706.’ A second part was advertised in the ‘Review’ for the 25th of May ; and it was followed by three other parts with the same title, and all published between this and the commencement of the next year.

But it was not by his pen only that De Foe promoted this great measure ; he also contributed to it largely by his personal services. By the recommendation of Harley, he acquired the favour and patronage of Lord Godolphin, who seems to have entertained as high an opinion of his talents and integrity as his first benefactor. At the suggestion of these ministers, he was now taken into the service of the Queen, and had the honour, as he himself informs us, "to be employed in several honourable, though secret services." The precise nature of them he does not state, only that he acquitted himself to the satisfaction of his employers.

Scotland now became the scene of his labours. His ready talents and insinuating address, combined with his general knowledge of commercial affairs, pointed him out to the ministers as a fit person for a mission to that country ; and the regard he had always manifested for the Scots, would render him more acceptable to them than many of his countrymen. The subject also was by no means new to him, having conversed upon it many years before with the late King William. The extreme jealousy of both nations against any encroachments upon their church establishments threw many obstacles in the way of its success, and required the utmost delicacy upon the part of its managers. De Foe was well acquainted with the sources of these mutual antipathies ; and a confidence in his abilities, founded upon past experience, fully justified the choice of the ministers. Before his departure, he had the honour of an introduction to the Queen, and kissed her hand upon his appointment.

De Foe arrived in Edinburgh early in the month of October, 1706, and was recognised by the treaters in a character almost diplomatic. He disguised his journey under motives of curiosity, strengthened by the encouragement of his friends, "who thought he might be useful there in prompting a work that he was fully convinced was for the general good of the whole island, and particularly necessary for strengthening the Protestant interest." By this journey, he tells us, he had an opportunity of witnessing all the succeeding transactions relating to the union, and of using his best endeavours to answer the many frivolous objections formed and improved there with great industry against it. He was frequently sent for by the committees of parliament, and employed in making calculations relating to trade and taxes. Being thoroughly conversant with these matters, he sat down to them with great expertness, and had the satisfaction of seeing his labours approved.

During the tumults at Edinburgh, he partook of the common danger that threatened all the advocates for the union. It was then unsafe to appear in the streets, and the terror of the inhabitants made them extinguish the lights in their houses. De Foe happening to view the proceedings of the mob from his window, had a large stone thrown at him ; "for they suffered nobody to look out, especially with any light, lest they should know faces, and inform against them afterwards." He adds, "the author of this had his share of the danger in this tumult, and though unknown to him, was watched and set by the mob, in order to know where to find him ; had his chamber windows insulted, and the windows below him broken by mistake. But, by the prudence of his friends, the shortness of its continuance, and God's providence, he escaped." In the midst of these scenes of disorder, he collected the documents which he afterwards published for the instruction of posterity ; and they furnished him with a number of incidents which serve to illustrate the spirit of the times, as well as to enliven his narrative.

Towards the close of the year, whilst the treaty was still under debate, De Foe published some verses in praise of Scotland, entitled—"Caledonia, &c. A Poem in honour of Scotland, and the Scots Nation. Edinburgh, 1706." The chief design of the poem, next to that of doing justice to the Scots nation, is to invite an increased attention to the improvement of the country, by the encouragement of commerce and agriculture, which would raise its prosperity to a degree commensurate with its natural advantages. Our author's gratitude for the favours he received from the Scots led him to embalm the worth of many of their most eminent families. De Foe celebrates the courage of the Scots, and enumerates some of their military exploits. He endeavours to prove that the situation of Scotland rendered it well adapted for trade; he speaks honourably of the abilities of the inhabitants; he commends them for their learning, and their attention to religion; and he hints at the advantages which they might derive from an union with England. But though De Foe's Poem was a panegyric upon Scotland and Scotsmen, it did not wholly consist of commendation. He takes notice of the evils that the common people suffered from their vassalage to their chiefs, and from their ignorance of the blessings of liberty. He also censures the Scots for not improving the natural advantages which their country possessed, and for neglecting their fishery; and he gives them some excellent advice.

Amidst all his most active personal labours, our author found time to compose several separate replies to various opponents of the union; and during the whole period continued the 'Review' at its usual rate of three numbers a-week without intermission. On this, and all other occasions, he seems very anxious "to assure the world that wherever the writer may be, the 'Reviews' are written with his own hand; no person having, or having had, any concern in writing them but the known author, D. F."

De Foe's residence in Scotland brought him acquainted with many persons of consideration in that kingdom, from some of whom, as we have seen, he received many tokens of kindness and friendship. For these favours his connexions in England enabled him afterwards to make some return; and, however, his services were undervalued by the party-writers of the day, it appears there were some amongst the great and the noble who were proud of his correspondence, and profited from his political interests.*

Dunton, who wrote at this period—'A Secret History of the Weekly Writers,' begins his catalogue with De Foe, of whom he speaks well in the main, but with all the jealousy of a rival journalist. His account of him, which is marked with all the singularities of that eccentric writer, is as follows:—

"To do him justice, take him with all his failings, it must be acknowledged that De Foe is a man of good parts, and very clear sense. Whatever he says upon the subject of peace and war, is so true and correct, that (like Pythagoras's ipse dixit) it might almost stand for an infallible rule. He is master of the English tongue; can say what he pleases upon any subject; and by his printing a poem every day, one would think rhimed in his sleep. It is his misfortune that a prejudiced person should write his character. But (with all my revenge) I cannot but own his thoughts upon any subject are always surprising, new, and singular; and though he write for bread, could never be hired to disgrace the quill, or to wrong his conscience; and which crowns his panegyrick, he is a person of true courage. It is true, I have reason to think Daniel De Foe dares not quarrel with John Dunton; but I believe he fears nothing on earth but myself; and he says as much, in telling the world—"I adhere firmly to truth, and resolve to defend it against all extremities." ('Review,' vol. ii, No. 75.) He reviews without fear, and acts without fainting. He is not daunted with multitudes of enemies; for he faces as many, every Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, as there are foes to moderation and peace. Loyalty to the Queen is his guide, and resolution his companion; and a lawful occasion makes him truly brave. It was this sent him to Weymouth, Exeter, and Crediton, to preach peace and moderation to the high-flyers; and though they had not the manners to thank him, yet I hope to see them all on their knees for not listening to his wholesome doctrine—Peace! It is a dangerous experiment the Western Tackers could not approve of; and for that reason the Weymouth Gothams had fettered him, whipped him, and perhaps burnt him, had not his known courage, and great party of two men, set him above their malice. (See 'Review,' vol. ii, No. 75.) To sum up all—De Foe has piety enough for an author, and courage enough for a martyr. And, in a word, if ever any, Daniel De Foe is a True Englishman; and for that reason he is more respected by men of honour and sense than he can be affronted by Alderman B——, Justice S——, and the rest of the Western blockheads. Now, if such an author as this should attack my journal, I shall think there is reason for it, and will endeavour to answer him, and to speak the truth; it is pity this peace-making traveller should have any enemy but error, and such a weak assailant as John Dunton."

* The following extract from a letter to the Earl of Buchan, by De Foe, dated the 29th May, 1711, was communicated to Mr Chalmers, by his lordship's grandson. "The person with whom I endeavoured to plant the interest of your lordship's friend has been strangely taken up since I had that occasion; viz. first in suffering the operation of the surgeons to heal the wound of the assassin; and since, in accumulating honours from parliament, the Queen, and the people. On Thursday evening her majesty created him Earl Mortimer, Earl of Oxford, and Lord Harley of Wigmore; and we expect that to-morrow, in council, he will have the white staff given him by the Queen, and be declared Lord-Treasurer. I wrote this yesterday, and this day, May the 29th, he is made Lord High Treasurer of Great Britain, and carried the white staff before the Queen this morning to chapel."

De Foe's long continued absence from England, occasioned by the persecution of his creditors, produced a relaxation of his pen, which was less fertile in 1707 than in any year since the commencement of the reign. Besides his 'Review,' which furnished him with regular occupation, he does not appear to have printed anything, excepting the pamphlets upon Scotch affairs that have been already noticed. Being in Scotland during the whole of the year, he was busied in moderating the heat of parties, and in endeavouring to reconcile the disaffected to the union. Necessity led him also to pay some attention to his own affairs; but the resources upon which he drew for the support of himself and family remain unknown. It is not improbable that he may have received occasional presents from his friends in Scotland; and his publications must have turned to some account, particularly the 'Review,' the permanent sale of which would now justify a stated remuneration.

In the preface to the third volume of 'The Review,' he recounts some of the ill-treatment he had experienced. "I must confess," says he, "I have sometimes thought it very hard, that having voluntarily, and without the least direction, assistance, or encouragement, in spite of all that has been suggested, taken upon me the most necessary work of removing national prejudices against the two most capital blessings of the world—peace and union—I should have the disaster to see the nations receive the doctrine and defame the teacher. Should I descend to particulars, it would hardly appear credible, that in a Christian, a Protestant, and a reformed nation, any men could have received such treatment as I have done, even from those very people whose consciences and judgments have stooped to the venerable truth, and owned it useful and seasonable. It would make this preface a history to relate the reproaches, the insults, the contempt, with which these papers have been treated in discourse, writing, and print, even by those who say they are embarked in the same cause. The charge made against me of partiality, bribery, pensions, and payments; things, the circumstances, family, and fortunes of a man devoted to his country's peace, clears me of. If paid for writing, if hired, if employed, why still harassed by merciless and malicious men? Why pursued to all extremities by law for old accounts, of which other men are cleared every day? Why oppressed, distressed, and driven from his family, and from all prospects of delivering either them or himself? Is this the fate of men employed and hired? Is this the figure the agents of courts and princes make? Certainly, had I been employed or hired, those people that own the service would by this time have set their servant free from the little and implacable malice of litigious prosecutions, murdering warrants, and men whose mouths are to be stopped by trifles. Let this suffice, then, to clear me of all the little and scandalous charge of being hired and employed."

De Foe goes on to say, "I am not the first that has been stoned for speaking the truth; and cannot but think, that as time and the conviction of their senses will restore men to love the peace now established in this nation, so they will gradually see I have acted no part but that of a lover of my country, and an honest man; and so, in time, it may wear off: and though it be hard to be threatened, yet I cannot but support myself with the continual satisfaction of having contributed my mite towards the public peace."

In the course of the summer, De Foe fell under the frowns of the Swedish ambassador, the real ground of which has not been stated by any of his biographers. It has been usually referred to a passage published three years before in the 'Consolidator'; but the offence, as Mr Wilson shows, arose from some reflections in the 'Review,' the particulars of which are thus related by himself:—

"Great are the triumphs and rejoicings of a party of men, well enough known among us, at a certain piece of news, spread about by their news-writers long before it was true, and impudently dressed up with forgeries and additions by one of them since it was true, viz. That the Swedish ambassador has made a complaint against this paper. But I'll soon put a stop to their rejoicings, by exhibiting a true statement of the affair to the view of every impartial reader, and I doubt not to the satisfaction of the Swedish envoy also. What it is in particular that he has taken offence at, I am not yet informed." De Foe says that if he had used too great plainness of speech, or said anything unjust or untrue, he was willing to make reparation by a public acknowledgment, or submit to the laws of England.

The affair was a source of triumph to De Foe's enemies, who made much more of it than it really deserved. "Those who show so much particular satisfaction at the hopes they have entertained of my destruction by the prosecution of this paper," says he, "and with so much gust insult me upon that head, boast, because I am remote, that I am fled from justice, and make nothing of sending the Queen's messengers after me into Scotland. Impotent malice! How does it fly in the faces of its contrivers. The government need never be at the charge of a messenger to me: I am so fully convinced of the justice and mercy of her Majesty's government, that were I guilty of a much worse crime, I would on the least summons appear, and either frankly claim the first, or submit to and implore the last. And where am I, ye sons of unwearied slander, that you should suggest I am fled from justice? Am I concealed, or out of her Majesty's dominions? Now that the Union has opened the door, the nations protect no criminals against each other. Let us see your charge; let it be as public as your malice: I'll put in bail to answer all you can object, let it be what it will. But this is the course of the age; when nothing else can revenge their cause, they fly to that worst of murders—slander and reproach.

"But to the case in hand. With what pleasure am I insulted in this affair against the 'Review?' How have I been sent to Count Zober, and, bound hand and foot, surrendered to the Swedes? Alas, gentlemen, your prophecies of evil tidings are not yet come to pass! The liberty of Englishmen is in better case; no man can be punished here at the will of the prince, much less at the will of a foreign prince. In England, even the sovereign never punishes but by law; and a jury of equals must determine the fact. An Englishman is born a freeman; no power can insult him; no superior oppress him: this is the confidence and glory of our island. He that will abandon this liberty, is not a fool only, but a knave; a knave to himself, to his family, to his posterity, and to the constitution. Let none of my friends be afraid for me ; if I have broken the law, they ought to abandon me to the law, and I ask no favour. If I have not, no king, no threatening, no, not all the powers of Europe, can make her Majesty break in upon her people's liberties, or deviate from justice ; in the satisfaction of which all her subjects are easy and safe, and I among the rest."*

The article complained of is to be found in No. 66 of the 'Review,' which contains some speculations upon the policy of the Swedish monarch, delivered hypothetically, and couched in language which any political writer might use without offence. De Foe regards the King of Sweden, the celebrated Charles XII, as holding the balance of power in Europe, and capable of turning the scale in whichever way his policy directed. Of his future projects, he considers it altogether in vain to form a conjecture ; and leaves it to time alone to develop the reasons of his mysterious conduct. He speaks of him as a brave and warlike prince, and the article may be considered rather complimentary than otherwise. It is probable that the ambassador was prompted by some enemy of De Foe to attack his paper ; but whoever he was, he betrayed a want of judgment equal to his malice, as the article in question furnished no ground for any public notice. The government appears to have been of this mind, as the application was not listened to ; and the explanation of De Foe probably satisfied the ambassador.

Whilst De Foe was engaged in promoting the Union, and even long after it had taken place, the calumny of enemies was at work in impeaching his motives, and undervaluing his services. In his 'Review' for September 2d, he writes thus : " I have for a long time patiently borne with the scurrilous prints, and scandalous reproaches of the streets, concerning my being in Scotland. To-day I am sent thither by one party, tomorrow by another ; this time by one particular person, that by a body of people ; by some one way, by others another ; and I have long waited to see if, out of innumerable guesses, they would at last make a discovery of the true, and to me, melancholy reason of settling myself in a remote corner of the world ; which, if they had done, I should, no question, have been insulted enough upon that head. But, since their guesses have too much party malice in them to be right, though there are five or six persons in London, who can not only give a true account of my removal, but recal me from this banishment, if they had humanity in them a degree less than an African lion, I therefore cannot but take up a little room in these papers about my own case. There are two sorts of people out of reach by the world ; those that are above, and those that are below it : and they may be equally happy for aught I know. Of the last sort I reckon myself, and declare, that as I am below their envy, so I seek not their pity. I am, I bless God, secure in my retreat from their fury, and am fully revenged of the world by despising all the contempt it can throw upon me.

" But I come to the censures of the world. ' An underspur-leather,' says one, ' sent down to Scotland to make the Union, to write for it, and the like.' Angry man ! Not purely that I am employed, as he calls it, but that he is not. Another says I was hired by the court to write as I was told ; which excellent stuff answers itself." Of Leslie, who attacked him in the 'Rehearsal,' he says, in his humorous way, " He has got me a new commission from the Presbyterians : I hope in a few days I may have it down by the post, with directions where to send for my salary ; for I assure him, it cannot but be very welcome at this distance." Speaking of his book, called 'The Short Way,' lately published, Leslie had said, " It is wrote by a remarkable agent of the Presbyterians in England, who has long been employed by them as their public vindicator here, which he still continues ; and he was sent down by them the last winter into Scotland, to manage their concerns as to the Union there ; where he stayed a long time, and performs the part of their vindicator to their brethren in Scotland.”*

In reply to these charges, De Foe says, “ How shall I do to reconcile the three opinions ? One says, I am sent by particular persons, another by the court, and a third by the Presbyterians. I wish it had been first of all true that I was sent by anybody ; for the work is so just, so good, and so honourable, I need neither be ashamed of the message nor the sender. But I think the same answer would be very fit to give to these carping, querulous gentlemen, as honest Samuel Colvil, the famous Scottish Hudibras, gave, when he was complaining of the abuses of those that railed on him about his poetry : ‘ They say that I am bad poet, but I answer in few words, that’s true, and yet they are liars, because they aver in malice, not knowing whether it be true or false.’† Now,” adds De Foe, “ though it were true that I was sent by this or that man or party, I may say, with Sam. Colvil, none of you can know whether it be true or false. But since you have been so free with me about my being sent, let me tell you and all the world something in which I am persuaded you will be of my side. If I have been sent hither, as you say, I have been most barbarously treated ; for I profess solemnly, I have not yet had one penny of my wages, nor the least consideration for the time set apart in this service ; nor, had I had the good fortune to have my brains knocked out by the high-flying mob here, do I see any prospect of having been canonized as a martyr for the cause, or of having my name inserted in the Presbyterian Kalendar. The utmost I expect is what I have before met with. What business had he with it ? What had he to do there ? Who sent him ? and the like.” Addressing the Presbyterians, he asks, “ Is not this hard, now, gentlemen, that I should have the testimony of your enemies that I have been serviceable to your cause, and none from yourselves ? Pray consider of it, and either discharge yourselves honourably to your poor missionary in the North, or let these fellows know they are a gang of liars, and you know nothing of the matter. Indeed, it is very hard, and I hope the Presbyterians will consider of it, that I should be sent down by them to manage their affairs, having been long before employed by them as their public vindicator in England, and yet have not received one farthing salary. I think they have done me a great deal of wrong, and ’tis but small encouragement to anybody to enter into their service. But to leave jesting, I would desire Mr Rehearsal, in order to preserve the common decency of language, to prove things as he goes on ; and I fairly challenge him to prove one tittle of what he positively affirms. If he cannot do this, let the world judge to what purpose it would be to enter upon a debate with a man who makes a positive charge, but brings no proof of the fact.”‡

In reply to the charge of writing for the court, he says, “ If I have espoused a wrong cause ; if I have acted in a good cause in an unfair manner ; if I have, for fear, favour, or by the bias of any man in the world, great or small, acted against what I always professed, or what is the known interest of the nation ; if I have any way abandoned that glorious principle of truth and liberty, which I ever was embarked in, and which I trust I shall never, through fear or hope, step one inch back from ; if I have done thus, then, as Job says, in another case, ‘ Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockles instead of barley ;’ then, and not till then, may I be esteemed a mercenary, a missionary, or spy, or what you please. But, if the cause be just, if it be the peace, security, and happiness of both nations ; if I have done it honestly, and effectually, how does it alter the case if I have been fairly encouraged, supported, and rewarded in the work, as God knows I have not ? Does the mission disable the messenger, or does it depend upon the merit of the message ? Cease your inquiry then, about my being sent by this or that person or party, till you can agree who it is, when I shall be glad of an opportunity to own it, as I see no cause to be ashamed of the errand."

Pursuing his manly vindication, De Foe thus replies to another charge: "Oh, but 'tis a scandalous employment to write for bread! The worse for him, gentlemen, that he should take so much pains, run so many risks, make himself so many enemies, and expose himself to so much scurrilous treatment for bread, and not get it neither. Assure yourselves, had not Providence found out other and unlooked-for supplies by mere wonders of goodness, you had long ago had the desire of your hearts, to starve him out of this employment. But, after all, suppose you say true, that all I do is for bread, which I assure you is very false, what are all the employments in the world pursued for, but for bread? But, though it has been quite otherwise in my case, I am easy, and can depend upon that promise, 'Thy bread shall be given thee, and thy waters shall be sure.' I have espoused an honest interest, and have steadily adhered to it all my days: I never forsook it when it was oppressed, I never made a gain by it when it was advanced; and I thank God it is not in the power of all the courts and parties in Christendom to bid a price high enough to buy me off from it, or make me desert it."

CHAPTER XIII.

EARLY in the month of January, 1708, De Foe returned to London, after an absence in Scotland of about sixteen months. He seems to have been anxious to obtain a settlement of his affairs; and his negotiations with his creditors held out a prospect of success. Being now at the head-quarters of the parties contending for power, he could not avoid being involved in their disputes; and of the various subjects that engaged his attention the reader will be informed in the sequel.

For his services in Scotland and elsewhere, the ministers now rewarded him with an appointment, with a fixed salary; but the nature of it is not mentioned. It was obtained for him by the intervention of Harley, and continued to him after the fall of that minister. As his name does not stand in the red book of Queen Anne, Mr Chalmers was induced to think it was a pension rather than a place; but he speaks of it himself as an appointment, which seems to denote a place. It was probably a sinecure that did not require a personal attendance, as may be gathered from his long and frequent absences; and it must have been one that did not demand the sacramental test, which De Foe always objected to. During the ministry of Lord Godolphin, after the retirement of Harley, his salary fell into arrears, perhaps in consequence of his long absence in Scotland; and notwithstanding his interest with the succeeding ministry, it does not appear that his claims were ever liquidated.

Upon the secession of Harley, which took place in February, 1708, De Foe not unnaturally conceived that his political prospects were at an end with the fall of his patron; but he was treated with the highest generosity by both Harley and his successor. When he waited upon the former, the ex-minister magnanimously advised him to continue his service to the Queen, which he supposed would have no relation to personal differences among statesmen. Godolphin received him with equal kindness, saying, "I always think a man honest till I find to the contrary." And if we may credit De Foe's assertions, in the presence of those who could have convicted him of falsehood, he for three years held a correspondence with his former benefactor, which the great man in power never took ill of him.

In the early part of the year government received intelligence of some hostile preparations at Dunkirk, which had for their object the invasion of Scotland. The French king, disheartened by his losses on the continent, thought that such a diversion, headed by the Pretender, might have a favourable influence on his affairs; and the opposition which the Scots had so lately offered to the union, induced him to reckon too hastily upon their assistance. In the month of March, accordingly, Admiral Fourbin appeared with a French fleet and army off the Firth of Forth; but finding an English army ready to receive him, he steered his course to the north of Scotland, where an immediate insurrection was expected. But in this also he was disappointed; for a storm arising he was driven to sea, and after braving the element for about a month, he was glad to return to Dunkirk, with the loss of one ship, and about four thousand men. De Foe was so satisfied of the loyalty of the Scots, that he had no apprehension of the result, even should a landing be effected. He thought they had been sufficiently surfeited by the tyranny of the late times, to set at rest any doubt on the subject; and he recommended that a reward should be issued for the apprehension of the Pretender. He adds, "Let but forty or fifty of the chief heads of clans and known Jacobites be secured, and he may come when he pleases; he'll meet with but cold entertainment in the north of Britain, in spite of all the imaginary discontents which are suggested by us of that people, of whom we are very forward to be scandalously abusive."*

The loyalty of the Scots having been brought into question in England, upon account of their refusing the abjuration oath, De Foe, who from a long residence amongst them was well acquainted with their sentiments, pleads their defence in the following passage: "The scruples raised among the Scots-Presbyterians, against the abjuration, is not from any inclination they have to the popish Pretender, or any aversion to the present government; but from such circumstances in it as seem to shock their consciences, in that they may come into such a condition as may make it impossible to keep it."† He therefore urges the government not to press it upon them, as a matter of policy. Grateful for the favours he had received from the Scots, and stimulated by his preference for their church establishment, he rejoices in every opportunity of doing honour to their nation. "I speak it with boasting," says he, "no man has concerned himself more than the author of this paper to clear up the suspicions entertained among us in England of the Presbyterians in Scotland joining with the French and falling in with the Jacobite interest."‡

In the midst of the general alarm at the prospect of an invasion De Foe published a short tract, entitled 'The Union Proverb;' viz. :—

' If Skiddaw has a cap,
Scruffell wots full well of that.'

Setting forth, "I. The necessity of uniting. II. The good consequences of uniting. III. The happy union of England and Scotland in case of a foreign invasion. 1708." In a prefatory address De Foe gives the following explanation of the proverb from Mr Ray. "Skiddaw and Scruffell are two neighbouring hills, or high mountains; the one in Cumberland, in England; the other in Annandale, in Scotland: and if the former happens at any time to be capped with clouds or foggy mists, it will not be long ere rain or the like falls on the latter. It is also spoken of such who must expect to sympathize in their sufferings, by reason of the vicinity of their habitations." Our author, thinking the proverb would bear a moral and political accommodation, applies it to the union of the two kingdoms.

The return De Foe met with for his labours as a peace-maker gave him but small encouragement in his office. "The author of this paper," says he, "is very unhappy in the difficulty he finds to make truth please; and though he has endeavoured to pursue it without respect to persons or parties, yet he cannot but regret the failure. I know," continues he, "this age hates to be instructed, and the saying of the elders to the blind man is in the mouth of all self-wise people—'Dost thou teach us?' From this temper flows the constant want of manners, false construction, slander and ill language with which your humble servant is always treated, instead of argument, by all those that are concerned in the guilt, and at any time pinched with the application. If I speak plain truth, then he is an impudent fellow, a bully, and an incendiary; if I speak soft things, then he is a flatterer, a parasite, &c. How many satires had I levelled at me for a poem called 'A Hymn to Victory,' only because it paid some respect to the Duke of Marlborough and the Queen? Again, when I speak of the public affairs, if I do not rail as others do, I am a coward, and afraid of new prosecutions. If I speak against things, I am turning my tail and going over to the enemy; the high church has bought me off; and if I speak for the public affairs, then I am bribed, employed, and paid for it, and a mere mercenary. And what shall a poor author do in all this? I'll tell you what I do: I go on freely with telling you offensive truths, regarding no censures, and fearing no prosecutions; but at more hazard than some of you would run to save a father, I prompt you to see the things that belong to your peace. 'Rehearsals' rave, 'Observers' bully me, and the high church vote me to the devil, every paper they read. And what is the matter, but because I tell you that in all your proceedings high-flying extremes will be your destruction, and principles of peace can alone secure us? But, whether you will hear, or whether you will forbear, 'tis a sad truth, that all the mischiefs which have befallen any party of men amongst us have been from their own precipitations."

In the early part of the spring De Foe made a journey to Scotland, for what purpose is not known. He was there in the beginning of April, soon after the commitment of the Scottish prisoners, and paid a visit to Lord Belhaven. Our author's journey was probably upon some public account, but he did not stay long in Scotland, as we find him soon afterwards actively concerned in the parliamentary elections in his own country.

The first parliament of Great Britain was dissolved by proclamation on the 15th of April; after which the country was busily occupied in the new elections. Upon this occasion De Foe earnestly exhorts the electors not to choose high-flyers, "who are the declared enemies of the present constitution;" nor to betray their country for the sake of gratifying a sordid appetite. He remonstrates, in strong language, against the continued practice of bribery, which placed the liberties of the country at the mercy of those who have the longest purse. "He that will buy the country to choose him, will sell the country when he is chosen;" he therefore recommends them to elect their representatives free of expense; "for men who in conscience cannot bribe will serve you impartially when chosen."* De Foe justly observes that "railing at courts makes no patriot;" and that we are rather to estimate a man upon his tried principles and known character.

During this busy season De Foe took a journey into the country to observe the state of political parties, and animate the friends of liberty wherever he could interpose his influence. He tells us he was present himself at many of the elections, and observed, with shame and regret, the mode in which they were conducted. "I have not," says he, "so far sat still at the coffee-houses all this summer, as some of you have done, forming elections, telling noses, and casting up parties over a dish of coffee; but I have been among a great many of your electors myself. I have been an eye-witness to many of the most fulsome and loathsome stories I have told you ; I have seen the possibility, aye, and too much the practice, of men's voting implicitly, here for ale, there for influence, here again for parties, and there by persuasion. And, God knows, I speak it with regret for you all, and for your posterity, it is not an impossible thing to debauch this nation into a choice of thieves, knaves, devils, or anything, comparatively speaking, by the power of various intoxications. Having seen and heard so much of your follies, and knowing the consequences, I think myself justified before God and man to tell you, that so far as these practices are allowed by you, so far you are ruining your country, and selling your liberties to French and Jacobite tyranny. And, far be it from me to fear the resentment of any power, be it never so great, in a truth so plain and significant as this. I tell you again, if you have chosen high-flyers and Tories, abjuration-taking Jacobites, such as I have been describing, you have sold your nation, your birthright, your children, to a pack of thieves, and sacrificed the liberty and religion of Britain to your sordid, debauched luxury and covetousness."* Our author finely exposes the inconsistency of some modern Whigs, in voting for Tory candidates, thus dividing their interests and electing their own destroyers. "Oh, Whigs, Whigs, are these the politics your enemies charge you with? Catch a Tory voting for a Whig? Where can you find that fool to his party? The devil's votaries are always true to their master ; and the children of this world wiser in their generation than the children of light."

* De Foe illustrates his remark by the following story:—"William Rufus having an abbey to bestow, several of the clergy, knowing the King to be covetous, bid large sums for the place. The King, seeing a monk stand by who offered nothing,—'And what wilt thou give for this abbey?' 'Indeed, not one penny,' says the monk, 'for it is against my conscience.'—'Then,' says the King, 'thou art the fittest man to be abbot,' and so gave him the abbey immediately."—'Review,' v. 117.

From the temper of the times, De Foe had strong apprehensions of the ascendancy of Tory influence ; and, in a strain of pointed irony, he lays open to the electors the consequences to be expected from such an event. "They can give away nothing," says he, "but our money ; they can overthrow nothing but our constitution ; they can overset nothing but the succession and the union ; they can sell nothing but our liberties ; and what then ? We shall do as well as our neighbours, who never knew what those toys and trifles of law, liberty, or property, meant ; and yet they sing and dance, and are as merry as other people, though they have not so much gear. Who knows but this may be the 'Shortest Way' to a general deliverance ? for, as has been noted, nothing opens our eyes in this age like precipitations. Now, if you will but choose these honest sort of folk into parliament, they will confirm all your melancholy reflections ; and the scheme of management being swallowed up to a due height, you shall soon come to a perfection of your endeavours—a Tory parliament, a Tory ministry, a Tory peace, a Tory successor, and hey ! boys, up go we ! The revolution, the succession, the union, the toleration, shall all receive their due regulations, and this nation shall arrive at its immediate state of bliss—'THE SHORTEST WAY.'"

De Foe knew well enough that all the pseudo-patriotic outcry against the ministers was to get them turned out, that the high-flyers might occupy their places. He intimates that many engines were at work for its accomplishment, and cautions his countrymen not to be led astray by the arts that were employed to seduce them. "If our united interest," says he, "is little enough to keep this vigilant party out ; if court Whig, and country Whig, and all sorts of Whigs, are few enough to make up the bank, and keep out the flood of high-flying invasions, then a caution to the friends of this settlement, to unite and keep together, and shun all dividing breaches, is both necessary and reasonable. And while I think it the duty of every man that respects his country's interest to assist in so good a work, I cannot but discharge my part by pressing it in the most earnest terms."†

Amidst his labours in the cause of peace and liberty, the privacy of De Foe was often interrupted by threatening and abusive letters, most of them anonymous, or with fictitious names. In the month of May he writes thus:—"I received a letter signed with my own name, a counterfeit no doubt; for I am fully satisfied no man owns the name justly, nor does any man covet to be called after the unfortunate. However, as I am not ashamed of the name, and hope I have no reason, I am content to be mocked at the pleasure of the party; but let them take this by the way, that though I am not ashamed of the relation of any honest man, yet I should be heartily ashamed of being related to any man, however great, who had so far degenerated from justice and honour as to own the principles in that letter, and who flies in the face of the late king, the present constitution, the Queen, the succession, and all the united building of Britain's present government." A little further, he observes, "We have cause to bless God, in this age, that we live under a government whose actions will bear the light, and is best pleased when its proceedings are placed in an impartial view. Heretofore, misrepresentations and false lights have been the practice of our courts and the grievance of the subject; now the case alters, and we find it the practice of the subject, and the grievance of the court."*

In the month of June De Foe made another journey to Scotland, being employed upon a secret mission, the object of which remains unknown. The silence he observes upon such occasions is creditable to his prudence and judgment; and we may easily trust him that it involved nothing that was dishonourable, or we should probably have heard of it from his enemies. He continued several months in the north, and seems to have given full satisfaction to his employers. For this he appealed long afterwards to the Duke of Marlborough.

These repeated visits to Scotland, we may easily collect, were not disagreeable to De Foe, who had contracted an affection for the Scots, as well from gratitude for favours received as from a zealous attachment to their religion. To the piety and hospitality of their nation he is always proud to do honour; and the only return he could offer for their civilities was to celebrate their virtues and defend them from the reproaches of their enemies. As a public advocate, when their religion or their liberties were attacked, the Scots, perhaps, had not a more zealous and sincere friend amongst the English.

During all his visits to Scotland his active mind appears to have been busily engaged in gathering stores of information concerning the history and condition of that country; neither of which subjects had, up to that period, attracted, comparatively speaking, any considerable portion of attention from the people of the sister kingdom. De Foe, in his quality of a sincere and zealous dissenter from the Church of England, was attracted, not repelled, by most of those circumstances of national faith and manners which were disagreeable to the English writers who had hitherto treated of the affairs of Scotland; and so, without doing any violence to his own feelings, he laboured effectually by his representations to remove the barriers of antipathy between the nations. He seems to have made diligent journeys over most parts of the northern kingdom, and has left, in his Tour, a picture of her then state which cannot be perused without the highest interest by those who are acquainted with the face of Scotland now. Her institutions, civil and religious, he has described with all the fulness of partiality—her cities and palaces graphically and distinctly.

Whilst De Foe was in Scotland he had ample opportunities for becoming acquainted with the state of religious parties in that part of the kingdom; and the case of the episcopal Dissenters occupying much of the public attention, he discussed the subject at large in his 'Reviews.' After tracing the origin of that party, its struggles for power, and the various acts of the government to keep it in subjection, he proceeds to consider the merits of the complaints that were then urged against the Presbyterian church.

* 'Review,' v. 95.

The episcopal clergy having made known their alleged grievances to the world in a work entitled 'A Narrative of the late Treatment of Episcopal Ministers in the City of Edinburgh,' &c., the object of which is to prefer the charges of injustice and cruelty against the Presbyterians, De Foe replied to it in 'The Scots' Narrative Examined, or, the Case of the Episcopal Ministers in Scotland stated, and the late Treatment of them in the City of Edinburgh inquired into,' which seems to contain a faithful account of the matters referred to in the title.

As soon as the union with Scotland was completed, De Foe had announced his intention of presenting the world with a complete history of that most important transaction. Various engagements prevented him from fulfilling his design until 1709, when the first edition was published in Edinburgh under the following title :—'The History of the Union of Great Britain. Edinburgh.' The work seems to have been noticed but little when it first appeared, for, as the preface states, it had many difficulties in the way, many factions to encounter, and parties to please ; yet it was re-published in 1712, and a third time in 1786, when a similar union had become the topic of public debate and private conversation. De Foe prefixed two dedications to the work ; one to the Queen, the other to the Duke of Queensberry, Secretary of State for Scotland. In such complimentary effusions he excelled. Dryden and his contemporaries had brought dedications into disgrace by the fulsomeness of their flattery and the servility of their style. The dedications of the present day have absurdly run into the contrary extreme. But the writers who are permitted to dedicate their works to royal patrons ought to peruse De Foe's dedicatory epistles to King William and Queen Anne ; wherein they will find dignity of sentiment and delicacy of praise, conveyed in language at once delicate and instructive. His dedications to the 'History of the Union of Great Britain,' would alone justify this remark.

The minuteness with which he describes what he saw and heard on the turbulent stage, where he acted a conspicuous part, is extremely interesting to us, who wish to know what actually passed, however this circumstantiality may have disgusted contemporaneous readers. History is chiefly valuable as it transmits a faithful copy of the manners and sentiments of every age. This narrative of De Foe is a drama, in which he introduces the highest peers and the lowest peasants, speaking and acting according as they were each actuated by their characteristic passions ; and while the man of taste is amused by his manner, the man of business may draw instruction from the documents which are appended to the end and interspersed in every page. This publication had alone preserved his name had his 'Crusoe' pleased us less. "De Foe's 'Union between England and Scotland,'" says Mr Dibdin, "first published in 1709, and more recently with valuable additions by Mr George Chalmers, is really a performance to place the author amongst the soundest historians of the day."

Towards the end of 1709 an event occurred which fully justified all that De Foe had written concerning the temper and views of the high party, and which involved the most important consequences to the nation. Upon the 5th of November Dr Sacheverell preached his far-famed sermon at St Paul's, before the city magistracy, upon the perils of false brethren, wherein, to use De Foe's words, "having plentifully railed at and anathematized the Dissenters, and left them in custody, without bail or mainprize, with the devil and his angels, he particularly asserts two things :—1. The doctrine of passive obedience, which he most remarkably justifies from the late revolution. 2. The hereditary right of her present Majesty to the crown." The political tenets advanced by this pulpit incendiary had been answered over and over again by our author in his replies to Leslie and the whole race of non-jurors ; so that, in compiling this production, he did no more than repeat his former arguments. Still, both in his 'Review' and in several separate tracts, he exerted his powerful talents in the suppression of this factious demagogue and his frantic followers, an account of whose outrageous proceedings will be found elsewhere. The titles of his tracts are, 'The New Wonder, or a Trip to St Paul's,' by the author of the 'True Born Englishman;' 'A Letter from Captain Tom to the Mob now raised by Dr Sacheverell;' and 'Instructions from Rome' in favour of the Pretender, inscribed to the most elevated Don Sacheverellio and his brother Don Higginisco.

About this time, one Cooper, a Yorkshire clergyman of loose morals, contrived to introduce himself to the notice of Lord Wharton; and by avowing the same political opinions as his lordship, hoped to secure his favour, and by that method to procure some preferment in the church. As the man was a stranger to that noble lord, who seems to have been imposed upon by his representations, De Foe, who had become acquainted with his real character, was desirous of undeceiving him upon this point, as well as to spare the church the disgrace of so unholy a pastor. In pursuance of these laudable motives, he transmitted a private letter to Lord Wharton, to whom he appears to have been hitherto unknown. The effect of this communication cannot now be told; but the letter, for which the public, through the medium of Mr Wilson, is indebted to Mr Upcott of the London Institution, is as follows:—

"My Lord,—As this is written from a sincere principle of duty, and respect to your L^dpp. and just concern for that honest cause your L^dpp. is so heartily embarked in, I hope your L^dpp. will pardon the forwardness and presumption of the attempt, tho' you should not accept of y^e hint. I am not going to offer to yo^r L^dpp. any thing that wants proof, or that shuns sufficient inquiry. I should not have insulted a person of yo^r L^dpp's. character in that manner. The design is not to speak in y^e dark, but to assist truth to come into y^e light, and offer something to y^r L^dpp. for y^r L^dpp's. farther and pticular enquiry and services, and therefore, my Lord, I shall neither conceal from yo^r L^dpp. the story, nor who it is that writes it.

"I have, my Lord, repeated importunitys from some people in y^e north, men of honesty and friends to y^r L^dpp's. interest, to acquaint y^r L^dpp. of the following affair. Their only mistake is that they suppose I have y^e honor to be known to y^r L^dpp., which is their error as it is my misfortune, and my not having that honour is the occasion of my making so much preamble to y^r L^dpp. contrary to my custom in y^e world, and for w^{ch} I ask y^r L^dpp's. pardon. The story is this:—

"There is one Cooper, a Clergy Man of or near Leeds, who, if Fame sayes true, is now, or has been lately, applying himself to y^r L^dpp. either to be entertained in y^r L^dpp's. service, or to obtain y^r L^dpp's. favour and recommendation to some living, or some other way to be employ'd or advanced by y^r L^dpp.; and pticularly, it is alledged that he gets himself recommended to y^r L^dpp. as a Low Churchman or a moderate man, and as persecuted and turn'd out by the Vicar on account of his moderation, &c.

"Now, my Lord, the business of this Letter is to giv yo^r L^dpp. a true acco^t of y^e morals and manners of this man, that yo^r L^dpp. may be inform'd from unquestioned authority what kind of person he is, and nobody then questions but y^r L^dpp. knows what measures to take either that y^e church may not be ill served and further reproach^t, or y^r L^dpp's. recommendacon dishonour'd by the most scandalous person alive.

"And my Lord, that yo^r L^dpp. may not depend upon my single authority, I shall give y^r L^dpp. his brief character in the words I rec^d it, and the psons. shall at any time be produced for yo^r L^dpp's. farther satisfaccon.

"From Leeds, March 22.—This scandalous priest his name is Cooper, he was seen in y^e very act, debauching a woman on a Sunday morning, and pticularly, being to administer y^e Sacrament the same day, and did also actually administer y^e Sacram^t in our church that same day (called y^e old Church in Leeds). Perjury in several cases can be proved against him, and that in severall places he has been discarded as a common drunkard, and for his being a common swearer our whole town will witness it. For these crymes our Vicar turn'd him out, and deny'd him his pulpit, upon which he is fled to my L^d Wharton for preferm^t, and we are told my Lord has given him hope of a liveing, &c.'

"Thus far my author. There is more in my Letter, but I presume this is enough to prevent yo^r L^dpp. being imposed upon—and this I thought it my duty to lay before y^r L^dpp. If your L^dpp. please to hear any more, or that I should make farther enquiry about it, in that, or any thing else for y^r L^dpp's. service, I shall esteem it my hono^r to receive y^r L^dpp's. comands.

"I am, may it please yo^r L^dpp.

"Yo^r L^dpp's. most humble and obedient Serv^t,

"From Newington, near Hackney,

"DE FOE."

"Apr 7th, 1710."

De Foe, who seems to have had his eyes everywhere, was not unacquainted with the low state of morals amongst the Yorkshire clergy. In order to awaken the people, and especially the holders of church patronage, to the propriety of decorum in their teachers, he announced the following squib in his 'Review' for January 14, 1710 :—"Just published, 'The Northern Worthies: Or a Visitation of the Yorkshire Clergy;' a Satire humbly dedicated to Parson Plaxton, the Reverend Author of the Yorkshire Racers. To be bought where it is to be sold, and to be sold where it is to be bought: Written for the edification of the Northern Gentry, and to cure them of the Contagion of Priestcraft. In five volumes in Folio. Price 5*l*. 7*s*. 6*d*., being a very voluminous work."

In August, 1710, Godolphin was in his turn manœuvred out of office by Harley, with the assistance of Mrs Masham. "The unhappy Queen," says Cunningham, "tired out with the wrangling of scolding women, seduced by the chattering of her physicians, and withal moved with compassion for her brother, having inquired into the strength of parties, not only began to change her ministers, but her measures also." The Earl of Sunderland had been replaced by Lord Dartmouth; and the other ministers being now removed, Harley was put into the Treasury, and made Chancellor of the Exchequer; Mr St John, Secretary of State, in the room of Mr Boyle; the Earl of Rochester, President of the Council; and Sir Simon Harcourt, Keeper of the Great Seal. The Lieutenancy in London and other places was also changed; and as the new ministers were suspected of being hostile to the Protestant succession, it was further confirmed by some appointments in favour of persons who were declared friends of the Pretender. "Mr Harley, to whom it was natural to give fair words to everybody, gained upon many people by his address, who were far from being of his sentiments. He judged it most prudent to proceed with moderation; and it is said, he persuaded his friends, and the Queen herself, to dissemble many things concerning the Pretender on account of the Duke of Marlborough's forces, and his extraordinary power both at home and abroad. He was also afraid of the authority and inconstancy of the parliament. The Tories therefore resolved that the present parliament should be dissolved, and another called. Mr Harley, who had formed his whole scheme, gave many instructions to divers men of different parties how to reconcile the minds of people to him, and to render them subservient to his measures. Many were inquisitive to know his design; nay, some said he had no design at all, or else, that it was most artfully concealed, lest, by the dissent of any one, the whole combination should be broken. Those who are supposed to know him thoroughly, own that he was averse to the Pretender; but if we may judge of him by his actions, men of all parties agreed in concluding that his designs were in his favour; and it is certain that he affected to have it thought so." As the writer here quoted was well acquainted with Harley, he may be considered a competent judge of his character, as far as the mystery with which it was encircled would allow.

About this time, Hoadley, the celebrated Whig churchman, attacked the Tories in disguise; and under the semblance of a friend to the party, dealt out some severe censures upon its proceedings. His tract is entitled, 'The Thoughts of an Honest Tory upon the present Proceedings of that Party. In a Letter to a Friend in Town. Lond. 1710.' This produced an answer in a similar disguise, called, 'The Thoughts of an Honest Whig upon the present Proceedings of that Party. In a Letter to a Friend in Town. Lond. 1710.' In the last work, De Foe is held up to censure for writing the 'Experiment,' and is loaded with the same reproaches that the Tories had been long dealing out to him. The stale charge of his being supported by the Whigs is brought forward, and an attempt is made to disparage the political doctrines he had long defended in his 'Reviews.' He was also attacked at this time in a libel levelled at Burnet, and called, 'The No Church Catechism;' in which he is made to keep good company. To the question put to the bishop, "What Canons are the support of your Opinions?" The answer is, "None but two great blunderbusses—the sweetening 'Review' and souring 'Observer,' the mouths of cozenage. This of contradiction; that, general of all corrupt principles and guardian of the good old cause." It was a cause, however, of which neither of the writers had any need to be ashamed.

The recent turn of public affairs had given a shock to credit that was as embarrassing to the ministers as it was injurious to all parties. Discouraging as were the prospects of De Foe, he was not for sacrificing his country to the interests of party, and was therefore averse to any measure of annoyance that involved so serious a thing as public credit. That his motives might not be mistaken, he says, "I believe no man will deny, that this is the most critical time for any man that writes of public affairs. I know but one man in the world so qualified; and find him where you will, this must be his character:—He must be one that, searching into the depths of truth, dare speak her aloud in the most dangerous times; that fears no faces, courts no favours, is subject to no interest, bigotted to no party, and will be a hypocrite for no gain. I will not say I am the man; I leave that to posterity. If I have had any friends, it is amongst those that turned out; and if I had the power to lead, perhaps, I should bring them all in again. If Tories, Jacobites, High-flyers, and madmen are to come in, I am against them. I ask them no favour, I make no court to them, nor am I going about to please them; and yet I expect not to oblige those that I think the best of." De Foe here remonstrates with the Whigs for giving in to the national panic, by withdrawing their property from the funds whilst in a state of depression, and thus enriching the Tories at their own expense. This was the more unwise, as the bulk of the stock was in their hands, and by contributing to a further depression, they assisted in their own impoverishment."*

Our author exhorts the Whigs to support the national credit by an appeal to their public spirit. "Let the public affairs go into what hands they will," says he, "your concern for the nation must not lessen; nor must you do anything that may let in a bloody, Popish, and faithless tyrant upon Europe and upon the Protestant interest. I should be very sorry to see a Tory administration, and the old game of persecution revived among us; to see the toleration broken, the union invaded, the Whigs trampled upon, and the dissenters harassed and plundered as I have seen them; but if it must come to that hard choice, I had rather see all this than France triumphant, the Queen dethroned, and the Pretender and Popery established. In short, we have but one interest as Englishmen, whatever interest we may have as to parties. And, though I abhor the tyrannical principles of some men among us, yet when it comes to this,—England or France, the Queen or the Pretender, the Church of England or the Church of Rome, the choice is easy to an honest man." In these sentiments, no one will doubt that De Foe uttered the language of good sense, and of genuine patriotism.

It was the opinion of De Foe, that let the ministry be who or what they may, neither we nor they ought to do anything, by way of party-disgust, that may endanger the public safety. In support of this principle he now published a pamphlet, entitled 'An Essay upon Public Credit; being an Inquiry how the Public Credit comes to depend upon the Change of Ministry, or the Dissolutions of Parliaments; and whether it does so or no? London: 1710;' the main object of which is to show, that national credit depends not upon any set of ministers, but may remain safe under all changes, provided the government maintains its character for probity. The work is dexterously written, and calculated to serve the new ministers, although without that ostensible design.

The success which attended the foregoing treatise, induced the author to follow it up soon afterwards by 'An Essay upon Loans; or an Argument proving that substantial Funds settled by Parliament, with the Encouragement of Interests, and the Advances of Prompt Payment usually allowed, will bring in Loans of Money to the Exchequer, in spite of all the Conspiracies of Parties to the Contrary. London: 1710;' the object of which was to dispel the alarm which still continued in consequence of the backwardness of the Whigs to invest their money in government securities.

Upon the subject of the addresses manufactured by the high church party, preparatory to the change in the ministry, De Foe now published 'A new Test of the Sense of the Nation: being a modest Comparison between the Addresses to the late King James and those to her present Majesty, in order to observe how far the Sense of the Nation may be judged by either of them. 1710;' a work which, by a most unaccountable oversight, has been frequently confounded with Oldmixon's 'Collection of the Addresses that have been presented to the Queen since the impeachment of Dr Henry Sacheverell,' to which mass of nonsense De Foe's work was intended as an antidote, and a most effectual one it is.

Upon the secession of Godolphin, our author waited upon the ex-minister, who obligingly said to him that he had the same good will but not the same power to assist him, and advised him to receive her Majesty's commands from her present confidential advisers when things were settled. Our author's political feelings at this period he himself thus describes:—"I believe everybody that knows me, or has read what I have written on the subject, will know that I have been no friend to the high-church party. I ever did, and still do look upon them to be enemies to the nation's peace, destroyers of all the blessings we hope for, and disturbers of all we possess; and that the principles these gentlemen pursue, are in their own nature destructive to the liberties of the nation. God knows, I have no personal malice towards any man; but I abhor the principles of slavery, let them come from, or be professed by, whom they will." Prudence now dictated greater caution in his writings. "I have as little need to embroil myself with the government," says he, "and am in as ill a case to defend myself against resentment as any; and therefore, though I shall speak that truth I think myself obliged to speak with as little fear as anybody, yet I shall endeavour to lay it open to as few exceptions as possible." *

Considering the circumstances of the country, particularly with respect to our foreign relations, De Foe thought that the new ministers would be obliged to pursue the policy of their predecessors. Harley, the chief minister, he knew to be most inclined to the Whigs, and he therefore exults in the idea, that although the Whigs had lost by the accession of the Tories, yet the latter had gained nothing in point of strength; the fallacy of which notion he lived to see strongly verified. "The constitution," says he, "is of such a nature, that whoever may be in it, if they are faithful to their duty, it will either find them Whigs, or make them so. This is the reason that the joy of the party is already turned into chagrin; they cry out that they are betrayed, and are beginning to form new parties."* The new ministers appear to have been as unpalatable to the more violent Tories as they were to the Whigs; a circumstance highly gratifying to De Foe, who used much ingenuity to persuade himself and his readers that their public acts would be conformable to the constitution, and less injurious to the cause of liberty than from their previous conduct he had anticipated. His reliance was chiefly upon Harley, who had been educated a Whig, but made common cause with the Tories as a political malcontent.

These speculations upon the future conduct of the ministers gave no satisfaction either to Whigs or Tories, who united in saying that our author was making court for a place. To this he facetiously replies, "And what place does he write for? Indeed, I have not yet inquired whether there is a vacancy in the press-yard; but I know of no place anybody could think I should be writing for, unless it be a place in Newgate. This, indeed, may be the fate of anybody that dares to speak plainly to men in power. But I must tell the kind people, that though I am like to speak as plain English as anybody, yet, perhaps, I may not speak it in such gross terms as they would have it. 'Tis not my way to rail and call names. Some people think no man can serve them but he that flies in the face of government, and they want to have the 'Review' speak so as he may be sure to speak no more. Let such know I understand how to serve their interest without gratifying their humour. They are not so generous a party that any man need covet a gaol in dependence upon their support. If the author gets a place in Newgate, which he is not afraid of in defence of truth, so he knows whose fury will send him there, and who will stand by him when he is there. Teste Delaune, Anno. 1684. As to places, I have been now seven years under what we call a Whig government, and have not been a stranger to men in power. I have had the honour to be told I have served the government; the fury of an enraged party has given their testimony to it, and I could produce yet greater; but the man is not alive of whom I have sought preferment or reward. If I have not applied myself for it when, I may say without vanity, I had some pretence, the pretender to this must take me for a fool to think of it now. The commissioners of her majesty's treasury have no reason to think themselves obliged to me, that I move you to support credit. The Whigs, though they are turned out of place, are not turned out of the nation; they have too great a share in the wealth, too great a cargo in the ship, to be careless what becomes of the bottom. Therefore, let the queen put in, or put out, the nation must be preserved; and this may be done without courting, or indeed approving, the officers concerned in the management."†

The enemies of De Foe were unremitting in their attempts to embroil him with the government; but he was too wary for them. "The case of the new ministry," says he, "and the case of the author of the 'Review,' however opposite, stand exactly on the same footing. While they do nothing in breach of the laws, or against the constitution, though I make no court to them on the one hand, yet I have no business to affront them on the other. Vice versa: While I write or speak nothing but truth, and that truth, however plainly, yet with decency and respect, they can have nothing to say to me." It was his opinion, that "whoever comes into the ministry must recognize the Revolution, and carry on the administration upon that foundation. If they do not," says he, "we have another language to talk to them. For, let not governors flatter themselves, nor people be dismayed, the Revolution cannot be overthrown in Britain. It is not in the power of ministry or party, prince or parliament, to do it. If the attempt is made, let them look to it that venture upon the attempt. The people of England have tasted liberty, and I cannot think they will bear the exchange."

Whilst some were prompting him to abuse the ministers, others were as industriously stimulating the government to fall upon him. This was the case with the author of a pamphlet, entitled 'Now or Never.' "With a head as full of ignorance as a heart full of malice," says De Foe, "he takes upon him to prompt my Lord Dartmouth, to whom he addresses his libel, to prosecute the author of the 'Review;' in which he has most scandalously abused that noble person, as well as betrayed his own folly." To silence this writer, he tells a story of the Czar of Muscovy, who, when he was in England, and saw a number of fine ladies on some occasion, is said to have applied to the king to send him twenty or thirty of them, and was surprised when he learnt that his majesty had not the power to send one of them without her consent. "Englishmen," says he, "enjoy a thing called liberty, and are protected by the laws; nor can any man be punished but after a fair hearing, and a verdict per pares; a privilege I hope Scotland will now learn to value, and which they will gain by the Union. To punish without law, and prosecute without crime, is not the English way; and to ask it of a minister of state is an affront to his understanding." Our author adds, "I have been desired to bestow an answer to that ridiculous paper, but I really think it merits no better answer than this: To be laughed at for its ignorance."

As the ministers could scarcely expect to maintain their footing with the present parliament, its dissolution was one of the measures contemplated in the new changes. But before this could be effected there was much opposition to encounter, and Harley was long embarrassed as to what course he should pursue. His own feelings were in favour of moderate measures, and he promised to observe a medium between the two parties. Aware of the untractable nature of the Tories, he wished to form a junction with the Whigs, and made overtures for that purpose, but being unsuccessful, he was thrown upon the Tories; and when a dissolution was decided upon, it spread a general panic amongst the citizens of London. Addison, writing upon the 5th of August, says, "The bank have represented that they must shut up upon the first issuing out of new writs; and Sir Francis Child, with the rest of the monied citizens on the Tory side, have declared to the Duke of Shrewsbury, that they shall be ruined if so great a blow be given to the public credit as would inevitably follow upon a dissolution."* Most of the monied men having brought their stock to market, there were more sellers than buyers, so that the price of bank-stock fell gradually down to 100. At this time many foreign merchants, who had large concerns in the funds, sent orders to their agents to dispose of their stock, which not only increased the evil, but gave a tolerable hint of the general feeling abroad upon the probable policy of the new ministers.†

Notwithstanding the evils that seemed to threaten this measure, and the loss of a powerful friend in the Duke of Somerset, who resigned his place as Master of the Horse, and went over to the Whigs in consequence, a proclamation for the dissolution of parliament was issued the 21st of September. As soon as it appeared, "all England was in an uproar, and so inflamed by the churchmen, that their fury was to determine elections without any regard to the rights of the electors; for the canvassings and elections were carried on with such feuds as had never before been known in England. In many cases they were carried on by open violence. That firebrand of sedition, Dr Sacheverell, employed his whole time and pains to this purpose. Religion was therefore looked upon as the only popular cause, in the support of which all the furies were raised to procure votes, and ran together as it were to the funeral of the government and public liberty."‡ Innumerable were the outrages committed by the rabble ; but as the cause they appeared for sanctified their crimes, they were passed over with impunity. Two flagrant instances of this fury appeared at the elections for London and Westminster. In the former place the chief magistrates met with the grossest insults, and in the latter the proxy of General Stanhope only escaped with his life. "These times were full of all kinds of insolence, and the glorious actions and victories lately obtained were turned into ridicule ; good men, therefore, thought it advisable to withdraw themselves from public affairs until the tumult should be ended."*

In the midst of these disorders De Foe was one of those true patriots who stood in the breach between his country and the party that was aiming to enslave it. In energetic strains he now warned his countrymen of the dangers that beset them, in 'A Word against a New Election. 1710.'

The distracted state of the country at this time is pathetically described by our author, who took a circuit into several parts of the kingdom. "In the counties through which I have passed," says he, "I have been an eye-witness to practices that every honest heart, concerned for the welfare of the country, cannot but bleed at the sight of. A people miserably divided against themselves, in consequence of which their destruction cannot be far off. All the arts and engines imaginable are made use of to bring the people to a wilful surrender of themselves to names and parties. To this end they heat their blood with wine, foment their passions by continued reproaches, and expose each other to studied quarrels. No man but he that sees these things, as this author does to his amazement, could believe it possible that the animosities of the people of this nation could, in so short a time, and after such views of the danger these things have formerly brought them to, be capable of such inflammations. The name of peace is become a scandal. Nor do we fight with cudgels only, as at Marlow, Whitechurch, &c. ; with swords and staves, as at Coventry ; with stones and brick-bats, as at other places ; but we fight with the poison of the tongue, the venom of slander, the foam of malice, and the poison of reproach. This is the present temper of the people where I have been, and too much so all over the nation ; wounding not men's bodies only, but stabbing their reputation, reproaching their morals, ripping up their miscarriages, and wounding their families, without any regard to truth or honour. Even our civil war, though bloody and unnatural enough, was not carried on with such a spirit of fury as is now to be seen. Rogue and villain are in the mouths of our men of manners ; and, as Sallust tells us of Catiline's conspiracy, when his men came to fight, rage and fury were to be seen in the countenances of both sides. Doubtless God, who governs the world he made, has designed some extraordinary event from this strange phenomenon ; and men's minds cannot bear this fermentation without some eruption which, like that at Etna, must put the whole country into confusion."†

The scene that was exhibited in the city of London affords a striking picture of the times, and is thus described by our author :—"Honest men have been afraid to come to the poll for fear of being abused ; and many that attempted it have been so beaten and bruised, that they thought it a happiness to get safe back again without getting up to the books, and so have not polled at all. A lane of these furies was formed from the entrance of the hall to the hustings, and in the avenues, through which every man that came to poll was obliged to pass. Here, such insufferable insults were committed as is a shame to this well-governed city."—"I cannot think that any wise man of either side can approve of the riots and tumults practised at the election.‡ Let him go through the streets and view the houses, how they look like houses of ill-fame, with their windows broke, their shutters daubed with dirt, and their balconies full of stones, as if some public enemy had taken possession of the city. Rage and madness filled the streets, and every one was exposed to the discretion of the rabble. In the general disorder no regard was paid either to friend or foe. Let any man view the streets. Are they all Whigs that dwell between Ludgate and Temple Bar? And was there a house that was not in this manner insulted? And what was it for? All for choosing parliament-men, to make laws for good government, protect our property, and preserve the peace!"* In reference to these disorders, the 'Tatler' humorously remarks, "That if the whole people were to enter into a course of abstinence, and eat nothing but water-gruel for a fortnight, it would abate the rage and animosity of parties, and not a little contribute to the cure of a distracted nation."†

At this time, many rumours were in circulation of plots and conspiracies to bring in the Pretender. It was given out that the French were to land a body of ten thousand troops to assist in the design, and that there was a strong party in the nation ready to join them. Letters were industriously spread about, and found in the public streets, implicating many persons of consequence, and full of ciphers and half-sentences, pointing out the particular individuals. Of these contrivances to alarm the people, De Foe had no good opinion. He observes that the nation was not then ripe for such a plot, nor were the measures of the party that would be most inclined to it in sufficient forwardness for its execution; but that whatever might be the ulterior design of the Jacobites and High-flyers, their pushing it forward just then would be fatal to their object.‡ Amongst the delusions of the times, it was unblushingly given out, that the Whigs and Dissenters were favourable to the Pretender; a fallacy thus exposed by our author:—"We have a wild suggestion, and the party have taken some pains, in this time of public delusion, to possess the poor abused country-people with this wild story:—That the Dissenters are for the Pretender, that the Whigs are turned Jacobites, that the Low-churchmen are Atheists, and that the bishops are Presbyterians. But these things will die of themselves, and the persons accused need be under no concern for clearing their reputation from that scandal. You might as well accuse the Scotch kirk to be for episcopacy, the Non-jurors for King William, and the High-flyers for a calves'-head feast! Yet, such is the present infatuation, that the poor people are really ready to fancy such things as firmly as they believe anything." He adds, "If the Pretender is kept out till the Whigs and Dissenters concur to bring him in, we may be all easy, and he may e'en go and hang himself; for he has nothing to do as to that matter, but to despair and die."||

Unripe as the nation was at this time for any exertions in favour of the Pretender, it is certain that the change in the ministry inspired hopes in his adherents. and they continued to be fed until the close of the reign. At this time there appeared a remarkable pamphlet, entitled 'A Letter from a Gentleman at the Court of St Germain's to one of his Friends in England; containing a Memorial about Methods for setting the Pretender upon the Throne of Great Britain. London: 1710.' This pretended discovery was probably of English manufacture, and written by a person well acquainted with the state of parties in England. He gave a long list of instructions for the use of the Jacobites, and, as De Foe says, let out some important confessions. The letter says,—“That since the Prince of Orange was the great cause of all their misfortunes, it will always be a great point gained to lessen the esteem for him, and to blacken his memory as much as possible.” Upon this De Foe remarks, “The poor unfortunate author of the 'Review,' who had the honour once to serve, and if I may say it with humblest acknowledgments, to be beloved by that glorious prince, has run a strange variety of fate for his zeal for the honour and memory of his person and actions. By governments ruined, by pretence of justice punished, by enemies reproached, and even by Protestant writers, pretending the defence of our constitution, scurrilously insulted for adhering to his service, and vindicating his character. And now it appears that the blackening the memory of this prince is the first maxim of the politics of St Germain's towards preparing a way for the Pretender." *

Another work relating to the Pretender, that appeared just before the dissolution of parliament, and has been given to De Foe, is 'Reasons against receiving the Pretender. Together with some Queries of the utmost importance to Great Britain. Lond. A. Baldwin. 1710.' The object of the writer is to alarm the nation with a prospect of the consequences that would result from the admission of the Pretender, but there seems no good reason for attributing it to our author.

As De Foe now wrote with great caution, and abstained from attacking the ministers, he was charged with wavering in his politics. To this he makes the following reply:—"The author of this paper, finding the times perilous, the age censorious, enemies furious, friends cautious, and espousing truth dangerous, and knowing not how long he may be permitted to speak in this manner, humbly desires to state a little the case of this paper and its author. It is now seven years since this work first began, during which time the author has had the fate of pleasing and displeasing in their turn, as must be the lot of every man who writes in an age when so many parties have alternately governed, and where the men of the same party have so often been of several opinions about the same thing. All the world will bear me witness that this is not a Tory paper, as the rage with which I am daily treated will testify. Yet, because I cannot run the length that some would have me, new scandals fill their mouths; and now they report I am gone over to the new ministry. These are the men who, it seems, are angry that I write for upholding credit, without regard to changes in the administration. I have had some conference with these men, and I thank God I have; for it has taught me to abhor their temper, pity their folly, and laugh at their censure. The scandal, therefore, of changing my principles, because I am not for ruining my country, is what I despise. I shall trouble the world with no more apologies. The method I shall take for the future in speaking of public affairs, will be with the same desire to support and defend truth, yet with more caution of embroiling myself with a party that has no mercy, and for a party that has no sense of service."

In November he paid a visit to Scotland, where he stayed for some time, most probably engaged in some secret service. During the whole of his stay there, he furnished the materials for the 'Review;' and he continued it, amidst all his other avocations, on his return, with unabated diligence. There is reason to suppose that his worldly circumstances were now pretty comfortable, for he describes himself as writing his 'Review' in "a nice retirement" at Newington, a pleasant situation, endeared to him, as we have seen, by the recollections of his boyish years. There were not wanting enemies who, in order to destroy the effect of De Foe's writings, afterwards asserted that during this period his pen had been employed in the composition of Tory tracts and pamphlets—the implied condition, as they would have us to understand, of the continuance of his allowance. But we shall soon have to notice a most speaking instance of the falseness of these charges. When Harley himself, bred in revolutionary principles, first came into power, he did so, indeed, by the aid of the Tory party; but he had neither espoused their principles in their full extent, nor did he consent to anything like a total expulsion of the Whigs from office; for this last part of his policy, indeed, as our readers may remember, he was some years afterwards severely blamed by Swift in the celebrated 'Free Thoughts on the State of Public Affairs.' But the minister's object, no doubt, was to strengthen his own power by carrying along with him as many of the more moderate Whigs as he could detach from Godolphin's party ; and if he failed ultimately in the attainment of this object, the blame was more imputable to the fiery and audacious temper of his colleague, Bolingbroke, than to him. As yet, however, Bolingbroke himself had not entirely forgotten the Whig principles, in which he also had been educated ; or if such a change had taken place in his mind, it was not suspected even by those who knew him best.

De Foe, in truth, less than any one either of the political rulers of that period, or even than any of its political writers, seems to have merited the blame of versatility in political principles ; he wrote against the peace of Utrecht, although by doing so he must have known he was thwarting Harley in the dearest and most important of all his measures. Yet his honesty does not appear even in this delicate instance to have lost him the protection of the minister.

During this residence in Scotland, the corporation of Edinburgh, grateful for his former services, empowered him to publish the 'Edinburgh Courant,' in the room of Adam Rooge. This was the second newspaper published in Scotland, and was projected by James Watson in 1705. The first was the 'Edinburgh Gazette,' established by the same writer, and printed by authority in 1699. This, and his 'Review,' the matter for which he regularly transmitted to London, seem to have occupied nearly all his literary leisure during his absence from England ; but after he had issued forty-five numbers of the 'Courant,' he relinquished it to "the heirs and successors of Andrew Anderson, printer to the queen, the city, and the college." De Foe returned to London in March, 1711.

During his absence, our author was assailed in a penny pamphlet, called 'A Hue and Cry after Daniel De Foe and his Coventry Beast ; with a Letter from that worthy Horse-courser to a Friend of Mr Mayo in Coventry, that lent it him. London : 1711.' This libel recites that De Foe's travelling occasions leading him, about three years since, into Warwickshire, "to encourage the faction there as well as elsewhere, he could not but pay his respects to the brethren, who at times were very numerous in Coventry ;" that he there hired a horse of one Mayo, which he took with him into Scotland ; and that neither the animal nor the hire of him had been heard of since. A letter is added, said to be written by De Foe, in reply to one that had been left for him at his printer's, but its contents prove it a manifest forgery. In reply to this libel, De Foe published the true state of the case in one of his 'Reviews,' from which it appears, that "about three years since, the author going to Scotland, a gentleman who went with him, his horse falling lame, was obliged to leave him at Coventry and hire another ; so that, in the first place, the story is a falsity as to the person ; for the author of the 'Review' hired no horse at all, neither was the other person any servant, or otherwise belonging to him, but a travelling companion." It appears that the hire of the horse was paid down, and a further sum agreed upon for the purchase, in case it was not returned. De Foe's friend, settling in Scotland, kept the horse, and remitted the money to Coventry ; but the horse-dealer had hitherto declined receiving it, there being a dispute between them as to the price. Such is the substance of a story that was made the ground of a senseless slander against our author, who considered it little deserving of notice, but thought fit to state it correctly, "for the sake of some people who are willing to lay hold of any shift to reproach the man they hate."

Our author's most frequent assailant at this time was Dyer, the new's-writer, who dealt largely in personalities, and was far from particular in the means he employed for advancing the cause of High-church. His libels upon private individuals sometimes exposed him to summary chastisement, but this did not cure him of the cacoethes scribendi. His frequent clashings with De Foe, which produced a waste of words that often degenerated into scandal and abuse, induced our author at this time to propose a literary truce, that each might advocate his cause without personal reflections, and whilst they continued to differ, might express their sentiments in language restrained by the decencies of life; but the strict observance of such a treaty could scarcely be expected at a period so distinguished for political strife. The letter from De Foe to Dyer on this point is among the Harleian MSS. (No. 7001, folio 269) in the British Museum, is directed to "Mr Dyer, Shoe lane," and is as follows:—

"Mr Dyer,—I have your letter. I am rather glad to find you put it upon the trial who was aggressor, than justify a thing which I am sure you cannot approve; and in this, I assure you, I am far from injuring you, and refer you to the time when long since you had wrote I never fled from justice; one Sammon being taken up for printing a libel, and I being then on a journey, nor the least charge against me for being concerned in it by anybody but your letter, when I was in Scotland on the affair of the Union; and I assure you, when my paper had not in the least mentioned you, and those I refer to time and date for the proof of.

"I mention this only in defence of my last letter, in which I said no more of it than to let you see I did not merit such treatment; and could nevertheless be content to render any service to you, though I thought myself hardly used.

"But to state the matter fairly between you and I, as writing for different interests, and so possibly coming under an unavoidable necessity of jarring in several cases, I am ready to make a fair truce of honour with you, viz. that if what either party are doing or saying may clash with the party we are for, and urge us to speak, it shall be done without naming either's name, and without personal reflections; and thus we may differ still, and yet preserve both the Christian and the gentleman.

"This, I think, is an offer may satisfy you. I have not been desirous of giving just offence to you, neither would I to any man, however I may differ from him; and I see no reason why I should affront a man's person because I do not join with him in principle. I please myself with being the first proposer of so fair a treaty with you, because I believe, as you cannot deny its being very honourable, so it is not less so in coming first from me, who, I believe, could convince you of my having been the first and most ill treated; for further proof of which I refer you to your letters at the time I was threatened by the envoy of the King of Sweden.

"However, Mr Dyer, this is a method which may end what is past, and prevent what is future; and if refused, the future part, I am sure, cannot lie at my door.

"As to your letter, your proposal is so agreeable to me, that, truly, without it I could not have taken the thing at all; for it would have been a trouble intolerable both to you as well as to me to take your letter, every post, first from you, and then send it to the post-house.

"Your method of sending to the black box is just what I designed to propose, and Mr Shaw will doubtless take it of you. If you think it needful for me to speak to him, it shall be done. What I want to know is only the charge, and that you will order it constantly to be sent, upon hinting whereof I shall send you the names. Wishing you success in all things (your opinions of government excepted), I am,

"Newington, June 17, 1710."

"DE FOE."

The factions of the time had given birth to a new paper, superior in talent to most that had gone before it, but as devoid of good breeding as the lowest of its contemporaries. An affectation of contempt for other writers was one of the arts employed by the 'Examiner' to supplant them in public opinion, and those who conducted it were well aware of its power upon persons not qualified to judge of their pretensions. De Foe naturally came in for a full share of its vituperation; but he was not a person to be attacked with impunity, even by so great a master of the art as Swift. "I wonder much," says he, "to hear an author, who first calls the 'Observator' and the 'Review' stupid and illiterate, should quit his talking to men of sense, to talk to these idiots. Now, what the 'Observator' may do I say nothing; but, as I have all along practised with many other such scurrilous, angry sons of emptiness, so I shall still—answer and say nothing." He asks the 'Examiner' how it is, since he boasts of so much learning, that he comes to have so little manners? "I know nothing," says he, "that can render a gentleman so contemptible as to lose his breeding; nor does any difference of persons discharge the obligation of good manners. The author of the 'Examiner' haughtily tells the world that he has kept a footman; and though he does not pretend to say that the 'Review' has been in that capacity, yet he treats him as a man of behaviour would not treat a footman." He tells the 'Examiner' that the 'Review' is not upon equal terms with him in the use of Billingsgate language, and adds, "There is a known story of the mastiff and the little spaniel, which I could also refer him to, as most proper for such an author; but I leave it and him. When he is tired he will have done; and when he is done, he will be tired. Happy is the 'Review' in pinching this party, and making them rave at this rate; it is an immortal testimony to the victory of truth, given by its enemies."

The ill-usage our author received from the high party is circumstantially related in his 'Review' for December 16, 1710, which records some curious particulars:—"Lest I should some time or other, as God shall let loose their hands, fall into the power of this enraged party, give me leave to show a little how they have treated the author of this paper, that it may stand upon record against them; and I'll be very brief:—When railing in print, bullying, and hectoring would not silence him, letters were sent threatening to murder him. His house was marked to be pulled down by the rabble, and he was assured by writing and by messengers that he had not long to live. The very printer was threatened to have his house mobbed for printing it. Several attempts were made to prosecute the paper at the Old Bailey, at Guildhall, and at Westminster; but when no jury could be found to present it, and no crime to present for, that was let fall. Other measures were taken to embroil him with the government; but still all was in vain. When this failed, endeavours were made to rouse sleeping lions, and harass him with dormant creditors; men who, satisfied with the frequent offers he had made of a complete surrender of his effects, had declined for seventeen years a fruitless cruelty upon a man who had given such evidence of his integrity. However, some mischief of this kind they brought him into; and when he had extricated himself from that, the same perjured villain that insulted Mr Daniel Burgess for a sham pretence well known, assaulted him, took fifteen guineas from him to get out of his hands again, which extortion he is now under legal prosecution for, and may speedily be brought to justice. Not content with this, the same villain entered his house on the Sabbath-day without any legal warrant, or the least pretence, in order, upon a sham, to get him into custody, and betray him, whether to murderers or creditors he yet knows not. Then sets of rogues were employed after this to take out sham writs in names not known, and men that were not officers pretended to arrest him; which pretended officers are now under prosecution also, and one of them has confessed the fact. He has been often beset, waylaid, and dogged into dark passages; yet, when they have actually met him, and found him prepared for his defence, their hearts have failed them; for villains are always cowardly. And all this, 'tis evident, is for writing this paper.

"And now, as if this was not enough, Mr Examiner is falling upon me with much noise, but little shot; many ill names, but no argument. After idiot, which is the first mark of distinction, comes illiterate: much wit in that, truly; for how should an idiot but be illiterate? This brings a remark into my thoughts that I have often had occasion to make: we have abundance of learned fools in the world, and ignorant wise men. How often have I seen a man boast of his letters and his load of learning, and be ignorant in the common necessary acquirements that fit a man for the service of himself and of his country. I know a man at this time, a minister, who is a critic in the Greek and Hebrew, a complete master of the Latin; yet it would make a man blush to read a letter from him, sleep to hear him preach, and sick to read his books. Again, I know another that is an orator in the Latin, a walking index of books, has all the libraries in Europe in his head, from the Vatican at Rome to the learned collection of Dr Salmon at Fleet Ditch; but, at the same time, he is a cynic in behaviour, a fury in temper, unpolite in conversation, abusive in language, and ungovernable in passion. Is this to be learned? Then may I still be illiterate.

“I have been in my time pretty well master of five languages, and have not lost them yet, though I write no bill over my door, nor set Latin quotations in any part of the ‘Review.’ But, to my irreparable loss, I was bred only by halves; for my father, forgetting Juno’s royal academy, left the language of Billingsgate quite out of my education. Hence I am perfectly illiterate in the polite style of the street, and am not fit to converse with the porters and carmen of quality, who grace their diction with the beauties of calling names, and cursing their neighbour with a bonne grace. I have had the honour to fight a rascal, but never could muster the eloquence of calling a man so; nor am I yet arrived at the dignity of being laureated at her Majesty’s bear-garden. I have also, illiterate as I am, made a little progress in science. I read ‘Euclid’s Elements,’ and yet never found the mathematical description of a scurrilous gentleman. I have read logic, but could never see a syllogism formed upon the notion of it. I went some length in physics, or natural philosophy, and could never find between the two ends of nature, generation and corruption, one species out of which such a creature could be formed. I thought myself master of geography, and to possess sufficient skill in astronomy to have set up for a country almanac-writer; yet could in neither of the globes find either in what part of the world such a heterogeneous creature lives, nor under the influence of what heavenly body he can be produced. From whence I conclude very frankly that either there is no such creature in the world, or that, according to Mr Examiner, I am a stupid idiot, and a very illiterate fellow.”*

De Foe met with as much injustice from the public authorities as from private individuals. The issue of the prosecution above alluded to is thus related by himself:—“It is but lately that I troubled the world with a complaint of the barbarous usage I met with from a villain’s waiting and watching for me, under a pretence to arrest, though without a warrant, and whether to murder or deliver me up to those that should, is like, for want of justice, to remain a secret. I took up lately one of these fellows with a sham writ. He had taken money of a man employed by me formerly to treat with him, believing him then to have been an officer. This villain I had long pursued, and at last apprehended. He begged, confessed, offered to refund the money, and pay the charges; but, not discovering his accomplices, he was carried before a justice of the peace, not a hundred miles from Sir H——y B——lds. The justice, when he heard the first complaint, readily granted his warrant; the case was so black he could not but resolve to punish it. The rogue is brought before him, a lawyer appears, makes out the fact, and the justice discovered some indignation at the crime. But as soon as he heard the prosecutor was Daniel De Foe, author of the ‘Review,’ he calls the gentleman that pleaded it a rogue, though as honest a man as himself, and, by the way, no Whig, discharges the warrant, and bids the villain keep the money; which, for all that, he shall not do, nor shall the justice himself escape the shame of his partiality, for giving orders to a cheat to keep what he owned to have been unjustly gotten. Excellent justice this to make a nation flourish.

* Review, vii, 454—5.

“ Well, this is all on one side,” observes our author, who proceeds to relate a dishonourable transaction that implicated some Whigs :—“ On board of a ship,” says he, “ I loaded some goods. The master is a Whig, of a kind more particular than ordinary. He comes to the port, my bill of lading is produced, my title to my goods undisputed ; no claim, no pretence ; but my goods cannot be found. The ship sailed again, and I am told my goods are carried back, and all the reason given is that they belong to De Foe, author of the ‘ Review,’ and he is turned about, and writes for keeping up the public credit. Thus, gentlemen, I am ready to be assassinated, arrested without warrant, robbed and plundered by all sides ; I can neither trade nor live ; and what is this for ? Only, as I can yet see, because there being faults on both sides, I tell both sides of it too plainly.”*

Writing in the month of March, De Foe says :—“ He that will speak at all must speak quickly ; and he that has but a little while to speak ought to speak to the purpose.” This remark was suggested by a projected tax upon printed papers and pamphlets, the object of which was to suppress the fry of small writers who gave so much annoyance to men in power. Pamphlets now flew about the nation like hail ; and in these the pretensions of all parties were canvassed, and their actions libelled according to the humour of the several writers. A ministry founded upon public opinion, and honest in its designs, has nothing to fear from such missiles ; but the one now existing was vulnerable upon so many points that there was ample room for soreness, which could not be healed by silence, nor by the eloquence of its own writers. Towards the end of this year no fewer than fourteen persons were taken up and held to bail for printing seditious pamphlets ; and as their crime was not specified, they loudly complained that at this rate the office of the Secretary of State might be converted into a Spanish inquisition. Upon a subject so intimately connected with liberty, so important to the diffusion of just opinions upon every subject that is interesting to man, De Foe wrote largely and well in his ‘ Review.’

In the month of March Harley laid before the House of Commons his project for a trade to the South Seas, a scheme upon which he calculated for paying off the national debt. The idea, however, was by no means new, having been suggested to Godolphin, who laid it aside until a convenient opportunity offered for giving it mature consideration ; nor did it appear to be any more than what an ordinary mind might have invented. Harley had no sooner disclosed it, than Rochester and his party vented their ridicule, and did all in their power to defeat it ; but he overpowered opposition, and it was received with an implicit confidence that superseded investigation. So great was the infatuation in its favour, that it was even extolled as an effort of genius and patriotism surpassing all his former merits.

A subject of so much importance to the country was not likely to escape the attention of De Foe, who discussed it at some length in his ‘ Review ;’ but he strips Harley of any claim to the invention. He had himself, long before, projected the establishment of a trade with South America, by the settlement of a colony there ; and had suggested a plan of the kind to the government, as the least costly and most effectual way of distressing Spain, and diminishing the power and resources of France. “ I had the honour,” says he, “ to lay a proposal before his late Majesty, King William, in the beginning of this war, for carrying the war, not into Old Spain, but into America ; which proposal his Majesty approved of, and fully proposed to put it in execution, had not death, to our unspeakable grief, prevented him. And yet I would have my readers distinguish with me, that there is always a manifest difference between carrying on a war in America, and settling a trade there ; and I shall not fail to speak distinctly to this difference in its turn. And because I purpose to dwell a little upon the subject, and to make what I shall say on this head, as far as my capacity extends, a perfect though short compendium both of Spanish and English commerce as they respect each other, either in Europe or America, I shall first lay down what the circumstances of this trade are, how carried on, and by whom, and how far we are concerned in them." These points are illustrated by our author at considerable length. He then proceeds to correct some misconceptions of our people with relation to this trade, which they were not to expect upon the same footing as the French enjoyed it. "In this," says he, "I am far from designing to discourage this new undertaking, which I profess to believe a very happy one; but to correct these wild notions, it seems needful to ascertain what we are to understand by a trade to the South Seas, and what not, that in the first place our enemies may not make a wrong improvement of it, our friends in Spain may not take umbrage at it, and our people at home may not grow big with wild expectations, which might end in chagrin and disappointment." He says, "There is room enough on the western coast of America for us to establish a flourishing trade, without encroaching upon the Spaniards;" and intimates, that there are vast tracts of land which they hardly meddle with, combining every advantage of soil and climate, besides plenty of gold and silver, as an effectual foundation for all manner of commerce. The industry and enterprise of the English in such a situation, he says, would open a wide door for the consumption of our manufactures, and bring a vast revenue of wealth to our own country.*

These various matters were embodied by our author in a separate pamphlet, in which he expressed his thoughts upon the subject, arranged in a methodical form, and treated at full length. It was published in the following September, under the title of 'An Essay on the South Sea Trade. London: 1710.' 8vo.

The station to which Harley had raised himself by his intrigues, when viewed in connexion with his political associates, occasioned various speculations as to his future conduct. Although the mystery that he affected in all transactions of a public nature was such as to set conjecture at defiance, yet those who imagined themselves to be acquainted with his opinions, argued upon the future prospects of the nation as their own wishes or their political bias dictated. As he entered upon the ministry with large professions of moderation, it brought him the support of those who would have withheld it from the other ministers. De Foe, who was in this number, always gave him credit for the political virtue upon which he so highly valued himself, and published a work at this time, in which he lays it down as a motive for conciliating the public in his favour. It is entitled, 'Eleven Opinions about Mr H——y; with Observations. London: printed for J. Baker. 1711.'

The nature of the matters discussed in this pamphlet obliged our author to adopt much circumlocution in telling his story. In his desire to forestall a favourable opinion of Harley, and of the measures he expected him to pursue, he is evidently hampered between a desire to do justice to the former ministers and a reconciliation to the change. It is, upon the whole, dexterously written; and upon a presumption that Harley's moderation would have more effect upon the subsequent management than was eventually the case. The prosecution of the subject in another pamphlet, of which he holds out the expectation, does not appear to have been realized.

The tenor of this pamphlet, and of his weekly writings, exposed our author to much obloquy from the Whigs, who accused him of wavering in his politics, and of time-serving servility to the ministry. These unjust attacks he answered in his 'Review,' in a manner perfectly satisfactory to every impartial mind. The motives which guided him in his line of politics after the change in the ministry he thus describes:—

* 'Review,' viii, 165—274.

“ When revolutions happen at Court, as I have seen many, when this or that party goes in or out, it always lays the subject under some difficulties as to his behaviour ; but one general rule serves me in all these turns. The constitution is my guide ; so far as the ministry goes along with it, every subject that regards the general good, acquiesces and is quiet. The reason is clear—we do not go along with the ministry, but they go along with us. There is a manifest difference between a revolution in the government, and a revolution in the administration. The first is a change of the constitution itself, and settling it upon a new, or restoring it to its old foundation ; the latter is only a change of persons. In the former I have a voice as a member of the constitution ; in the latter I am passive. I may be sorry when I see some men put out, and others put in, as I think they are, or are not likely to make us happy and easy in their administration ; but I have no more right to challenge the sovereign, than the sovereign has to call a subject to account for turning away his servants. While they keep within the circle of the laws, and do right, they go along with me ; if they do wrong, they go away from me, and I go wrong too if I follow them. He that serves a minister of state, or joins with him in any illegal step, especially knowing it to be so, is a mercenary, a flatterer, and ought to be the contempt of mankind. But while the ministry keep within the circle of the law, preserve the constitution, uphold the liberties and interests of the nation, let their persons be who or what they will, without inquiring their names, it is my duty to join with them. This is the golden mean by which I regulate myself. If I give offence to some hot friends, when aversion to persons runs them into extremes, I am sorry for them ; for I think I act by principle. He that tells me of bribery, and writing to please, is first a knave, in charging me with what he cannot prove ; and secondly, a fool, in putting more value upon the ‘ Review,’ and its author, than he pretends to, and suggesting that his pen is of such consequence to the present ministry, as to make it worth their while. When the administration of affairs has run wrong, I have never spared myself, but have dared to speak the truth in the face, and in contempt of the power of arbitrary ministers of state ; nay, in opposition to parliaments themselves, when I have thought they invaded the liberties of their country, which they were constituted to protect ; and if I see the same cause, I dare do the same thing again, and shall not fail to do it, let what power or persons soever stand in my way. But, till the ministry break in upon the constitution, invade liberty, encroach upon property, break the laws, and oppress the subject, I cannot think it is the duty or interest of any wise man, to carry on his regret at any change the queen pleases to make, to such a degree as to fall upon the persons that succeed, only because they are in place, whether they act amiss or no. They that think otherwise may act as they please. But it was never my talent to complain without ground, which would be to obtain the favour of not being regarded when I had cause.” *

If we may believe De Foe, he lived in an age when men were very versatile in their politics ; for it was so much the fashion to be governed by persons rather than things, that “ it is almost impossible to find a man, either Whig or Tory, who is of the same sentiments now that he was twenty years ago.” † In that age of political defection, there were, perhaps, few writers less open to the charge of tergiversation than De Foe, notwithstanding the powerful arguments of a wife and six children, with a precarious dependance for their support ; a fact never told by his enemies. In spite of their calumnies, it is impossible not to believe that he was, through life, the consistent friend of civil and religious liberty ; whilst upon minor points, he never allowed his judgment to be fettered by the opinions of any party. Yet, because he did not run the full career of opposition with the Whigs, they set him down as a mercenary writer, and insisted upon his being in the pay of Harley. Oldmixon, who is resolved never to speak well, either of De Foe or of his patron, repeats the charges against him, with additional scandal; but no credit is to be given to a writer who dips his pen so deeply in the gall of party. He couples De Foe with Swift as "fellow-labourers in the service of the White-Staff;" and says, that "he paid De Foe better than he did Swift; looking on him as the shrewder head of the two." The same writer, in his life of Maynwaring (p. 168), says, "He told me that De Foe, who had had very great obligations to my Lord Treasurer Godolphin, when he began to turn his 'Reviews' against his benefactor" (which, by the way, he never did), "wrote his lordship a letter that he did it in compliment with the madness of the times, and seemed to fall in with those that clamoured against his administration, only that he might get a hearing for him in his favour." A very improbable story, and of a piece with what follows: "Nay, he was so base as to take money of the Earl of Godolphin, at the same time that he had a pension from his successor, who sent him to Scotland as a spy, when the treaty of union was afoot, and kept him in pay ever after, as a man whose conscience was exactly of a size with his own, and who was fit for any drudgery he should put him upon. Mr Maynwaring has often expressed to me his admiration, that either the Earl of Godolphin, or the Treasurer that came after him, could put any trust in such a fellow, or have any opinion of his capacity, he being the most ignorant rogue that ever scribbled. He would never let me take any notice of his 'Reviews' (in the Medley), yet himself fell upon one of them in a half-sheet, and made such a devil of the author that he laboured a long while after to clear himself of so much infamy; but it was laid on too thick and too close for him to wipe it off." The works of De Foe vindicate him from the contempt sought to be put upon him by this and other writers; and from the other charges he has satisfactorily cleared himself in his 'Appeal to Honour and Justice,' and in his 'Review.'

De Foe's next separate publication was on the subject of the peace, which ministers were now negotiating with France, very much to the dissatisfaction of the English nation at large, with whom the long train of successes that had attended the arms of the confederates against the ambitious French monarch, had rendered the war popular, as affording a prospect of creating a balance of power in Europe. De Foe, though his opinion remained unchanged as to the necessity of securing that object, was a friend to peace, provided it could be obtained on safe and honourable terms, as he contended that the circumstances of the nation required it, and the state of the question was now, in some material points, different from the position which it held in the time of William. Besides entering largely into the subject in his 'Review,' De Foe, in the month of March, sent forth "An Essay at a Plain Exposition of that Difficult Phrase, 'A Good Peace.' London. 1711."

In discussing this question, De Foe refers to the primary objects of the war, as laid down in the treaty of partition, and the articles of the grand alliance, and contends, that a treaty founded upon those stipulations can be the only basis of a good peace. Since the formation of that alliance, however, an event had happened, which not being foreseen, could not be provided for, and would render some alterations necessary in the terms to be insisted upon. The event here referred to was the accession to the empire of the Austrian King of Spain, which De Foe contends put an end to his claim upon the latter country, and rendered a new arrangement necessary to preserve a balance of power in Europe: for this could not be obtained by giving Spain either to France or Austria. It was apparent, therefore, that satisfaction must be given to both powers by a distribution of the Spanish dominions, but upon the nature of the allotment he does not presume to give an opinion. This must be settled by a general treaty between all the powers; and if France did not agree to reasonable terms, we should only be in the same situation that we were, and could renew the war. It is evident from the tenour of this discourse, that De Foe had abandoned the idea of King Philip's removal from the Spanish throne, and that he thought some equivalent might be provided for the allies, without compromising the honour of the country, or defeating the wishes of the people for peace. His pamphlet must have been of considerable use to the ministers, whilst it is so dexterously written as not to compromise the politics of the writer, nor commit him with the policy which dictated the terms that were finally agreed upon.

The reproaches cast upon the memory of King William, for the Treaty of Partition, and their revival at this time for party purposes, awakened De Foe to a renewed vindication of his royal master. Besides devoting his 'Review' to the subject upon the anniversary of the Revolution, he published, early in December, 'The Felonious Treaty ; or, an Inquiry into the Reasons which moved his late Majesty King William, of Glorious Memory, to enter into a Treaty at Two several Times with the King of France, for the Partition of the Spanish Monarchy.' Our author adopted this title in ridicule of John Howe, member for Gloucestershire, who had used the term in a debate in the House of Commons, for the purpose of insulting the King.

We are now again approaching a measure that had been an object of earnest solicitude with high churchmen during the whole of this reign. The menaces thrown out against the Dissenters, in the bold and senseless declamations of the clergy, were not empty words, but gave an earnest of their designs upon the earliest opportunity for putting them in execution. A session of parliament having passed over without any demonstrations in their favour, or rather against the rights of their fellow citizens, they began to clamour at their friends, complaining of their slow paces towards the removal of the toleration, and the substitution of sanguinary laws for the support of the church. Not a few of them were looking forward to those halcyon days when they were to have the custody of scrupulous consciences ; when the sword of the church, which had been in a rusty state since the Revolution, should be new-furbished, and held up in terrorem for the confusion of all heretics. To prepare the minds of people for what was to follow, the proceedings of both houses of parliament upon the Occasional Conformity Bill, were now re-printed, with the arguments at large, and "Reasons for bringing in such an useful bill as this must be to the church and kingdom, this present session of parliament."

The long-wished-for day at length dawned upon them. By a strange conjunction of party interests the Whigs and Tories now united to fasten upon the Dissenters that yoke of bondage which the former had hitherto so successfully resisted. As the ministers had little prospect of standing their ground but in the event of a peace, the Whigs bent the strength of their opposition to that point ; and the Earl of Nottingham having been soured by his exclusion from the ministry, agreed to a coalition with them in this particular, upon the condition of their giving up the Dissenters. The ingratitude of these men was the more remarkable, as the Dissenters had always supported them with the whole weight of their influence, whether by voting for them at elections, or by contributing their money for the support of public credit by banks, joint-stock companies, and other ways.

Those Whig writers who have dealt out the charges of versatility so copiously against De Foe, would have done well to reserve a portion of their anger for the Whigs upon this occasion ; but they showed less regard for consistency than for the interests of party. The feeble assistance gained by the Whigs, as a recompense for their loss of honour, was for an object as worthless as the alliance itself was unnatural and disgraceful. This nobleman was of so little real consequence, that he had always been the subject of their ridicule. "What lampoons was the town full of," says De Foe, "when he encumbered the state ; and now, how caressed ! And, to gratify a desire as preposterous as all the rest, how willing are some men to give up their friends as victims to this convert, and to his mighty interest! Nay, how do they abandon the just and righteous interest they had before espoused, to oblige a man of no interest at all! Of what a camelion-like disposition is man made of!" * As the Whigs were predominant in the Lords, it is very certain that, without this dereliction of principle, so infamous a measure could not have passed; they must, therefore, participate with the Tories in its disgrace, which, says De Foe, "will infallibly ruin many hundreds of Dissenting families, or cause them to act against their consciences for bread; which I think is one of the worst kinds of persecution." † Well might our author exclaim, in the words of Julius Cæsar, when he saw the hand of his old friend lifted up against him, Et tu Brute! "The case of the Dissenters," says he, "is circumstanced too similarly; this mortal stab could have been received from no hand but that of a friend. The Dissenters in England, as they stood united in interest with the low-churchmen, could have received no fatal blow but from themselves. Three times the united power of their enemies had attacked them, and could never prevail; but given up by their friends, they fall of course." ‡

Upon the strength of this disgraceful alliance, the Earl of Nottingham brought forward his favourite measure in the House of Lords, the 15th of December, and meeting with no opposition, it passed through its several stages in three days! Even Burnet, who was so eloquent upon a former occasion, now preserved a dead silence, and relates the affair with a brevity and sang-froid that reflect no honour upon his character. He tells us the Whigs yielded more readily because the court had promised to carry the measure in the Commons; but this should have been a stimulus to their exertions in the Lords, where they possessed the most weight. As a sop to their consciences, Nottingham promised to draw the bill with all possible temper; as if it made any difference to a man who is to be butchered whether the act be performed in a passion or in cold blood! The title of the bill was singularly curious, and formed a part of the juggle then played so skilfully between politics and religion. It professed to be "An Act for preserving the Protestant Religion, by better securing the Church of England as by law established; and for confirming the Toleration granted to Protestant Dissenters, by an Act, intituled &c., and for supplying the defects thereof; and for the further securing the Protestant Succession, &c." To shut out one quarter of the Protestants, and those the farthest removed from Popery, from an interest in the constitution, was rather an odd way of providing for the Protestant religion; but no man was so blind as not to see through the artifice of these cunning churchmen, who were for playing off religion upon the loaves and fishes of the state. If the body of the bill bore but little affinity to its title, it corresponded better with the motives of its supporters. Not only were Dissenters to be excluded in future from all civil employments, but such was the contagious nature of non-conformity, that henceforward no person in office was to be allowed to put his nose within the doors of a meeting-house, gracefully called a conventicle, without becoming liable to the penalties of the act. These involved a forfeiture of place, and a fine of forty pounds for each offence; and the unlucky offender was to pay further for his curiosity by being rendered ineligible to any appointment until he had passed through the purgation of conformity for a full twelvemonth. Such was the eagerness to pass this measure, that it was before the Commons only three days; and a petition from the foreign Protestants in London to be exempted from its provisions, was rejected with contempt. The Dissenters, justly alarmed at a measure so fatal to their interests, applied to the Earl of Oxford to use his influence in their favour; naturally supposing that a man who had been nearly all his life a Presbyterian, and whose family was still of the same religion, would feel some sympathy for their wrongs. But the minister thought fit to sacrifice his religion to his ambition, as was the case with Harcourt, St John, and others, who now left the Dissenters in the lurch. The bill received the royal assent upon the 22nd of December, being the eighth day after its introduction.

By this measure the Dissenters sustained a blow which had been long aimed at them by their enemies, but without success! "A blow," says De Foe, "by which they are excluded from the common concern of fellow-subjects in the trusts and advantages of the society they live in; by which they are treated as aliens and strangers in the commonwealth, or as persons dangerous to be trusted by the government they have so faithfully and so largely contributed to support."

Whilst the bill was before the Commons, De Foe wrote strenuously against it, without respect to persons or parties. He thought it very hard that those who were so anxious for a peace with France "should bring along with it the fetters and chains of their country, and especially those worst of chains, impositions upon conscience. It would be a sad conclusion of the war," says he, "that peace and persecution should come together; and therefore, while your Protestant brethren, though dissenting from you in particulars which are acknowledged by yourselves to be indifferent, continue peaceable, submitting to the laws, it is very hard that they should be oppressed in conscience at a time when they ought rather to be reaping with you the consolations of peace, after they have shared the miseries of the war. On the other hand," addressing the Whigs, he says, "you that are against a peace, will you fortify your political interests by giving up for a prey those you have so long espoused both in their civil and religious liberties? Methinks I see some people abroad, whose characters have for some years been adorned with the word patriot, strangely easy to give up all these things, that they may but strengthen their party interest. But this is not the first time that some people who call themselves friends to the Dissenters, have offered to sacrifice them to their enemies upon very mean conditions." Our author contends that the toleration was a legal establishment, expressly stipulated for at the Revolution, and granted to the Dissenters for the assistance they afforded to Churchmen in bringing about that event. He notices the repeated promises of the queen, who had passed her royal word that she would preserve the toleration inviolable; and expresses his fears that this was but the commencement of further breaches upon it. He forbears meddling with the proceedings in parliament, in consequence of the injunction of the Lords; but, says he, "If persecuting laws are set up, and the liberty of Dissenters established at the Revolution is attempted, God forbid that I should cease, though humbly, to complain of the injury, let what human authority soever prohibit it. If they make it criminal, I am ready to suffer; but I will never lose my little share in the liberties of my country, without crying out against both the mischief and the contrivers of it, let them be who they will." *

In another paper he makes a powerful appeal to the feelings of the nation, which had become blunted by the inroads of bigotry. After noticing the services of the Dissenters, and their contributions to the war, both personal and pecuniary, he says, "Many of the poor families who must now lay down the little places which long importunity and perhaps some little money has helped them to, are the miserable remains of the descendants of the French in our colonies, which they assisted in taking; and give me leave to say, many are the ruined masters and owners of ships, let out to the public for transporting King William's army to Ireland, who had no provision made for them till they were ruined by the delay. Some are victims to parliamentary deficiencies; and these are a part of the people who are now in a merciless manner to perish without any crime, and who, having first lost their estates in the service of the government, must now lose their employ under it, because they cannot be hypocrites. If this is honourable dealing, let our enemies themselves be judges. For my part, I have no place to lose ; no expectation of any to give over. I neither have, nor can accept of, any place upon the terms that have been, any more than on the terms that are now required ; though perhaps I have had as many offers and as much family occasion as any man. I cannot be arguing, therefore, any part of my own interest. The corruption of the times makes it necessary to say this ; let any man equally indifferent answer it if he can." *

As soon as the bill had passed, De Foe published, in his 'Review,' a paper which he says was handed about at the time in manuscript, and was no doubt of his own composition. "I have met," says he, "with an unlucky paper in the town, said to be a speech spoken by a stone chimney-piece, which expostulates this matter very smartly." It was afterwards printed in another of his works,† and purports to be "The Speech Spoken by the Stone Chimney-piece in the House of Lords," and is thus introduced : "The bill having been read and committed, and no lord offering to speak against it, on a sudden a great noise was heard towards the fire, and from a crack in the Chimney-piece these words were audibly heard :—

"Wonder not, my Lords, when you sit mute, like statues of stone, that I speak. I am now a Peer, and since you, with hearts harder than rocks, can tamely abandon those poor creatures who have trusted to your protection, without saying one word for them, my softer stone cannot any longer keep silence. I have often been witness, my Lords, to the zeal and passion with which some of you have defended their cause. I heard with pleasure those Reverend Prelates, those noble patriots, plead for them, and now I see them sit more unconcerned than myself. For God's sake, my Lords, what meant your former zeal ? or what means your present indolence ? Were you in the wrong when you opposed what now you consent to ? Or are you now in the wrong, in consenting to what you before reckoned the greatest act of violence and oppression ? Speak, my Lords ; a reason of your change is due from you. (Here was a long pause, and all silent.) What, silent still ! I conjure you, by your honours, my Lords, to speak. (Here was another pause, and yet silent.) What, silent still ! Oh shameful change ! Will not the sense of honour move you more than statues ? Harken then to me, and I will reprove you. I will not, my Lords, tell all that I have heard you whisper, while you lolled on me in your late unnatural caresses ; I will not expose you too far, but I have not been totally deaf. I heard what passed when you sold your friends, and sold them for nought—for a vote, for a single worthless vote, that will desert you in the matter you depend upon it for, and so return upon you a just retribution. Was this, my Lords, an equivalent for those that had always stood by you ; that had endured mobbing, plundering, burning, and all manner of abuses for your sakes ? is it possible that after all this they should be thus surrendered, without one word for them ? Who, my Lords, will depend on you after this ? Who will move a finger or lip in your quarrel ? Depend upon it, you will miss your aim, you have ruined your own interest, and have lost the honour of your former integrity. With what regret will you reflect on this day's action, when you shall find yourselves the jest of those that decoyed you, and the scorn of those that you have abandoned ? Think of this ; repent if you can, though it is too late.' "

As a last effort to avert so obnoxious a measure, our author besought the Queen, in pathetic terms, to interpose her good offices. For this purpose, he drew up a pamphlet with so much dispatch, that it was announced for publication in the 'Review' for the 22nd of December, and bears the following title : 'An Essay on the History of Parties and Persecution in Britain.' The appeal, however, was in vain, for the bigotry of the Queen was as incurable as the ambition of her ministers, and was a torment to her subjects throughout her reign.

CHAPTER XIV.

AT the opening of the year 1712, our author was engaged in some commercial concerns, the nature of which remains unknown. His partner in this speculation was a Mr Ward, who for many years carried on a respectable business as a mercer and draper at Coleshill, in Warwickshire. He was then a member of the Established Church, but a Whig in politics, which exposed him to the rage of his High-church neighbours, who, following the fury of the times, raised such an odium against him as occasioned his business to decline. Mr Ward was the only Whig in the town; but being a man of a mild temper, and of inoffensive manners, he gained the respect even of his enemies. Unable to move him from his principles, party malignity at length triumphed over this deference to his character, of which the following anecdote furnishes a striking instance. The curate of Coleshill, whose name was Badger, paid a visit one afternoon to Mr Ward, who had the company of other neighbours. Whilst they were enjoying themselves over a cheerful bottle, the Jacobite priest thought fit to propose for a toast the health of James the Third, which, from prudence and principle, Mr Ward declined to drink. This irritated the parson so much that he threatened to drive him from the town, and from that time he lost his business. After this occurrence the spirit of malevolence was further manifested in the following imprecation written upon his door :

“Curse and confusion, hell and damnation,
Be to Ward and his generation.”

The machinations of his enemies at length obliged him to leave the town, and he settled at Nuneaton, in the same county. Whether it was here or at Coleshill that he became connected with De Foe, is uncertain; but if it was at the last-mentioned place, it must have been previously to March, 1712, when Mr Ward was still at Coleshill. Their scheme, whatever it was, proved unsuccessful, and Mr Ward suffered considerably in his fortune by it. The seeds of Jacobitism were sown at Coleshill by Mr Kettlewell, who was dispossessed of the vicarage for refusing the oaths to the government in 1690. Thomas Carte, the historian, seems to have possessed the living at this time, and was zealous in propagating the same anti-revolution principles. Badger was probably his curate. The political bias of the inhabitants was owing principally to the influence of Lord Digby, who owned most of the town, and was patron of the living. Being himself a friend to the Stuarts, he took care to place such clergymen there as were zealously attached to his own politics. Under such instructors, it is no wonder that the people went astray. *

* The folly of persecution De Foe has strikingly portrayed in the following narrative :—“A certain corporation town, having abundance of poor, large manufactories, and great trade, was thus circumstanced :—The magistrates, mayor, aldermen, and town-council, were all Churchmen; the master manufacturers were generally Dissenters; at least, being twelve in number, nine of them were so, and the other three had the smallest business; so that the government of the town was Tory and the trade Whig. The times running hard upon the Dissenters, the laws were put in execution against them in most places; and the magistrates, pushed on by the parson, fell upon them here also. Two meeting-houses which they had in the town were immediately demolished, many of the people sent to prison, their ministers driven five miles off by the Corporation Act, and the chief of the Dissenters prosecuted in the Ecclesiastical Courts, to excommunication, seizing of their goods, and all manner of extremities. A gentleman about six miles from the place, who was a Dissenter, and had a good estate in that country, invited two of the principal persecuted tradesmen to shelter with him, and gave them two houses rent-free in his village; their two ministers he entertained in his house, and there they preached every Sabbath-day. The two tradesmen finding themselves easy here, which they could not be in the neighbouring

Whilst De Foe was occupied in the peaceful pursuits of industry, the news-writers assailed his character for the purpose of destroying his credit. The real ground of offence was the assistance he afforded to the ministers by advocating a peace; but they betrayed their malice in diverging from that topic to his private misfortunes. One of the writers of whom he had thus to complain was Ridpath, who succeeded Tutchin in the conduct of the 'Observator.' "Instead of confining himself to public matters," says De Foe, "he descends to personalities, and, for want of better arguments, reproaches me with private misfortunes, things altogether foreign to the matter in hand, and which he can on no honourable pretence mention, but merely renovare dolorem. While, to make good the deficiency of his reasoning, he frequently called me bankrupt, I held my tongue, supposing he took that for a good proof that I was wrong in all I said; for how should a bankrupt have any sense? Or, how should he argue who could not pay his debts? But finding this would not move me, he comes closer, and publishes in the 'Observator' that nobody will trust me with a shilling. This, indeed, though it were true, as I thank God it is a premeditated untruth, weighs not one grain in the scale of his argument; yet it forces me to speak a word or two more than I designed. If I had not at this time in the lawful pursuit of my business, by which, and not by writing, as he does, I get my bread, support a large family, and honestly set apart the overplus, all which this malicious person has thus endeavoured to blast and overthrow,—if, I say, I had not in the course of this business, even at this time, the trust of several thousand pounds in my hands,—if I had not, since the misfortune he reproaches me with, been trusted both with public and private money above the value of 100,000*l.*, and if I was not every day oppressed with credit of both goods and money, by friends whom I act for, much more than I desire, all which business and credit he has done his utmost to ruin and prevent, I should have said nothing. But as this is my case, justice to myself, my family, and such as are daily trusting me, obliges me to take this notice of it."

De Foe then refers him to several persons of his own acquaintance who had trusted him with a thousand pounds at a time, which he had faithfully discharged; and observes, "Had what he says been true, he, a professed Dissenter, ought not to have mentioned it, since thereby he only calls to mind how I suffered 3,500*l.* loss for a cause that he owns, and a party which he ought to have more respect for than to force me to upbraid them with unkindness, and to tell how easily I could have prevented that loss with advantage, if I would have betrayed honest men, even some who have since forgotten the obligation. But, as he can, without any just provocation, thus attempt to ruin and overthrow a family corporation, soon removed their families and working servants, and settled in the village; such of the weavers and other work-people as were dependent upon them for employment soon followed, and the poor of the village soon found the sweets of it. In a short time three more of the masters, with all their et ceteras, followed the example, and in less than two years all the nine master manufacturers removed, so that the village could not receive the people that followed. Some built houses, the lord of the manor letting them land, and giving them all imaginable encouragement. In the meantime the persecution of Dissenters slackened, and they began to preach openly in the new town. This also drew many from the corporation, and the trade increasing with the people, the village grew up to a great town. All this while the corporation town decayed, the employment of the people was gone, the weight of the poor not only remained but increased, insomuch that the rate was doubled. The people ran all away, not to the village only, but to the meeting-house too, to make their court to the masters for work. These, remembering how they had been used, encouraged chiefly those that were Dissenters, so that hundreds went to the meeting-house who used to go to church, for fear of losing their work. By the industry of some and the charity of others, all their real poor were provided for, and the few that remained in the Tory corporation served only to show the ruins of a good town, and the fatal effects of cruelty and persecution. Some corporations in England besides C——," observes De Foe, "may take a hint from this story."—Review, viii, 711, 712.

struggling with a known and unwearied diligence to recover its misfortunes, and do justice to all the world, so I cheerfully depend upon it, that God will not suffer so malicious a purpose to have its effect." De Foe then gives notice that he is ready to return all goods, money, and effects entrusted to him, to such persons as may have been rendered uneasy by this villanous attempt to stab his reputation.* This was not the only occasion upon which our author had to complain of the injustice of Ridpath; but he meets his attacks with gentleness, and scorns to return the ill-language that was meted out to him by his adversary. "I own it is my affliction," says he, "to be used so, having not given the least occasion; but it is my duty when reviled not to revile again. Time, perhaps, will better inform any one that these people shall deceive; I only remember that this same man assailed me in the very same manner with being employed by the late ministry, and flew as much in their faces for mismanagement, and in mine too for defending them, as he does now. And yet he cannot charge me with one word which contradicts anything I said then, nor reflecting on the cause I ever espoused, which I hope is the cause of truth. I might go back to his reviling King William, but I say no more; nor shall I give any more answers to anything he thinks fit to say, till he can assume so much of the Christian as to say nothing but what he can prove, and so much of the gentleman as to give good language."†

De Foe's next production was a pamphlet, entitled 'The Conduct of Parties in England, more especially of those Whigs who now appear against the new Ministry, and a Treaty of Peace. London, 1712;' wherein much information is brought together relating to the factions of the reign, and the party distinctions by which they were known. In exposing the inconsistency of the Whigs, the author abstains from those terms of vituperation which were dealt out against them by the Tories, and censures them chiefly for joining with a set of men who were equally enemies to the late and present ministry.

Next appeared 'The Present State of Parties in Great Britain: Particularly an Inquiry into the State of the Dissenters in England, and the Presbyterians in Scotland. 1712.' A work containing a good historical view of the times, illustrated by some useful documents, and abounding in good sense and manly feeling.

The delicate hand with which De Foe now touched the acts of the government, and his forbearance upon topics which must have deeply engaged his feelings, induced many to suspect that he was bribed by the ministers. But the suggestion was as unfounded as it was unworthy; his conduct being wholly governed by prudential motives, and by delicacy towards the chief minister, from whom he had formerly received benefits. Some printed papers having been circulated to his disadvantage, he thought it necessary to interpose the following defence:—

"I remember a malcontent of a reign not many years behind us, whether he wrote Pagan or Protestant 'Post-Boys,' 'Examiners,' or what, authors are not agreed, when an argument was brought a little too close to him, said, 'Sir, you would rail as I do, if you were not bribed.'—'Ay,' replied the other, 'and you would be quieter than I, if anybody would bribe you.'" Upon this De Foe remarks, "Three sorts of men always rail at a government. First, those whose opinion of their own merit makes them think they are never well enough rewarded. The second sort are those who having enjoyed favours, but being found unworthy, are discarded from their offices; these always rail as if they had never been obliged. But we have a third sort of people who always go with their mouths open, in order to have them stopped; like a sort of dogs I have met with, that, when they attend under your table, bark that they may be fed. I remember a man of some note who practised this with great success, and canted a long while in the House of Commons about abuses in the management, misapplying the public treasure, making felonious treaties, and the like ; but a wise old fox no sooner halved his den to this badger, but he put a stop to the clamour, and the nation's treasure was never misapplied since, because a good share of it ran his way." Our author here alludes to John Howe, M.P., in this and the former reign, who was made joint pay-master of the forces with Sir Stephen Fox.

Our author continues, "He that takes a bribe is a traitor to his own principles and to his country. It has been the fate of these nations to be always plagued with such vermin ; but I never knew any real good come of buying them off, and therefore just governments always let them alone." De Foe intimates that the railers of his day were of too little importance to be bought off. "For my own part, I must needs be perfectly free from the scandal ; and if the rest had not more vanity, they would leave off expecting it. I do not believe many of the writers of this age were ever offered a bribe ; and I'll clear them of that scandal upon the same foot as I do myself, believing that the ministry know better what to do with their money ; therefore, whatever honour they do me that way, I am in no condition to return it. I have written this upon account of two printed papers relating to myself, of which the authors have so far owned themselves ashamed as to let them but just see the world and retire : and upon account of those who boast of their being employed by the government, when what they write is scandalous even to human society."

The Preface to the eighth volume of the 'Review,' published at this period, gives a narrative of the treatment he had received during its progress, and relates some affecting particulars of his past life, as well as of the existing state of his circumstances. Although the narrative is rather long, yet it throws so much light upon his personal affairs, and is so descriptive of his real character, that to suppress it would deprive the present work of an important document.

"I have now finished the eighth volume of this work, and as this particular part has been the subject of as much clamour and noise as any of the former, though on a different account, and from different people, I cannot close it without giving some account both of it and of myself. From the beginning of this undertaking, which I have now carried on almost ten years, I have always, according to the best of my judgment, calculated it for the support and defence of truth and liberty. I was not so weak when I began as not to expect enemies, and that by speaking plain, both to persons and things, I should exasperate many against both the work and the author, and in that expectation I have not been deceived.

"I confess I did not expect that if the same truth summoned me to differ from the people I was serving, they would treat me as they do for it. I own I thought an uninterrupted fidelity, and steady adhering to an honest principle for near forty years, would have been some plea in my behalf, and, if not, that suffering the shipwreck of my fortunes, which were at that time recovering, and by the bounty of his late majesty, in a fair way of being restored ; suffering all the indignities, penalties, and punishments, an enraged party could inflict upon me, and above three thousand pounds loss ; I say I thought this might have lodged a little in the breasts of my friends, and might have allowed them at least to examine, before they condemned me, whether they did me wrong or no.

"I thought that while I had given such proof that I could neither be bribed from the truth, or threatened, or terrified from my principles, it might at least be a ground for impartial, honest men to examine before they censured me. But I have found all this in vain ; and as if forfeiting my reason as well as my estate were a debt from me to the party I espoused, I am now hunted with a full cry, Acteon like, by my own friends, I won't call them hounds, in spite of protested innocence and want of evidence against the genuine sense of what I write, against fair arguing, against all modesty and sense, condemned by common clamour as writing for money, for particular persons, by great men's directions, and the like ; every tittle of which I have the testimony of my own conscience is abominably false, and the accusers must have the accusation of their own consciences that they do not know it to be true.

" I cannot say it has not given me a great deal of disturbance ; for an ungrateful treatment by a people that I had run all manner of risk for, and thought I could have died for, cannot but touch a less sensible temper than I think mine to be ; but I thank God that operation is over, and I endeavour to make other uses of it than perhaps the people themselves think I do. First, I look in, and upon the narrowest search I can make of my own thoughts, desires, and designs, I find a clear untainted principle, and consequently an entire calm of conscience, founded upon the satisfying sense, that I neither am touched with bribes, guided or influenced by fear, favour, hope, dependence, or reward from any person or party under heaven ; and that I have written, and do write, nothing but what is my native, free, undirected opinion and judgment, and which was so many years ago, as I think I made unanswerably appear by the very last 'Review' of this volume.

" Next, I look up, and without examining into His ways, the sovereignty of whose providence I adore, I submit with an entire resignation to whatever happens to me, as being by the immediate direction of that goodness, and for such wise and glorious ends as, however I may not yet see through, will at last issue in good, even to me ; fully depending that I shall yet be delivered from the power of slander and reproach, and the sincerity of my conduct be yet cleared up to the world ; and if not, Te Deum laudamus.

" In the third place, I look back on the people who treat me thus, who, notwithstanding under the power of their prejudices they fly upon me with a fury that I think unchristian and unjust ; yet as I doubt not the day will still come when they will be again undeceived in me, I am far from studying their injury, or doing myself justice at their expense, which I could do with great advantage. It is impossible for the Dissenters in this nation to provoke me to be an enemy to their interest ; should they fire my house, sacrifice my family, and assassinate my life, I would ever requite them in defending their cause, and standing to the last against all those that should endeavour to weaken or reproach it. But this is, as I think it, a just and righteous cause, founded upon the great principle of truth and liberty, which I am well assured I shall never abandon. Not that I am insensible of being ill treated by them, or that I make any court to their persons. When any party of men have not a clear view of their own case, or a right knowledge of their own interest, he that will serve them, and knows the way to do it, must be certain not to please them, and must be able to see them revile and reproach him, and use him in the worst manner imaginable, without being moved either to return them ill, or refrain from doing them good ; and this is the true meaning of that command which I thank God I cheerfully obey, viz. to pray for them that despitefully use me. I have not so ill an opinion of myself as not to think I merit better usage from the Dissenters, and I have not so ill an opinion of the Dissenters as not to think they will some time or other know their friends from their enemies better than they do now ; nor have I so far forgot my friends as not to own a great many of them do already. I remember the time when the same people treated me in the same manner upon the book called 'The Shortest Way,' &c., and nothing but suffering for them would ever open their eyes. He that cleared up my integrity then can do it again by the same method, and I leave it to him. Ad te quacunqve vocas is my rule ; my study and practice is patience and resignation ; and in this I triumph over all the indignity, reproach, slander, and raillery in the world ; in this I enjoy, in the midst of a million of enemies, a perfect peace and tranquillity ; and when they misconstrue my words, pervert the best meaning, turn everything which I say their own way, it gives me no other contemplation than this : how vain is the opinion of men, either when they judge well or ill.

“ I have made such protestations of my receiving no reward or directions whatever for this work, as none but those who are used to prevaricate themselves can, upon any foundation that is consistent with Christianity, suspect, and the circumstances I labour under are a corroborating evidence of the truth of it ; yet, without grounds, without evidence, without any testimony but general notion, they will have it to be otherwise ; two of their authors have the impudence to assert it, but not one step have they taken to prove it, nor can they do it, though both openly challenged to do it, and a hundred guineas offered upon the proof of it. Thus they give the lie and the rascal to themselves without my help, who quietly let them go on their own way. My measures are, to the best of my judgment, steady ; what I approve I defend, what I dislike I censure, without any respect of persons ; only endeavouring to give my reasons, and to make it appear that I approve and dislike upon good and sufficient grounds ; which being first well assured of, the time is yet to come that I ever refrain to speak my mind for fear of the face of man. If what I have said were false, my enemies would certainly choose to answer rather than to rail ; but as I have unanswerable truth, they choose to rail rather than to answer.

“ I have lived too long, and seen too much, not to know that all those violent party feuds are of short duration ; and we see the very men I now speak of, approve to-day what they were loudest against but yesterday. It is my disinterested study to serve them, but I confess 'tis not so to please them ; I shall never leave off to wish well to their interest, and can I but serve it, they shall have leave to throw stones at me as long as I live. But this does by no means hinder but that I may, and ever shall, as the best mark of my zeal for their interest, tell them plainly their mistakes.

“ This passion I have for their interest fills me with resentment at the barbarity of the treatment which the Dissenters have received in the affair of the Occasional Bill, and that from a people they had deserved other usage from ; and in this, as I said before, I do them but justice. That they themselves are so easy under it as not only to make no complaint, but even to say it has done them no harm, is an evidence of their unconquerable passion to a particular view, which I believe they will always be disappointed in ; since it is evident this has ruined the interest of the Whigs in almost all the corporations in England, and put them into such a posture as never but by miracle to recover it. I pity the delusion of those who entertain a notion, that if ever the Low Churchmen come to the administration, they will restore the Dissenters. I grant it would be both just and generous so to do, but if they will first show me one Low Churchman in the nation of any figure, that, however he may exclaim at the method, does not appear secretly satisfied that it is done, then I'll join in expecting it. But I shall farther show them the vanity of these hopes in my other discourses upon this head. We need not wonder at the other mistakes we see some people run into, when they are so intent upon the party interest they push at, that they are contented to be the sacrifice offered up for the purchase of human help to carry it on ; in all which unchristian course we have seen them effectually disappointed, and I must own, till I see another spirit among them, I do not look for their deliverance.

“ To return to my own case. I am a stoic in whatever may be the event of things. I'll do and say what I think is a debt to justice and truth, without the least regard to clamour and reproach ; and as I am utterly unconcerned at human opinion, the people that throw away their breath so freely in censuring me, may consider of some better improvement to make of their passions than to waste them on a man that is both above and below the reach of them. I know too much of the world to expect good in it, and have learnt to value it too little to be concerned at the evil. I have gone through a life of wonders, and am the subject of a vast variety of providences; I have been fed more by miracle than Elijah, when the ravens were his purveyors. I have some time ago summed up the scenes of my life in this distich:

“No man has tasted differing fortunes more,
And thirteen times I have been rich and poor.”

“In the school of affliction I have learnt more philosophy than at the academy, and more divinity than from the pulpit; in prison I have learnt to know that liberty does not consist in open doors, and the free egress and regress of locomotion. I have seen the rough side of the world as well as the smooth; and have, in less than half a year, tasted the difference between the closet of a king and the dungeon of Newgate. I have suffered deeply for cleaving to principles, of which integrity I have lived to say, none but those I suffered for ever reproached me with it. The immediate causes of my suffering have been the being betrayed by those I have trusted, and scorning to betray those who trusted me. To the honour of English gratitude I have this remarkable truth to leave behind me—that I was never so basely betrayed as by those whose families I had preserved from starving, nor so basely treated as by those I starved my own family to preserve. The same chequer work of fortune attends me still; the people I have served, and love to serve, cut my throat every day, because I will not cut the throats of those that have served and assisted me. Ingratitude has always been my aversion, and perhaps for that reason it is my exercise.

“And now I live under universal contempt, which contempt I have learned to contemn, and have an uninterrupted joy in my soul; not at my contempt, but that no crime can be laid to my charge to make that contempt my due. Fame, a lying jade, would talk me up for I know not what of courage, and they call me a fighting fellow. I despise the flattery; I profess to know nothing of it, farther than truth makes any man bold; and I acknowledge, that give me but a bad cause, and I am the greatest coward in the world. Truth inspires nature; and as in defence of truth no honest man can be a coward, so no man of sense can be bold when he is in the wrong. He that is honest must be brave, and it is my opinion that a coward cannot be an honest man. In defence of truth I think (pardon me that I dare go no further, for who knows himself?) I say, I think I could dare to die; but a child may beat me if I am in the wrong. Guilt gives trembling to the hands, blushing to the face, and fills the heart with amazement and terror. I question whether there is much, if any, difference between bravery and cowardice, but what is founded in the principle they are engaged for; and I no more believe any man is born a coward than that he is born a knave. Truth makes a man of courage, and guilt makes that man a coward.

“Early disasters, and frequent turns of my affairs, have left me incumbered with an insupportable weight of debt; and the remarkable compassion of some creditors, after continued offers of stripping myself naked by entire surrenders upon oath, have never given me more trouble than they were able, or less than they knew how; by which means most of the debts I have discharged have cost me forty shillings in the pound, and the creditor half as much to recover. I have a large family, a wife and six children, who never want what they should enjoy, or spend what they ought to save. Under all these circumstances, and many more, too long to write, my only happiness is this: I have always been kept cheerful, easy, and quiet, enjoying a perfect calm of mind, clearness of thought, and satisfaction not to be broken in upon by whatever may happen to me. If any man ask me how I arrived to it, I answer him, in short, by a constant serious application to the great, solemn, and weighty work of resignation to the will of heaven; by which let no man think I presume. I have endeavoured, and am in a great measure able to say feelingly and effectually, the following lines, which I recommend to the world, not only as the fruit of my own experience, but for the practice of all such as know how to value it, and think they need it." De Foe here inserts a poem of a hundred and sixteen lines, expressive of his contempt of the world, and his acquiescence in the will of Providence, under whatever fate may be determined for him.

CHAPTER XV.

THE subject that now engrossed the principal share of public attention, was the negotiation for peace. The preliminaries, after much altercation with the allies, being at length adjusted, they were communicated to the British parliament upon the 6th of June, 1712. When the terms became known, they created loud murmurs in the nation; nor were they better received upon the continent. Much dexterity was used to procure them a favourable reception in parliament, where the Duke of Marlborough said, "they were directly contrary to her majesty's engagements with her allies, sullied the triumphs and glories of her reign, and would render the English name odious to all other nations."* In spite of remonstrance, an address of concurrence was hastily voted; and to prevent any further discussion of so disagreeable a subject, the ministers adjourned the parliament upon the 21st of June, and thus relieved themselves from a storm of opposition with which they were threatened.

The most difficult part they had now to encounter, was to reconcile the people to their measures; and in the course of the year the country was deluged with publications for and against the peace, which occasioned a great fluctuation in public opinion. The war of the pen was carried on with the most acrimonious feelings, and both sides descended to the grossest personalities. In order to fix an odium upon the late ministers, and to justify an unmanly persecution, charges of fraud and peculation were brought against them. Libels to this effect were circulated against Marlborough, Godolphin, and Walpole; whilst the purity and patriotism of their successors were lauded in the most extravagant strains. "In those times, nothing was more common than crimes without any accuser, judgment without consideration, and condemnation without either defence or punishment."† Those who opposed the terms of the peace, were either treated with extreme insolence, or harassed with prosecutions at law,‡ whilst the hirelings of the ministry were allowed to riot in reproach and slander, and to attack the strong-holds of the constitution with impunity. The allies, who had contributed so essentially to the glory of the English arms, were now shamefully traduced; charges of treachery and misconduct in the war were heaped upon them; and they were accused of entertaining designs subversive of the trade and other interests of the British empire.

Amongst the productions of the period, was 'A Letter from a Tory Freeholder to his Representative in Parliament, upon her Majesty's most gracious speech to both Houses on the subject of Peace, June 6, 1712.' London, 1712. 8vo. The writer, who was a Whig in disguise, lavishes much of his abuse upon De Foe, whom he accuses of changing sides, and brings forward other charges, made before by Oldmixon, who was probably the author of this pamphlet. He says, "that the Whigs now universally disowned him;" and amongst other calumnies, he accuses De Foe of advocating a war with the Dutch, who, in consequence of the policy pursued in England, showed a disposition to continue the war in conjunction with the Emperor. But for such a charge there was not the least foundation, and it could only have arisen from a desire in the Whigs to identify De Foe with the ministers, who during the negociation displayed anything but friendly feelings towards the Dutch. In reply to the charge, he says, "If it be, as some pretend, in the last foreign news, that we are now running headlong into a war with the Dutch, which I look upon as the worst circumstance that can befall this nation, I shall convince those who would maliciously suggest me to be writing for it, that they are in the wrong. It has been all along my argument, and I have seen no answer to it, that Britain and Holland are the essential strength of the Protestant interest in Europe; and in that respect their interests are inseparable. It is for uniting these that I have always pleaded against the union of Spain with any Popish power in Europe. I appeal to all who read what I write, that the dividing this great prize has been my aim all along, though reproached and misunderstood. The safety and prosperity of the Protestant interest depend upon the joint power of the confederated Protestants, and this must be built upon the union of the British and Dutch. . . . I profess to be as entirely against a war with the Dutch as it is possible for any man that has the good of his country at heart. But if men were to read other people as they read me, truth may be turned into falsehood, and the Scripture into blasphemy."

The treaty of peace, after a protracted negociation, was at length signed at Utrecht, upon the 11th of April, 1713. The English ministers had grown weary of its delay, which was occasioned by the address of the French negociators, who, taking advantage of the discord that reigned amongst the allies, added to their demands, and extorted concessions which they could not have meditated but for the misplaced confidence of the English court. Intimidated by hostile threats, which in all probability were never meant to be executed, the Dutch became a party to the peace; but the emperor continued the war a year longer, when, finding himself unequal to maintain it single-handed, he sought refuge in a treaty. Thus, a war which had been conducted for so many years with unexampled success, was concluded with satisfaction only to the enemy. The objects for which the nation had embarked in it was entirely abandoned; the fruits of many splendid victories, obtained at an immense cost of blood and treasure, were wantonly thrown away; and the repose which the ministers expected to derive from it was disturbed by factions in the cabinet, which in a short time accomplished its overthrow.

In the odium shared by those writers who supported the peace De Foe largely participated. From the commencement of the treaty he had declared himself a friend to peace, provided it could be obtained upon honourable terms. These, it is true, he never defined very explicitly; but he always contended for a partition of the Spanish dominions, according to the spirit of the Partition Treaty, and from this point he never severed. In expounding his opinions he showed no slight degree of tact, and argued in terms much too general to entitle him to the character of a partizan. It is evident from his writings that he never appeared as the ostensible advocate of the ministers, nor committed himself to an approval of their policy, except upon some commercial matters that accorded with his judgment. His attachment to Harley was indeed so far a snare to him as to impose silence upon those points of his policy which he could not approve, and to prevent that bold avowal of his opinions to which he gave free scope under the former ministry. This forbearance of hostility was construed by his opponents into an approbation of the ministers, and gave rise to the calumny of his being one of their retainers. For this, however, there was not the smallest foundation; and if, in the early part of their career, he gave them credit for principles which but ill accorded with their subsequent conduct, it must be set down to his confidence in the chief minister, and his desire to make the best of a ministry which he could not avoid. After the peace was concluded, he thought it his duty to acquiesce in it, although he did not approve of its stipulations; but this acquiescence being construed by the Whigs into a tacit approval, he became obnoxious to their resentment equally with those who wrote expressly in its defence. A writer of these times, referring to what De Foe had written on the subject, says, "I know that author to be a sensible and judicious man ; for his honesty and integrity, let him defend himself as well as he can ;" * and the writer goes on to treat our author as a political apostate, associating him with Swift, Dyer, and Roper, in no measured terms of censure. As the writers just mentioned were the constant supporters of the ministers, it is rather remarkable that they should have been amongst the most inveterate of De Foe's political opponents, and it is of itself a sufficient confutation of the calumnies of the Whigs. In the 'Appeal to Honour and Justice' will be found a clear and explicit avowal of his sentiments upon this subject.

Finding himself ill treated by all parties, De Foe says he declined writing at all, and for a great part of a year never set pen to paper, except for the 'Review.' To avoid public clamour, he now withdrew to the north of England, and it was probably at this time that he took up his abode in Yorkshire. In Watson's 'History of Halifax,' he is mentioned amongst the distinguished residents in that town, and is said to have lodged at the sign of the Rose and Crown in the Back lane. Watson adds, that he was forced to abscond for his political writings, which was very possibly the fact. De Foe here cultivated an acquaintance with Dr Nettleton, the physician, and Mr Nathaniel Priestley, the dissenting minister, ancestor of the celebrated writer of that name.

Of the first separate publication upon which our author employed himself in his retirement, he has given the following account :—" Observing the insolence of the Jacobite party, and how they insinuated fine things into the heads of the common people of the right and claim of the Pretender, and of the great things he would do for us if he was to come in—of his being to turn Protestant—of his being resolved to maintain our liberties, support our funds, give liberty to Dissenters, and the like ; and finding that the people began to be deluded, and that the Jacobites gained ground among them by these insinuations, I thought it the best service I could do to the Protestant interest, and the best way to open the people's eyes to the advantages of the Protestant succession, if I took some course effectually to alarm the people with what they really ought to expect if the Pretender should come to be king ; and this made me set pen to paper again."

De Foe continues: "In order to detect the influence of Jacobite emissaries, as above, the first thing I wrote was a small tract, called 'A Seasonable Caution,' a book sincerely written to open the eyes of the poor ignorant country people, and to warn them against the subtle insinuations of the emissaries of the Pretender. And, that it might be effectual to that purpose, I prevailed with several of my friends to give them away among the poor people all over England, especially in the north ; and several thousands were actually given away, the price being reduced so low, that the bare expense of paper and press was only reserved, that every one might be convinced that nothing of gain was designed, but a sincere endeavour to do a public good, and assist to keep the people entirely in the interest of the Protestant succession.†" The whole title of the work is, 'A Seasonable Caution and Warning against the Insinuations of Papists and Jacobites in favour of the Pretender. London : 1712.' 8vo.

With the same laudable design of awakening the nation to a sense of its danger, De Foe published three pamphlets in quick succession, which drew upon him the vengeance of the Whigs. Having already treated the subject argumentatively, and exhausted all the arts of persuasion in his former writings, he now sought to make an impression by the language of irony. Although he concealed his object with a dexterity suited to such a style of writing, without which he could not hope to gain a hearing from those who had been deluded by the Jacobites, yet his real design could be scarcely un-perceived by the dullest comprehension. The titles he selected for his pamphlets corresponded with the ruse de guerre which he played off in their contents, and are as follows:—1. ‘An Answer to the Question that Nobody thinks of, viz. But what if the Queen should die? London: printed for J. Baker. 1713.’ 2. ‘Reasons against the Succession of the House of Hanover; with an Inquiry how far the Abdication of King James, supposing it to be legal, ought to affect the Person of the Pretender. Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur. London: printed for J. Baker. 1713.’ 3. ‘And what if the Pretender should come? Or some Considerations of the Advantages and real Consequences of the Pretender’s possessing the Crown of Great Britain.’ London: printed for J. Baker. 1713.’ 8vo.

No one at all acquainted with the writings of De Foe, or even moderately conversant with the satires of the day, could possibly mistake his tactics upon this occasion. Indeed, he carried the burlesque in some passages so far, that even the most devoted admirers of the Pretender must have been startled at their contents, and have had their eyes open to the real intentions of the writer.

With regard to the first of these pamphlets, the object of the writer is not so much to answer the question in his title, which he does not attempt, as to excite such an inquiry in his readers as would enable them to answer it themselves.

De Foe’s next pamphlet, although written with greater artifice, is such a palpable banter upon those who would receive the Pretender, that the dullest capacity, one would imagine, could hardly mistake him. In the third tract, our author adduces a variety of mock reasons why the Pretender should be palatable to the nation, and enlarges upon the blessings that would be derived from his government, but in a strain of burlesque that rendered it a visible jest upon the proceedings of the party. For instance, he recommends the Pretender by saying, that the prince would “confer on every one the privilege of wearing wooden shoes, and at the same time ease the nobility and gentry of the hazard and expense of winter journeys to parliament.” These productions were so well approved by the most zealous friends of the Protestant succession, that they passed through several editions, and many thousands were circulated through the kingdom. It also appears from De Foe’s own account that they were so well timed as to produce a considerable impression in favour of the house of Hanover. Yet, absurd as it may appear, they rendered him obnoxious to the charge of Jacobitism, and brought upon him a storm of persecution, which, but for the intervention of his friend Lord Oxford, might have been attended with serious consequences. By his efforts to cool the warlike spirit of the times, he had incurred the resentment of the Whigs, who unjustly considered him as a retainer of the ministers, and implicated him in all their measures. In these warm times, a zeal for party betrayed men into inconsistencies, which led to a gross perversion of justice. The Whigs either fancied themselves, or endeavoured to induce a belief, that all who were not of their party were no better than Jacobites. By this fallacy they measured their opinion of the ministers; but whatever countenance the conduct of some of them might give to it, the sentence was far too general to be just. As it respects De Foe, he had already given abundant proof of his zeal for the Protestant succession; and those who had but the ordinary allotment of common sense, might have easily found it in these pamphlets. But the Whigs were eager to vent their malice upon a writer who had now become the object of their hatred, and in their haste to seize upon this occasion they only proclaimed their own stupidity.

By the absurd zeal of William Benson, a Whig writer, the author of the famous letter to the Jacobites, the same who raised a statue to Milton, and who afterwards became ridiculously famous for literary exploits, which justly raised him to the honour of the Dunciad, a prosecution was now commenced against our author for the three pamphlets above mentioned. It was undertaken at Benson’s private cost; and private malice giving a spur to his exertions, he spared neither pains nor expense to accomplish our author's ruin. He first caused several of the pamphlets to be purchased and marked for evidence against the publishers. Through them he obtained the name of the printer, who was threatened with legal proceedings, which induced him to give information upon oath against De Foe as the author. From this person he obtained possession of the original manuscripts, in De Foe's own hand, or rather hands, says Oldmixon, for they were every one of them different; and all the three being proved by one of the printer's servants before the Lord Chief Justice Parker, his lordship granted a warrant for his apprehension. This being effected, after some difficulty, he was brought before the same judge, who ordered him to be kept in safe custody until he could find bail, with directions to send proper notice of their names and places of abode to the solicitor for the prosecution. Mr Benson endeavoured to retain the Attorney-General, Sir Edward Northey, and offered him ten guineas to appear against De Foe; but he declined it, telling him that he could not be concerned in the prosecution without an order from a secretary of state. Oldmixon informs us that he then went to another eminent counsel, who made no difficulty, but entered very heartily into the prosecution.* De Foe's sureties were J. Grantham, printer, and T. Warner, publisher, who were excepted against by the prosecutor, as "persons of small substance;" when the ministers, finding that the affair was likely to go hard against him if he was left to the vengeance of the Whigs, took it out of Mr Benson's hands, and ordered Mr Borrett, the treasury solicitor, to institute proceedings. Of this he informed the Lord Chief Justice at his chambers, and at the same time signified his approbation of the bail, who were each bound in the sum of four hundred pounds when De Foe was set at liberty. Upon this occasion, Parker forestalled his opinion upon the merits of the case in a manner scarcely decent for a person in his situation, for he told Mr Borrett he was glad the government had undertaken a prosecution so highly requiring its care.†

As the business lingered in its new hands, the former prosecutor, fearful of its slipping through them, frequently waited upon the Attorney-General, to remind him of the prosecution. At length an information was filed against De Foe for a misdemeanor only, contrary to the expectations of the Whigs, who were desirous of indicting him for high treason. Upon the first day of Easter Term, De Foe appeared with his bail in the Court of Queen's Bench, when the Attorney-General acquainted the court with his instructions, and our author was continued out upon his own recognizance. But before he left the court, the Chief Justice called for his 'Reviews' of the 16th and 18th of April, in which our author, prompted by a consciousness of innocence, as well as indignation at his unjust treatment, had made some reflections upon the prosecution, and pointed particularly at the conduct of Parker. Having shown them to De Foe, and obtained his acknowledgment as the writer, he declared them insolent libels; but being himself personally concerned, he left it to the other judges to proceed as they thought fit. The 'Reviews' being then read in court, the judges, who were somewhat infected with the violence of the times, concurred in opinion that they were highly insolent to the Lord Chief Justice, and a notorious contempt of that court, as well as the laws of the nation; and they adjudged the writer to be committed prisoner to the Queen's Bench for the said offences. Mr Chalmers says he was committed to Newgate, from whence he was soon afterwards released upon his making a proper submission. It appears that upon this occasion the court went beforehand in its judgment of the accused works, pronouncing them "scandalous, wicked, and treasonable libels;" so that the author had everything to fear from the issue of a trial. When he excused himself to the court by urging the ironical nature of the performances, his plea was not admitted. Sir Thomas Powis, who had been one of the counsel against the bishops in King James's reign, and was lately promoted to be a judge, set common sense at defiance, wasting much learning in endeavouring to extract a meaning from them, which every dispassionate reader must have known to be beside the real intention of the writer, and he concluded his argument by telling him that they contained matter for which he might be hanged, drawn, and quartered. This ominous intimation was sufficient to shake the nerves of any man who had not conscious innocence to support him. It was fortunate for De Foe that his first benefactor was still in power, and had the disposition as well as ability to befriend him.

Lord Oxford, who was fully acquainted with the real sentiments of De Foe, was not so purblind as to mistake the true drift of his pamphlets; he therefore resolved that he should not be crushed by the malice of the Whigs for an offence purely imaginary. His interference was the more honourable, as he could not but be aware, that in these publications De Foe was actually serving the cause of the Whigs and had given real offence to none but those to whom he looked for support.* Our author justly attributes the prosecution to the resentment of his enemies, who were numerous and powerful, and not so blind to his object as they were desirous to ruin him. No inconsiderable people were heard to say, that they knew the books were against the Pretender, but that De Foe had disobliged them in other things, and they resolved to take this advantage to punish him. The story is the more credible, as he had procured evidence to prove the fact, had the trial proceeded. But this was rendered unnecessary; for before the time appointed for a hearing, a pardon was passed under the Great Seal, which relieved him from any further apprehension upon the subject. This instrument contained an ample refutation of the charges being brought against him, as well as a full and explicit exemption from any consequences that might hereafter happen to him upon account of these publications. This act of justice was produced by the party-writers of the time, as a convincing proof of Lord Oxford's attachment to the Pretender, and of De Foe's Jacobitism! The force of dulness could no further go.†

The treaty of peace had imposed upon the ministers the arduous duty of fixing with foreign powers the future commercial relations of the country. Of the manner in which they performed their task, particularly with regard to France, there were then contradictory opinions, and the subject gave rise to as furious an opposition as any they had been called to sustain. By the terms agreed upon, a free trade was settled according to the tariff of 1664, with the exception of some commodities that had been subjected to new duties by the French king in 1699, and were so high as to amount to a prohibition. The productions of France were to be admitted into England upon the same footing as those of other countries, and a bill was brought into parliament to give effect to the arrangement. But the Treaty of Commerce was no sooner published than it created a general clamour throughout the nation, and many treatises were published to show that it would be destructive of our home manufactures, and of our commerce with other nations. Numerous petitions were forwarded to parliament from London and other trading towns, indicating its injurious consequences; and so strong was the current of opposition upon the last reading of the bill, that it was lost in the Commons by a small majority. Much finesse was resorted to by the ministers in relation to the measure. The treaty is well known to have been the work of Bolingbroke, whose mortification was not displeasing to the treasurer. From political friends they were now become rivals for power, and their alienation, which had been some time in progress, now amounted to an irreconcilable hatred. Oxford, therefore, was far from being chagrined at this expression of public opinion against the treaty; and he abandoned it to its fate before it was finally determined in parliament.

* Bishop Atterbury, in his tract called 'English Advice to the Freeholders of England,' says, "In all the late Tory ministry, there were not above two or three prosecuted for writing; and one of these wrote on their own (the Whig) side, and had done infinite services to their cause."

† This document, together with De Foe's own relation of the whole of this preposterous outrage, will be found in his 'Appeal to Honour and Justice.'

It being a subject with which De Foe was familiar, he now published his treatise, entitled 'An Essay on the Treaty of Commerce with France. With necessary Expositions. London: 1713.' In this work, which appeared whilst the matter was under discussion in parliament, he takes a review of the various treaties with France since the Restoration, in order to show that the subject of commerce had been waived by both parties, and left to its natural course; every state having a right to make such regulations as appear most for the interest of its own subjects. Before the Revolution the trade with France had been carried on under manifest disadvantages; but the heavy duties that were laid upon French goods during the war that followed gave such encouragement to the English manufacturers, that they were continued after the peace, and the balance of trade was turned in our favour. Of this the French king became so sensible that he gave his subjects an equivalent in a new tariff, promulgated in 1699, which restored the equilibrium, but had no influence in procuring an abatement of the duties in England. Upon the renewal of the war fresh prohibitions were imposed by both nations to their mutual detriment, for it destroyed the trade of both countries, the people being made to suffer for the quarrels of their rulers. A fresh adjustment, therefore, became a fit subject for consideration upon the conclusion of a peace. De Foe contends for the principle of a free trade, unencumbered by prohibitions, and with moderate duties, "as not only equal and just, but proceeding on the true interest of trade, and much more to the advantage of Britain than of France."

When De Foe relinquished the 'Review,' he began to write 'A General History of Trade,' which he proposed to publish in monthly numbers. The first number appeared on the 1st of August, 1713. His great design was to show the reader what the whole world is at this time employed in as to trade; but his more immediate end was to rectify the mistakes we had fallen into as to commerce, and to inform those who were willing to inquire into the truth. In the execution of this arduous undertaking he avows his intention of speaking what reason dictates and fact justifies, however he may clash with the popular opinions of some people in trade. He could not, however, wholly abstract himself from the passing scene. When his second number appeared on the 15th of August, 1713, he gave a discourse on the harbour of Dunkirk; wherein he insists that the port ought to be destroyed if it must remain with France, but if added to England, or made a free port, it would be for the good of mankind to have a safe harbour in such dangerous seas. This 'History of Trade,' which exhibits the ingenuity, the strength, and the piety of De Foe, extended only to two numbers. The agitations of the time carried him to other literary pursuits, and its factiousness constrained him to attend to personal security.

His next work was entitled 'Whigs turned Tories, and Hanoverian Tories, from their avowed principles, proved Whigs: or, each Side in the other mistaken, &c. London: 1713.' De Foe had long laboured to compose the differences between the moderate men of both parties, and in so doing received the thanks of neither. There was, indeed, too much exasperating matter afloat in the nation to allow of that calmness of consideration that was necessary for the reconciliation of two parties that were bent upon each other's destruction. The estrangement had been aggravated by almost every measure of the government, and the fierce opposition to it tended but to increase the distance.

About this time the wit that had been sported by both parties during the heats occasioned by Sacheverell's trial, was collected together and published in a volume under the following title : 'Whig and Tory ; or, Wit on both sides. Being a Collection of State Poems upon all remarkable Occurrences, from the Change of the Ministry to this time. By the most eminent Hands of both Parties. Second Edition. London : printed for E. Curll. 1713.' 8vo. De Foe figures several times in this work.

The next work assigned to De Foe is a 'Letter to the Dissenters. London, 1714,' the object of which is to withdraw the persons addressed from their political connexion with the Whigs, who had so shamefully deserted them in the bill against Occasional Conformity. The author disclaims on the part of the ministers any intention to favour the Pretender. The pamphlet, artfully written, seems designed to prepare the dissenters for further severities, which in a short time made their appearance.

The nefarious bill brought into the House of Commons by Sir Wm. Wyndham, Chancellor of the Exchequer, "To prevent the Growth of Schism," the object of which was to shut up all the schools of dissenters throughout the kingdom, and to take out of their hands the education of their own children, formed the theme of De Foe's 'Remedy worse than the Disease ; or, Reasons against passing the Bill for preventing the Growth of Schism. To which is added a brief Discourse of Toleration and Persecution. London, 1714,' a work in which our author pleads the cause of religious liberty with great force and eloquence, and in lively colours exposes the hateful character of intolerance.

Upon the death of Queen Anne (1st August, 1714), the Privy Council immediately assembled, and issued orders for the proclamation of the King (George I), which was performed with the usual solemnities. The suddenness of the event shed a deep gloom over the Jacobites, whose anticipated triumphs were now at once dashed to the ground, for the French King acknowledged the Elector, and declared his intention to keep the peace.

One of the most important consequences resulting from a change of dynasty was the subversion of those political theories which had been hitherto the support of the Tories, but of which they at length grew ashamed ; and which, losing their credit with the people, found refuge only in a few of the clergy. In effecting this change the character of the new government had a great share. Before the arrival of the King, who did not come to England until seven weeks after the Queen's death, Bolingbroke was dismissed with marks of disgrace, and the other ministers were replaced by persons better affected to the Protestant interest, and more agreeable to the wishes of the nation. In the exasperated state of political parties nothing but the severest retaliations were now expected. The Whigs considered the day their own, and began to triumph in the fall of their opponents ; all their misdeeds were immediately dragged to view, and those who had been the most deeply concerned were threatened with exemplary punishment ; the most unmanly insults were heaped upon those who were considered in any way accessory to their measures ; nor did any escape who had not run the full career of opposition with the Whigs.

Of these attacks our author came in for a full share. His connexion with Lord Oxford was alone sufficient to preclude him from the favour of the Whigs, whilst on other grounds he was equally obnoxious to the Tories and Jacobites. De Foe's position, in fact, was as singular as it was painful. The Hanover Succession, which was a just cause of triumph, and an infinite source of benefit to the Whigs, had not met with a more zealous and effective champion than our author ; yet now, instead of being rewarded for his past services and sufferings, he was discountenanced by the government, and maligned by a party that reaped the advantage of his labours. It was at this period that he lost the appointment or pension for which he had been indebted to the fallen minister ; and, in short, whilst upon public grounds he had reason to congratulate his countrymen upon their recent triumph, such was the untowardness of his own fate, that to himself it was only productive of loss and affliction. Of the hard usage that was now dealt out to him he speaks in touching language in his 'Appeal to Honour and Justice.'

Shortly after the Queen's death there appeared a considerable pamphlet, entitled 'The Secret History of the White Staff ; being an account of affairs under the conduct of some late Ministers ; and of what might probably have happened if her Majesty had not died. London : J. Baker. 1714.' It was followed by a second part, with a similar title, in the same year ; and in the year following a third part was added, completing the work. The object of this work, which has been almost universally assigned to De Foe, was to explain the policy pursued by Lord Oxford, from the time of his supplanting the former Whig Ministry, and to elucidate the conduct of his colleagues, until they succeeded in wresting from him the Treasurer's staff of office, a month or two before the Queen died. The work was considered at the time to have been written under the direction of Harley, and the facts it details certainly throw very great light upon the intrigues of his cabinet, which, being composed of persons directly opposed to the views of its chief, produced a long series of conflicts, and a system of counteraction that operated as a check to his policy, and at length undermined his power. The work passed through several editions in a short time, and met with several replies, none of them of any great weight.

De Foe's next publication was a reply to a pamphlet by Atterbury, entitled 'English Advice to the Freeholders of England,' which was followed by 'A Hymn to the Mob. London : 1715,' a poem in Pindaric verse, occasioned by the rioting that took place in various parts of England, to demonstrate the loyalty of the High Church party.

De Foe's political life was now drawing to a close. During a period of more than thirty years he had taken an active part in public affairs, either as a warm partisan of liberal politics, or in opposing the factions of the times. In the course of the contest he had been involved in personal quarrels, and had met with some severe disasters ; but the fortitude of his mind at all times rose superior to his difficulties, and enabled him to triumph in the rectitude of his principles. He had now arrived at a period of life when the mind seeks repose from the turbulence of faction ; and the course of political events having thrown him in the back-ground, he beat out a new path to fame.

In withdrawing from the tumult of parties, De Foe considered that he had an account to settle with the world, for the part he had taken in politics. The ill usage he had so long experienced both from friends and enemies, but more particularly the former, whose ingratitude touched him most sensibly, was greatly aggravated by the misconstruction that had been put upon his writings. This now led him to take a review of his political life, and produced a narrative distinguished for its simplicity and manliness, whilst it furnishes a satisfactory defence of his conduct. It is entitled, 'An Appeal to Honour and Justice, though it be of his worst Enemies. By Daniel De Foe. Being a true Account of his Conduct in Public Affairs. London, 1715.'

Whilst engaged upon this narrative, and before he had fully completed it, De Foe was struck with apoplexy. The ill-treatment he had experienced preyed so much upon his spirits as to undermine his health, and, in the opinion of his friends, was the accelerating cause of this calamity. After languishing six months, with an uncertain prospect of recovery, his friends determined to delay the publication no longer. It therefore appeared without his finishing hand ; but Baker, the publisher, added a paragraph by way of conclusion, in which he noticed the author's illness as the occasion of the delay.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE close of De Foe's political life was in truth the beginning of his greatness; in the retirement which he now quitted no more, the leisure of his active spirit was occupied in the creation of a series of works, which raised his name immeasurably higher than it had ever been before in the opinion of his contemporaries, and which will preserve that name in freshness and honour so long as the language in which they are written endures; so long as penetration, wit, genius, and eloquence, preserve their place in the estimation of mankind. The rapidity with which these, the best and greatest of De Foe's works, followed each other into the world, after he had got fairly into the vein of composing them, is a sufficient proof, not only of the extraordinary fertility of his mind, but that he now possessed undisturbed quiet, wherein to call out and employ with uniform zeal and success all its manifold resources. From the point of time at which 'Robinson Crusoe' was published down to the death of De Foe, in 1731, almost the only incidents that mark the progress of the author's history are the successive appearances of the new works produced in his retirement. From a single circumstance or two indeed, which will be noticed, it appears that, though he almost entirely dropped politics, he still retained some little occasional hankerings after the more active pursuits of commerce. Among other speculations, he had at one time a lease of a farm, but we find him soon after disposing of it.

De Foe, the truth of the matter is, was now perhaps too much of an author to be able to succeed in anything but authorship; book-making was his trade, and he considered it as such, carrying into it all the strength of his mind in all its varieties of operation; exerting to the utmost his power as a creative genius, under the direction of a most acute and sagacious judgment, which very seldom misled him into any unfertile or unfortunate path of exertion. It is, on the whole, rarely that we meet in the whole course of the history of literature with anything at all resembling this last part of the career of De Foe. Men who possess that force and fire of fancy requisite for the striking out of new ways and species for themselves, are most commonly persons of so much delicacy of temperament that they can comparatively seldom bring themselves to the labour of exerting their faculties to the full. After producing one work, or a few works, by which they conceive themselves to have sufficiently exhibited their power and secured their fame, they slumber over the embers which they will not arouse themselves to blow, and allow the fire they might have kept bright and blazing to be smothered under the ashes of indolence. But our own literary history, more so indeed than that of any other nation, furnishes some splendid exceptions to this rule, both in past times and in the present, and of these De Foe must ever be considered one of the most illustrious.

The state of his worldly circumstances must, without doubt, be reckoned among the chief incentives of his extraordinary diligence. In all the works of De Foe we find the impress of a mind accustomed to find delight in the occupations of the world, to participate with a lively interest in the ordinary business, and pleasures, and recreations of mankind. Had he been possessed of an independent fortune, it is very probable he might have spent his time with pleasure to himself, as he certainly would with all advantage to those about him, in the amusements of life, without devoting anything like so great a portion of his days and nights to the labours of solitary meditation and composition. But in the toil to which he was at first stimulated by his necessities, who can doubt that he soon came to find his most unfailing source of happiness—an inexhaustible source, which might well atone to him for the loss of others less rich and less peculiar? The delight and the excitement with which we still pursue his works, is only the dim shadow and reflection of the more intense pleasure he must have tasted in conceiving and creating them. Book-making in the hands of a dull man is the worst and the most degrading of all drudgeries ; in the hands of a De Foe it changes its character, and becomes the noblest and the most delightful of all possible occupations. Having acquired by long practice the most perfect ease in the use of his instruments, and having the possession of an intellectual mine no less deep than broad, the work of production was to him scarcely a work, repaid as it already was (to say nothing of its after rewards) by the perpetual delights of conscious acquisition and extended power. We sometimes hear people expressing wonder that a great author should take the trouble to write so much ; and authors themselves, of the mediocre class, are the very people from whom we most frequently hear this language. With them composition is a task and a toil, and they suppose that it is the same with all men ; as the heavy fowl that with difficulty swings across the farm-yard may perhaps regard with wonder, if not with pity, the perpetual, unwearied soarings of the "bird of Jove." The success attending the series of works which De Foe now sent forth soon raised him far above the effects of the idle malignity of such as would fain have been his rivals. He held in his hands larger means of gratifying the larger part of the reading public of the day than any one of his contemporaries, and in the use of these means he was as indefatigable as he was happy in their possession. He became, in a word, in spite of all they said or did, a British Classic in the noblest sense of that term, in the universal estimation of his countrymen, and such he has continued, and must ever continue to be.

Quitting, then, the ungrateful field of politics, De Foe now turned his attention to a class of subjects with which all parties must be pleased, and from which they might derive wholesome lessons to soften their asperities and cultivate the best affections of the heart ; and in the early part of 1715 he committed to the press one of the most valuable of his treatises, and perhaps one of the most useful of its kind in the English language. It bears the title of 'The Family Instructor, in three parts. With a recommendatory Letter by the Rev. S. Wright. London : 1715.' The main object of this performance is to impress upon the heads of families the great duty of instructing their children and dependents in the principles of religion and virtue ; and to inculcate upon the latter the obligations they are under to listen to such instructions. As a system of morals, founded upon natural and revealed religion, it has found its way to the hearts of thousands, and will continue to instruct mankind so long as practical religion shall be deemed of importance to society. One of the chief excellencies of the work is, that it is adapted to persons of all religious persuasions. There is nothing to shock the prejudices either of Churchmen or of Dissenters, but much from which both may derive lessons of sound wisdom. De Foe's polemical talents are brought to bear to very good purpose in this performance, which is in the form of dialogues ; and it is curious to mark the eagerness with which his pen, after having been taken up for so many years with dry debates and doctrinal points, flies for relief to the details and incidents of private life. His mind was equally tenacious of facts and arguments, and fastened on each in its turn with the same strong and unremitting grasp. Although our author does not seem to have received any favour or encouragement from the Court of George I, yet the acknowledged merit of this work occasioned it to find its way into the King's family, and the copy by which they were instructed is still preserved in the British Museum. By 1722 no fewer than eight editions had been disposed of, and there was an eleventh edition in 1734, since which time the reprints, in London and elsewhere, have been very numerous. Large numbers have been disposed of for prize-books in schools, for which it is well adapted ; nor can a more useful book be found for general distribution. De Foe added a second volume three years afterwards, as will be seen in the proper place.

About this period, also, De Foe issued a series of four excellent pamphlets, couched in the Quaker style, and written by way of admonition to the persons addressed.

The title of the first of these tracts is, 'A Friendly Epistle by way of Reproof, from one of the People called Quakers, to Thomas Bradbury, a Dealer in many Words. London: 1715.' The object of this address was to divert the preacher from the pursuit of politics in the pulpit, particularly in calling for the blood of the late ministers, and to exhort him to direct his zeal against the dissensions of the times. Next came 'A Sharp Rebuke from one of the People called Quakers, to Henry Sacheverell, the High-Priest of St Andrew's, Holborn. 1715.' This is a reproof to Sacheverell for the absurd stir he had made for the church in the late reign; and also for his continued proceedings, which had no other object than to breed riots and to alienate the affections of the people from the new government. The wickedness of his past life is glanced at for the purpose of awakening his conscience and instructing his followers; his public misdeeds in reference to King William, the Pretender, and the reigning Sovereign, are also brought to light; and he is exhorted to repent and abandon the projects of the Tories, whose cause was now hopeless. The third pamphlet is 'A Seasonable Expostulation with, and Friendly Reproof unto, James Butler, who, by the Men of this World, is styled Duke of O——d, relating to the Tumults of the People. London: 1715.' The Duke of Ormond, who had entered deeply into the projects of the Jacobites, was then the idol of the High Church mob, and was suspected of courting popularity by acts of indiscretion at a time when he was under the frowns of the government. The writer here counsels him to take heed lest he should suffer by the acts of evil men, who made use of his name for factious purposes. Last of this series came 'A Declaration of Truth to Benjamin Hoadley, one of the High Priests of the Land, and of the Degree whom Men call Bishops.' In this work Hoadley is commended for his manly avowal of the truth in his celebrated sermon before the King concerning the nature and objects of Christ's kingdom; which he declared to be a spiritual constitution, not cognizable by temporal pains and penalties annexed by ecclesiastics to the churches of this world.

In 1716 there appeared a work of a miscellaneous nature, embracing a variety of topics relating to the public interest, and interspersed with judicious remarks, entitled 'Thoughts on Trade and a Public Spirit. 1716.' This work, which has been, on very good grounds, assigned to De Foe, is an excellent treatise, abounding in just sentiments, and enlivened by many striking examples illustrating the various topics of which it treats. It also contains much useful information concerning the execution of the laws, the conduct of official persons, and the abuses in public trusts. The author writes like a sensible and judicious man, anxious to remedy the evils he complains of, which are only to be cured by the exercise of a public spirit. He has also many excellent remarks of a moral nature, designed to enforce such a public spirit, the value of which he illustrates by some striking examples.

In a former part of his life, some connexion had subsisted between our author and Dunton, the projector. The jealousy of the latter had led to some occasional sparring, which, however, does not appear to have detracted from his respect for De Foe, to whose character he pays homage in various parts of his works, though his name nowhere occurs in any of De Foe's writings. Their intercourse appears to have been renewed at this time; for we find amongst the Rawlinson MSS., in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, the rough draught of 'Articles of Agreement between Daniel De Foe and John Dunton, for writing a Weekly Paper, to be entitled "The Hanover Spy." Dated Oct. 28, 1717.' This project, however, does not appear to have been executed.

Our author next published 'Memoirs of the Church of Scotland. In Four Periods. 1. The Church in her Infant State, from the Reformation to the Queen Mary's Abdication. 2. The Church in its Growing State, from the Abdication to the Restoration. 3. The Church in its Persecuted State from the Restoration to the Revolution. 4. The Church in its Present State, from the Revolution to the Union. With an Appendix of some Transactions since the Union. London: printed for Emanuel Matthews, at the Bible, and T. Warner, at the Black Boy, both in Paternoster row. 1717.' The materials for this valuable work were probably gleaned by De Foe during his frequent visits to Scotland. As a compendious narrative of an important period in the Scottish history, De Foe's work will always retain its interest, both for the value of its facts, and the felicitous manner in which they are related. His narrative of the earlier part of the eventful history of the Presbyterian Church may be perused with pleasure, even by those who have lived to see the same period treated of by one of the greatest historical writers of the present period, Dr M'Crie; while his representations of the more recent troubles in the times of the Covenanters, his descriptions of the battles of Claverhouse, and the cruelties of the persecution under James II, need scarcely shrink from a comparison with some of the most picturesque passages in the first 'Tales of my Landlord.' There are, perhaps, few English writers to whom the Church of Scotland owes so many obligations as to De Foe, who watched her interests with fidelity and affection at a time when she was threatened by powerful enemies, and defended her with a zeal and ability which could only be expected from a warm friend and admirer. His 'Memoirs of the Church of Scotland' has never been reprinted, and is now amongst the scarcest of his works.

In 1718, De Foe followed up his method of familiarizing religion to the young and the uninformed, by publishing a second volume of his moral dialogues. It is entitled, 'The Family Instructor; in Two Parts. 1. Relating to Family Breaches, and their obstructing Religious Duties. 2. To the great Mistake of mixing the Passions in the managing and correcting of Children. With a great variety of Cases relating to setting ill Examples to Children and Servants. Vol. II. London: printed for Emanuel Matthews, at the Bible in Paternoster row. 1718.' In point of value this second volume is not inferior to the first. The dialogue is equally pleasing, and the moral no less important and instructive. It is rather a companion than a sequel to the former volume, the story being unconnected. The excellent maxims that run through the volume commend it to the judgment of every judicious reader, whilst it breathes a strain of piety calculated to arouse the attention, and kindle the best affections of the heart. A third edition was printed in 1727, and since then has been often reprinted with the first volume. They are both admirably adapted to awaken the attention of the careless, to instruct the ignorant, and to please the virtuous. Whilst the young are attracted by the incidents that compose the narratives, their accurate delineation of human nature must extort praise from the learned, and will remain a standing monument of the skill and ingenuity of the writer. There are few books better adapted for family reading, for parochial libraries, or for circulation amongst young persons. If the author had written nothing else, these volumes alone possess sufficient merit to give him a high place amongst English moralists.

In the same year appeared our author's 'Memoirs of the Life and Eminent Conduct of that Learned and Reverend Divine, Daniel Williams, D.D., with a true Copy of the last Will and Testament of Dr Williams.' Dr Williams was an eminent Presbyterian divine, first in Dublin, and afterwards in London. He was a liberal benefactor to the Dissenters, and dying in 1716, left the bulk of his property, which was considerable, to charitable uses. He was the founder of an extensive library for the use of the Dissenters, bearing his name, and situated in Redcross street, London.

In the controversy concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, during the early part of the last century, the Dissenters, it is well known, took a large share. During the contention, much angry feeling was displayed on both sides, and the cause of charity was sacrificed to a zeal for orthodoxy. Salter's Hall, the arena of the disputers, exhibited scenes of tumult and discord but little befitting an assembly of grave divines, met together for the avowed purpose of composing their differences. The conduct manifested by the more violent drew down much obloquy upon the Dissenters, and exposed them to the talk and the derision of their enemies. Pamphlets flew about in all directions, abounding in censure and recriminations, but having no tendency to settle the points at issue. In the midst of this paper war De Foe stepped in, not as a partisan, nor as interfering in any way in the quarrel, but in the pacific character of a mediator between the two parties. He conjures them to lay aside their quarrels, and to consult the safety and reputation of their cause, as Dissenters, by studying the things that make for peace. The title of his book is, 'A Letter to the Dissenters. London: 1719.'

In the same year he appeared again before the world as the translator of a French work, relative to the disputes between the Jesuits and the Jansenists. It is entitled 'A curious Oration delivered by Father Andrews, concerning the present Great Quarrels that divide the Clergy of France. Translated from the French. By D. De F—e. London: 1719.' 8vo.

In this year De Foe assigned over some property that he had in the hands of the South Sea Company, to the person named in the following deed, but for what purpose does not appear. "Know all Men by these Presents That I Daniel De Foe, of Stoke Newington in the County of Midx. Gent. have made, ordained, deputed, authorised, and appointed, and by these Presents do make, ordain, depute, authorize, and appoint Mordecai Jenkins of London, Gent., my true and lawful attorney, for me, and in my name, to assign and transfer to any person or persons whomsoever, the sum of One hundred Twenty seven pounds ten shillings, being all the stock which I have in the Books of the Governor and Company of Merchants of Great Britain, trading to the South Seas, and other parts of America, and for encouraging the Fishery, with full power to make and give proper and sufficient acquittance for the consideration money to be had and received for the same, and generally to make and do all such other necessary acts and things proper to be done, as fully and effectually as I myself might or should do being personally present, hereby ratifying and confirming whatsoever my said Attorney shall lawfully do or cause to be done in and about the premises. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this Two and Twentieth day of March, Anno Dom^o 1719. Anno D R^s Georgii D. G. Mag. Britan. 6^o.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE series of imaginative works which now fell from the pen of De Foe with astonishing rapidity, will entail honour upon his name so long as true genius, consecrated by moral worth, shall continue to be an object of estimation. No man, without the resources of De Foe, could have combined, with the same rapidity, so much varied and useful information. To extensive reading upon almost every branch of literature, he united an intimate knowledge of the world; and these resources were so much at his command that he appears to have drawn upon them with little apparent labour. Accustomed to view mankind in all its gradations of station and character, conversing sometimes with the great, at other times with the low, he had stored his mind with an abundance of materials, which a lively fancy enabled him to turn to a good account. His commerce with the world had brought him acquainted with its habits and occupations, its business and amusements, and with all the forms in which society has developed the human passions. Engaged from his earliest years in active pursuits, and thrown by the accidents of life into almost every variety of situation, he had an opportunity of reading instructive lessons upon human nature, and furnished many scenes of real life from the storehouse of his own experience. A character formed in so extensive a school, acutely alive to passing events, and disciplined by correct habits of thinking, was at no loss for incidents to awaken the attention of mankind; whilst his habitual seriousness led him to improve every occasion for converting them into channels of instruction. Intimately acquainted with the whole circle of common life, he possessed the talent above most men of seizing upon ordinary occurrences, and throwing over them a charm which they owe entirely to the force of his own fancy. At the same time, his genius was happily chastened by a correct and solid judgment. His mind was no less vigorous than acute, and being tempered by a high tone of moral feeling, he insinuates instruction insensibly upon his readers, whilst he administers to their amusement. If some of his fictions partake of less refinement than could be desired, he nowhere sacrifices decency to wit; nor does he offend by the extravagance of his descriptions. De Foe uniformly pays homage to virtue; and when he dives into the depravity of the human character, it is for the purpose of raising it to the standard of excellence.

The following remarks upon De Foe's novels, by Charles Lamb, appeared for the first time in Mr Wilson's work:—"In the appearances of truth, in all the incidents and conversations that occur in them, they exceed any works of fiction that I am acquainted with. It is perfect illusion. The author never appears in these self-narratives (for so they ought to be called, or rather auto-biographies), but the narrator chains us down to an implicit belief in everything he says. There is all the minute detail of a log-book in it. Dates are painfully pressed upon the memory. Facts are repeated over and over in varying phrases, till you cannot choose but believe them. It is like reading evidence in a court of justice. So anxious the story-teller seems that the truth should be clearly comprehended, that when he has told us a matter of fact, or a motive, in a line or two further down he repeats it, with his favourite figure of speech, I say, so and so, though he had made it abundantly plain before. This is in imitation of the common people's way of speaking, or rather of the way in which they are addressed by a master or mistress, who wishes to impress something upon their memories, and has a wonderful effect upon matter-of-fact readers. Indeed, it is to such principally that he writes. His style is everywhere beautiful, but plain and homely. 'Robinson Crusoe' is delightful to all ranks and classes; but it is easy to see that it is written in a phraseology peculiarly adapted to the lower conditions of readers. Hence it is an especial favourite with seafaring men, poor boys, servant-maids, &c. His novels are capital kitchen-reading, while they are worthy, from their interest, to find a shelf in the libraries of the wealthiest and the most learned. His passion for matter-of-fact narrative sometimes betrayed him into a long relation of common incidents, which might happen to any man, and have no interest beyond the intense appearance of truth in them to recommend them. The whole latter half, or two-thirds, of 'Colonel Jack' is of this description. The beginning of 'Colonel Jack' is the most affecting natural picture of a young thief that was ever drawn. His losing the stolen money in the hollow tree, and finding it again when in despair, and then being in equal distress at not knowing how to dispose of it, and several similar touches in the early history of the Colonel, evince a deep knowledge of human nature; and putting out of question the superior romantic interest of the latter, in my mind very much exceeds 'Crusoe.' 'Roxana' (first edition) is the next in interest, though he left out the best part of it in subsequent editions, from a foolish hyper-criticism of his friend Southerne. But 'Moll Flanders,' the account of the 'Plague,' &c. &c., are all of one family, and have the same stamp of character.

The first, and by far the most celebrated, of those works of imagination, which have conferred immortality upon the name of De Foe, appeared in 1719, under the title of 'The Life and Strange Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, of York, Mariner ;' &c. Next to the Holy Scriptures, it may safely be asserted that this delightful romance has ever since it was written excited the first and most powerful influence upon the juvenile mind of England, nor has its popularity been much less among any of the other nations of Christendom. At a period when few of the productions of English genius had been transferred into any of the languages of foreigners, this masterpiece of the homely, unaffected, unpretending, but rich and masculine intellect of Daniel De Foe, had already acquired, in every cultivated tongue of Europe, the full privileges of a native work.

A second part, the labour of little more than three months, appeared in August, and the work was finally completed in the following year by the publication of 'Serious Reflections during the Life and Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.'

The success of this work encouraged our author to persevere in the new line he had marked out for himself ; and the fertility of his invention enabled him to supply the public with a series of volumes, as various in their nature as they are ingenious in their contrivance.

The same year that produced his master-piece gave birth to 'The Dumb Philosopher ; or, Great Britain's Wonder ; containing a faithful and very surprising Account of Dickory Cronke,' &c. In this simple story, De Foe has put in practice, without any apparent effort, the same peculiarity of invention that distinguishes his other performances. Although the incidents of the narrative are few in number, they are told in the same unpretending manner, and with so much exactness, that it is difficult for the reader to persuade himself it is any other than a real history. As De Foe wrote, in a great measure, for the common people, he fed their appetites with such stimulants as were suited to their love of excitement ; and when he lays a tax upon their credulity, it is levied with an air of seriousness that extorts belief, and finds ample remuneration in the moral lessons with which it is accompanied.

As De Foe had mixed much in society, he was become familiar with the habits and modes of talking that distinguished different persons, particularly in common life ; and it is upon such subjects that he feels most at home. His different excursions to the Continent would bring him in contact with the British sailor, whose peculiarity of character was not lost upon him ; and it is not improbable that he numbered amongst his acquaintance, persons of a seafaring life, from whom he derived that correct knowledge of nautical affairs which is so conspicuous in his writings. When personating the sailor he is as much at home as when he is discoursing upon trade or discussing politics. It has been pretty well understood, indeed, that he was acquainted, and spent, at one time, many evenings with the celebrated Dampier, who, to give him his due, to professional skill united other commendable qualities. De Foe lived at a period when buccaneering was carried on to a great extent, being fostered by the long wars that grew out of the Revolution, particularly the war of the Spanish Succession. From the relations of the lawless adventurers who had been engaged in such expeditions, of which fraternity his friend Dampier was a distinguished member, De Foe derived many anecdotes of surprising encounters and hair-breadth 'scapes by flood and field, which he made skilful use of. He was also well read in the voyages and travels of former days, from whence he transferred the most striking incidents into his own imaginary voyages and narratives.

The favourable reception of 'Robinson Crusoe' might be partly owing to the partiality with which every circumstance illustrating the character of the British sailor is viewed by the British public. It was probably in accommodation to this national taste, that De Foe now recorded the adventures of a Buccaneer, which he depicts with all that spirit of enterprise and variety of incident which usually marked the operations of that hardy character. This work he entitled 'The Life, Adventures, and Piracies of the famous Captain Singleton. 1720.' Second edition, 1737. Third edition, 1768. This is a work in which the lovers of wild adventure will find much amusement. The hero, however, is a sad hand. He is a hardened, brutal desperado, without one redeeming trait, or almost human feeling; and, in spite of what Mr Lamb says of his lonely musings and agonies of a conscience-stricken repentance, we find nothing of this in the text. The captain is always merry and well if there is any mischief going on; and his only qualm is after he has retired from his trade of plunder and murder on the high seas, and is afraid of being assassinated for his ill-gotten wealth, and does not know how to dispose of it. De Foe (whatever his intentions may be) is led, by the force of truth and circumstances, to give the devil his due—he puts no gratuitous remorse into his adventurer's mouth, nor spoils the keeping by expressing one relenting pang, any more than his hero would have done in reality. This is, indeed, the excellence of De Foe's representations, that they are perfect fac-similes of the characters he chooses to pourtray.

In the same year De Foe published some particulars of a noted seer of those days, who gave rise to a variety of speculations. Steele introduces him in the 'Tatler' as a dumb fortune-teller, who imposed upon the vulgar by pretending to tell fortunes by the second-sight. Whether he was actually deaf and dumb, or only feigned so for the purpose of notoriety, was a matter of doubt; but, be this as it may, he practised many years upon the credulity of the public, and with so much success as to amass a fortune by his profession. The celebrity to which he attained is thus noticed by the 'Spectator.' "Every one has heard of the famous conjuror, who, according to the opinions of the vulgar, has studied himself dumb; for which reason, as it is believed, he delivers out his oracles in writing. Be that as it will, the blind Teresias was not more famous in Greece than this dumb artist has been for some years last past in the cities of London and Westminster." *

So remarkable a character was not likely to escape the observation of De Foe, who rightly considered that he would be a popular subject for his pen. He therefore composed 'The History of the Life and Adventures of Mr Duncan Campbell, a Gentleman who, though Deaf and Dumb, writes down any Stranger's Name at first sight, with their future Contingencies of Fortune. London: 1720.' So great was the demand for the work, that a second edition appeared in the same year. It was accompanied by a portrait of Mr Duncan Campbell, ætat. 40, engraved by M. Vangergucht, in his best manner; and there are some other plates illustrative of the subject.

In the days of De Foe the resort to fortune-tellers for the purpose of prying into futurity was not confined to the lower orders. The slender education then bestowed upon females, and the habits of society so accurately described by Steele and Addison, left the higher orders equally exposed to the inroads of imposture.† Accordingly, the levee of our seer, who affected to look down upon the vulgar arts resorted to by his rivals in the trade, could boast of a large assemblage of the fair sex of various ranks, who had recourse to him for information upon the point that dwelt uppermost in their thoughts.

A rhyming fit having returned upon De Foe, he now produced 'The Compleat Art of Painting: a Poem. Translated from the French of M. du Fresnoy. By D.F., Gent.

* Spectator, No. 560.

† The 'Spectator' (No. 505) observes, "It is not to be conceived how many wizards, gipsies, and cunning men are dispersed through all the counties and market towns of Great Britain; not to mention the fortune-tellers and astrologers who live very comfortably upon the curiosity of several well-disposed persons in the cities of London and Westminster."—Moorfields had been, time out of mind, the most common habitation of these gentry.

1720.' Du Fresnoy's poem, so highly esteemed upon the continent, had been translated into English prose by Dryden, and his version met with a corresponding approbation in England. Although no attempt had been made to turn it into English metre, yet the rejection of it by Dryden might have been sufficient to deter our author from so venturous an experiment. De Foe's ear was never attuned to music, he was therefore incapable of that nice discrimination which is requisite to produce harmony. Dryden had set before him the noble example of abandoning a vicious taste; and Pope, who was now in the height of his popularity, had imparted a smoothness and perspicuity to his verse that procured the admiration of his contemporaries. With these models before him, it is surprising that De Foe could still take delight in his unmusical rhymes, for his present effort is even inferior to many of his former productions. It may be difficult to assign a motive for the publication, unless, as Mr Chalmers suggests, it was to gain a few guineas without much labour of the head or hand.

Towards the end of the same year, De Foe employed his pen upon a subject more congenial with his talents, and better adapted to purposes of usefulness. In a series of moral discourses, written by way of dialogue, he showed how competent he was to explain the real nature of religion, and to unfold its consolations. He entitled his work 'Christian Conversation: in six Dialogues. London: 1720.' "The moralities of De Foe," observes Mr Chalmers, "whether published in single volumes, or interspersed through many passages, must at last give him a superiority over the crowd of his contemporaries." In this judgment, those who have perused his writings cannot but concur. Upon most of them a favourable verdict was pronounced by his contemporaries; and they require only to be extensively known, to obtain for the author that meed of praise which is due to his meritorious exertions.

The misfortunes of De Foe, at a former period, had thrown him into circumstances which subjected him to the sight of human nature in its lowest and most degraded forms. Whilst immured in prison, he was necessarily brought into contact with persons who were in a position to let him into those scenes of crime and misery of which his fertile genius knew how to avail itself in the publications we are about to notice. The various incidents in the eventful life of Moll Flanders, from the time of her seduction to that of her becoming a convict and a quiet settler in Maryland, are those of real life, as exemplified by multitudes of individuals. The artless disposition of the narrative, the lively interest excited by unlooked-for coincidences, the rich natural painting, the moral reflections, are all so many proofs of the knowledge and invention of the writer; but the facts were furnished him by the annals of Newgate.

The dish which De Foe here served up to gratify the taste of the public, was certainly of somewhat coarser materials than ordinary, but adapted to amuse, and, by its moral, to benefit a numerous class of readers. It was entitled 'The Fortunes and Misfortunes of Moll Flanders. London: 1721;' a novel of high interest, in spite of the very detestable character of the heroine. Mrs Flanders was certainly born in sin, and does justice to her parentage. The best parts are the account of her childhood, which is pretty and affecting; the fluctuations of her feelings between remorse and hardened impenitence in Newgate; and the incident of her leading off the horse from the inn-door, though she had no place to put it in after she had stolen it. This was carrying the love of thieving to an ideal pitch, and making it perfectly disinterested and mechanical. The work has passed through many editions.

Next came 'The History of the most remarkable Life and extraordinary Adventures of the truly Honourable Colonel Jaque, vulgarly called Colonel Jack. London: 1722;' a work excellent in its kind, which, if it contains much manner of low life, at the same time aspires to an elevation of character; whilst the painting is that of nature, and the tendency strictly virtuous. There is, in truth, but little that can associate it in character with Moll Flanders ; for, if there is a correspondency in some of their actions, the principle that actuated them was widely different, and our hero appears, through the greater part of the volume, a personage entitled to some respect.

It was the fortune of De Foe, that the circumstances of his life, concurring with the bent of his genius, enabled him to study human nature in all its gradations, from the prince to the peasant ; and in accommodation to the variety of tastes, he adapted his food to the appetite of the persons for whom he provided. In the stories hitherto noticed he administered moral instruction to the lower orders in the shape most accessible to their capacities. In some of those about to be mentioned he brings us into better company, and whilst his story rises in character it loses none of its interest.

It was probably about this period (for there is no date to the first edition of the work) that he published the ‘Memoirs of a Cavalier ; or, a Military Journal of the Wars in Germany and the Wars in England, from the year 1632 to the year 1648, &c. London.’ The second edition of the work, also without a date, was printed at Leeds. These memoirs are composed with a spirit and vivacity that keep alive the reader’s attention, while he is charmed with the extreme simplicity of the narrative. The cavalier’s account of the civil wars is distinguished by great candour and fairness ; not concealing the errors of his own party, whilst he does justice to the bravery and good conduct of his enemies. The work is said to have been a favourite with the great Lord Chatham, who long considered it an authentic history, and was in the habit of recommending it as the best account of the Civil Wars extant ; nor was he a little mortified when told that it was only a romance. It is, indeed, a romance the likeliest to truth that ever was written. As a narrative of important events, containing a correct picture of the times, and enlivened by many just observations, it will always be read with a keen interest by those who may wish to occupy a spare hour in amusement combined with instruction.

A subject so uninviting as that of the plague is one of the last from which we might expect pleasure in the contemplation. Yet De Foe has founded upon it one of the finest of his productions ; one that can never be read without the deepest interest, and which will continue to be read as long as the memory of that awful event shall remain upon record. It is written with all the characteristic traits of the author’s genius, intense reality, excessive minuteness, rich natural pathos, and exquisite moral feeling. Whilst it is impossible to read his description without the keenest sensations of sorrow, the attention is rivetted by the constant succession of incidents that crowd upon the scene.

It was one of the felicities of De Foe to select such subjects for his pen as would be of permanent interest ; and such are all those pictures of life and manners that carry us back to former days, in the delineation of which he so greatly excelled. Nothing in the world is finer than the impression of the old city of London, before the fire, which one gathers from his History of the Plague. Throughout the whole of that most striking narrative his mind is visibly haunted with the idea, how princely was the desolation of her grass-grown streets—how awful the silence of her deserted palaces, and the fatal calmness of her shipless river. In this affecting narrative he has contrived to mix up so much that is authentic with the fabrications of his own brain, that it is impossible to distinguish the one from the other ; and he has given to the whole such a likeness to the dreadful original, as to confound the sceptic, and encircle him in his enchantments. No one can take up the book without believing that it is the saddler of Whitechapel who is telling his own story ; and that he was an eye-witness to all that he relates ; that he actually saw the blazing stars which portended the calamity ; that he witnessed the grass growing in the streets, reading the inscriptions upon the doors of the infected houses, heard the bell-men crying, “Bring out your dead !” saw the dead-carts conveying the people to their graves, and was present at the digging of the pits in which they were deposited. In this, indeed, consists the charm of the narrative. It is not merely a record of the transactions that happened during the calamity, nor even of private circumstances that would escape the public eye ; it is rather the familiar recital of a man's own observations upon all that passed before him, possessing all the minuteness of a log-book, without its dulness. The advantage derived from this mode of telling the story is, that it prepossesses the reader in a full belief of its reality. When a man sits down to record the events that happened in any given year, and crowds it with incidents, many of which are known to be true, we do not hesitate to give him credit for the remainder ; and this more especially when he tells us that he was upon the spot when such a thing happened, that he saw and spoke with the persons he describes, and relates the substance of the conversation. With the same unhesitating confidence we take up the book before us. It is not the journal of a third party ; there is not even the formality of a preface ; but we open it, and come in contact at once with the author, who sees and hears all that he writes, and tells us so in the first person.

By adopting this familiar method of treating his subject, it cannot be doubted that De Foe secured to himself many advantages which he could not have hoped for in a formal history. Thus, whilst detailing incidents of importance, he will sometimes introduce a story, apparently trifling in itself, and by no means necessary to his main design ; but merely to show that he is willing to keep back nothing, or rather must communicate everything in the exact way that it happened. But however trivial his incidents, or common-place his mode of relating them, they possess a secret charm that keeps the mind upon the full stretch, and gains it over to an unhesitating confidence in the relation. No one thinks of skipping over a single particle of his narrative, nor of exchanging for other words the homely language of the writer. In truth, the circumstantiality of De Foe never wearies ; it rather adds to that intense consciousness of reality that hovers over every page of his writings. His 'History of the Plague' is one of those books in which he has carried his art to the greatest perfection. So faithful is the portrait of that distressing calamity, so entire its accordance with what has been delivered by other writers, so probable the circumstances of all the stories, and so artless the style in which they are delivered, that it would baffle the ingenuity of any one but De Foe to frame a history with so many attributes of truth upon the basis of fiction, though, indeed, the only fiction may be said to be that which represents it as the result of personal observation. It is no wonder that a work so gravely written should have deceived Dr Mead, who quoted it as an authentic history in his Treatise upon the Plague.

The propriety of such an alliance between history and fiction, more especially when so managed as to impose upon the most wary reader, has been called in question, but who would sacrifice the 'Memoirs of a Cavalier,' or the 'Journal of the Plague Year,' to be disenchanted of so pleasing a delusion ? De Foe well knew that a dry detail of circumstances collected from the Bills of Mortality and the pamphlets of the day would interest none but an antiquarian, the subject, thus treated, being of too repulsive a nature to invite general attention. By personating a citizen of London, who lived in the midst of the contagion, and was a spectator of the scenes he describes, he not only secured credit for his narrative, but was enabled to enliven it with numerous stories of probable occurrence, and with picturesque descriptions of the agitated feelings of the people. These, with the moral reflections which would naturally occur to persons in so distressing a situation, combine to render a story, in itself forbidding, highly attractive. His work bears the following title : 'A Journal of the Plague Year : being Observations or Memorials of the most remarkable Occurrences, as well public as private, which happened in London during the last great Visitation in 1665. London : 1722.' Of this volume numerous editions have appeared.

With a mind ardently devoted to the improvement of his fellow men, and energies that seemed incapable of exhaustion, De Foe continued to instruct the world by his moralities, whilst he amused it with his fictions. The same year that produced some of the foregoing publications gave birth to a work that is composed with his characteristic talent, and distinguished as well for its utility as for its genius, for the importance of the story as for skill in its management. There are few books better known in the middle classes of society than the 'Religious Courtship,' and few that are more deserving of general perusal. To those who have been trained to religious habits it needs no formal recommendation; whilst others, who have yet to learn their value, may be amused by an interesting story, at the same time that they are instructed by the moral. Much of it is a faithful picture of manners in the upper classes of life. The work that lays claim to such regard bears the following title: 'Religious Courtship: being Historical Discourses on the Necessity of Marrying Religious Husbands and Wives only. As also, of Husbands and Wives being of the same Opinions in Religion with one another. London: 1722.' 8vo. As the work was brought early into general notice, so its well-established popularity procured for it a constant sale and a widely extended circulation. This favourable decision of the public is the highest testimony of its merits; for, notwithstanding other and more modern treatises upon the subject, it still maintains its ground, and will secure for its author a lasting fame, independently of his other works.

In discussing a subject of so much importance to young persons of both sexes, and one that required to be handled with great nicety, De Foe was well aware that precept would be of less weight than example; that whilst the world refused to be instructed by a didactic treatise, it might be disposed to listen to a familiar story. He therefore chose to convey his ideas in this more inviting form, that, by raising the curiosity of the reader, he might the more effectually fix him with the moral. Historical dialogues, when written with spirit, are particularly acceptable to the humbler classes, and to young people in general, who make themselves parties to the conversation, and can fix the subject with a slight effort on their memories. The familiar style of the present work, its deep acquaintance with human nature, and the exquisite moral feeling that pervades every page, render it peculiarly adapted to infuse instruction into the young and uninformed, and to leave an abiding impression upon the heart.

The year 1724 gave birth to another romance by our author, which, for originality of invention, for accuracy of painting, and for utility of purpose, was not exceeded by any of the former. It is entitled, 'The Fortunate Mistress; or, a History of the vast Variety of Fortunes of Mademoiselle de Belean, being the Person known by the Name of the Lady Roxana. London: 1724.' Roxana is a lady of pleasure, like Moll Flanders, but soaring a higher flight, instead of grovelling almost always in the mire of poverty and distress. Still, like Mistress Flanders, she has neither refinement nor a heart; we are only dazzled with the outward ostentation of jewels, finery, and wealth. The scene where she dances in her Turkish dress before the King, and obtains the name of Roxana, is of the true romantic cast.

De Foe's next appearance in print was as a tourist, a character which he fills in a most agreeable manner. He was not one of those fire-side travellers who describe countries they have never seen, and deal out the labours of others at second-hand. In the former part of his life he had repeatedly traversed, whether for business or pleasure, most of the counties of England and the south part of Scotland; and in his relation of what he saw he neglects nothing that is worthy of observation to the philosopher, the historian, or the antiquary. His narrative abounds in anecdotes of local customs, distinguished families, and remarkable events, which are rendered welcome to the reader by their intrinsic interest, or by the happy manner in which they are related. Although nothing material escapes him, either in the works of nature or the productions of art, that is worthy of notice, yet his principal business is with the people, whose customs, habits, and character, in all their varieties, are pourtrayed with great felicity of description. Those who are desirous of a pleasant ramble in search of national manners at the period referred to, may be amply gratified by accompanying our author, whose volumes, notwithstanding more modern publications upon the subject, will always possess a sufficient charm to beguile the attention and please by their variety.

The first of these excursions was given to the public in 1724, under the title of 'A Tour through the whole Island of Great Britain, divided into Circuits or Journies, giving a particular and diverting Account of whatever is curious and worth Observation. 1724.' 8vo. This volume includes 'A Diary of the Siege and Blockade of Colchester, An. 1648.' The favourable reception of this volume encouraged the author to follow it by a second in the next year, with a similar title; and a third volume, embracing the North of England and the South of Scotland, and completing the work, was added in 1727. The useful information contained in these volumes is conveyed in the familiar form of letters, and the work was for a long time a standing favourite with the public. The subsequent editions, published in four volumes, bearing the name of the celebrated Richardson as editor, vary so greatly in every respect from De Foe's work, as to be no longer worthy of his name.

The versatility of our author's talents furnished him with topics as various in their nature as they were useful in their design; whilst his desire for reformation led him to select those that came recommended by their importance or their urgency. In the same year that produced 'Roxana' he addressed another class of the community upon some excesses which he had glanced at before in his 'Religious Courtship,' and which were of so notorious a character as to induce him to lay them open in a distinct treatise, entitled 'The Great Law of Subordination considered; or, the Insolence and Unsufferable Behaviour of Servants in England duly inquired into, &c. London: 1724.' However unpromising his subject, De Foe has contrived to make a most entertaining book of it. The numerous stories with which it abounds not only give a spur to the reading, but are strongly indicative of character and manners in those classes of society to which they refer. It does not appear that there was ever more than one edition of the work.

The abuses unfolded by our author in the foregoing treatise calling loudly for redress, he returned to the subject in a pamphlet published in the following year, in which he resumed some topics that he had before handled but slightly. His work is entitled 'Everybody's Business is Nobody's Business; or, Private Abuses, Public Grievances. Exemplified in the Pride, Insolence, and exorbitant Wages of our Women Servants, Footmen, &c. London: 1725.' This is the first of a series of works which he wrote under the assumed name of Andrew Moreton.

In the course of 1725 De Foe presented the world with a fresh proof of his skill in nautical affairs, in a work replete with interest, and no less ingenious in the contrivance than amusing in its details. He entitled it, 'A New Voyage round the World, by a course never sailed before. 1725.' 8vo. Although many voyages of equal extent had been performed by our countrymen, yet their published accounts, contain but little to amuse or instruct the reader, consisting chiefly of dry details extracted from their journals, and these mostly of a professional nature. Our author possessed the happy talent of rendering his voyages attractive by the variety of the incidents, and by the felicity with which he related them; and he is no less happy in making them a vehicle for insinuating instruction. From those who have explored newly discovered countries, we naturally look for information concerning the character, habits, and customs of the people, the productions of the soil, and whatever may be interesting to the philosopher and the historian. But it was the misfortune of our early navigators to be generally men of confined education, who were in the pursuit of wealth rather than of information, so that their adventures correspond more with those of a buccaneer than with anything of a civilized description.

It was the object of De Foe to give them a more inviting dress, that by mixing the agreeable with the useful, he might fascinate at the same time that he instructed the reader. In reference to this work, Mr Chalmers remarks—"Most voyages have had this misfortune, that whatever success they had in the adventure, they have had very little in the narrative. They are indeed full of the incidents of sailing, but they have nothing of story for the use of readers who never intend to brave the dangers of the sea. These faults De Foe is studious to avoid in his New Voyage. He spreads before his readers such adventures as no writer of a real voyage can hope to imitate, if we except the teller of Anson's tale. In the life of Crusoe, we are gratified by continually imagining that the fiction is a fact: in the Voyage round the World, we are pleased by constantly perceiving that the fact is a fiction, which, by uncommon skill, is made more interesting than a genuine voyage." Of fictitious biography it is equally true, that by matchless art it may be made more instructive than a real life. Few of our writers have excelled De Foe in this kind of biographical narration, the great qualities of which are to attract by the diversity of circumstances, and to instruct by the usefulness of examples. The same writer observes, "the ship of Fools had indeed been launched in early times; but who, like De Foe, had ever carried his readers to sea, in order to mend the heart, and regulate the practice of life, by showing his readers the effects of adversity, or how they might equally be called to sustain his hero's trials, as they sailed round the world? But without attractions, neither the originality nor the end can have any salutary consequence. This he had foreseen; and for this he had provided, by giving his adventures in a style so pleasing, because it is simple, and so interesting, because it is particular, that every one fancies he could write a similar language."

A main object of De Foe in all his writings, is to bring forward some prominent error that has taken root in society, for the purpose of its correction. In this work he takes occasion to reprehend the excess of punishment that is sometimes inflicted at sea for trivial offences. His experience of human life had taught him, "that men were always secured in their duty by a generous kindness, better than by absolute dominion and severity." This sentiment he endeavours to enforce by example; and who that has any knowledge of mankind, does not acquiesce fully in its propriety? It is quite evident, from the aptitude and correctness of his writing, that De Foe must have been well acquainted with the stories of former navigators, from which he gleaned the materials for his fancy to work upon. But the charm of the work owes everything to his own genius, which was fertile in contrivances, and rich in the sources of amusement. Whoever may feel disposed to accompany our author in his imaginary voyage, will find much to gratify his curiosity and inform his judgment.

Amongst the multifarious subjects that engaged the attention of De Foe, one was of great curiosity to literary men, and important in its consequences to the public at large. The work we are about to notice is highly excellent in its kind, and contains much information within a narrow compass; it is entitled 'An Essay upon Literature: or, an Enquiry into the Antiquity and Original of Letters. London: 1726.' As a writer who had contributed so largely to literature, he might be expected to feel interested in an inquiry that brought to light the sources of its manufacture. In the time of De Foe, the English language had produced but few publications upon the subject, and none containing so much information in a popular form. It was, therefore, an object of curiosity with his countrymen; and the manner in which he has treated it exhibits more learning and research than he has usually had credit for. In short, whoever wishes for much useful information within a narrow compass, will be amply compensated by the perusal of this little volume, which is now but rarely to be met with.

The public curiosity being now excited by the case of a wild youth, lately discovered in a German forest, and brought to England by George I., De Foe naturally considered it a popular subject for his pen. He therefore contributed to the speculations then afloat amongst naturalists and philosophers, in a pamphlet, entitled 'Mere Nature delineated : or, a Body without a Soul. Being Observations upon the Young Forester lately brought to Town, from Germany. With suitable Applications. Also, a brief Dissertation upon the Usefulness and Necessity of Fools, whether Political or Natural. London : 1726,' which contains, among other interesting matter, some curious speculations upon the possibility of thinking, without a knowledge of words expressive of our ideas of sensible objects.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE course of his studies, aided perhaps by his misfortunes, led our author into many speculations upon the subject of spirits, and their communication with the visible world. From early life, his own mind had been strongly impressed with a belief in their reality and there are some passages in his writings, from whence may be collected his opinion, that they exercise, more or less, a direct influence upon the affairs of men. He notices two ways by which the communication is maintained :—First, by "immediate, personal, and particular converse ;" and secondly, by "these spirits acting at a distance, rendering themselves visible, and their transactions perceptible, on such occasions as they think fit, without any further acquaintance with the person."* He thought that God had posted an army of these ministering spirits round our globe, "to be ready, at all events, to execute his orders and to do his will ; reserving still to himself to send express messengers of a superior rank on extraordinary occasions." These, he adds, "may, without any absurdity, be supposed capable of assuming shapes, conversing with mankind by voice and sound, or by private notices of things, impulses, forebodings, misgivings, and other imperceptible communications to the minds of men, as God their great employer may direct."† But, upon the power of man to control, or communicate at his will with these spiritual beings, he entertains doubts, and protests against the arts of conjuration.

De Foe has many allusions in his writings to the silent workings of some supernatural influence upon his own mind, acting as a prompter upon extraordinary occasions. He speaks sometimes of mysterious impressions directing him to particular subjects, and guiding his pen whilst in the act of writing. Under the same impulse, we find him the subject of secret forebodings, conveyed by some invisible agent, and enabling him to escape from evils into which he must have fallen but for such premonitions. However such a belief may be condemned as fanciful, it has been that of many grave theologians, and is sanctioned in some measure by the sacred writings. There can be no doubt, also, that it had a favourable influence upon the mind of De Foe, as it reconciled him to many distressing events, and enabled him to pass through the vicissitudes of life with a confiding trust in the superintendence of Providence, at the same time opening to his view the cheering prospect of another world.

"I firmly believe," says he, "and have had such convincing testimonies of it that I must be a confirmed atheist if I did not, that there is a converse of spirits, I mean those unembodied, and those that are incased in flesh. From whence, else, come all those private notices, strong impulses, involuntary joy, sadness, and foreboding apprehensions, of and about things immediately attending us, and this in the most important affairs of our lives? That there are such things, I think, I need not go about to prove ; and I believe they are, next to the Scriptures, some of the best and most undeniable evidences of a future existence. It would be endless to fill this paper with the testimonies of learned and pious men ; I could add to them a volume of my own experiences, some of them so strange as would shock your belief, though I could produce such proofs as would convince any man. I have had, perhaps, a greater variety of changes, accidents, and disasters in my short unhappy life, than any man, at least than most men alive ; yet I had never any considerable mischief or disaster attending me, but sleeping or waking I have had notice of it beforehand, and had I listened to these notices, I believe might have shunned the evil. Let no man think this a jest. I seriously acknowledge, and I do believe my neglect of these notices has been my great injury ; and since I have ceased to neglect them, I have been guided to avoid even snares laid for my life, by no other knowledge of them than by such notices and warnings ; and more than that, have been guided by them to discover even the fact and the persons. I have living witnesses to produce, to whom I have told the particulars in the very moment, and who have been so affected with them, as that they have pressed me to avoid the danger, to retire, to keep myself up, and the like." De Foe repeats, that had he not neglected the advice and the notice, he had been safe ; but slighting both, he had fallen into the pit exactly as described to him. He says, that if it would be thought useful, he could descend to particulars ; but it being a private case, he did not think it so material, and therefore avoided it. The inference that he draws from the subject is, that "if such notices, by whatsoever hand, or for whatever purpose, are given us, in our personal, private, and particular cases, as I believe nobody will deny, why may not the same Providence and Power permit the like notices, call them what you will, to be given to some persons in matters public and national? History is full of these ; and were I not at the writing of this absent from books, being now travelling, and at an inn on the road, I could bring a numerous roll of quotations." De Foe refers from memory to the well-known case of Mr Wishart and the Archbishop of St Andrew's ; also to the names of Bradford, Knox, Calvin, Luther, and Buchanan, for other examples ; and particularly to Mr Withers, who foretold the fire of London several years before it happened.

Our author then descends to the phenomena of dreams, which he desires to touch with great caution, on account of the extremes into which even good people are apt to run. But, in support of his theory, he adduces the examples of Job, Daniel, Joseph, and others recorded in Scripture ; and, referring to profane history, he cites the dream of Cæsar's wife, and the celebrated case of Brutus at Philippi. From the whole, he concludes with a desire to steer between the two extremes of rejecting "the warning God is pleased to give us in visions of the night, and of giving heed to those delusions of the imagination, which proceed only from a distempered brain."*

In all his excursions through the world of spirits, De Foe never allowed himself to wander beyond the confines of religion. If his speculations are sometimes fanciful, and in but little accordance with the known phenomena of the human mind, it is a consequence resulting from the uncertain nature of his subject. Further, whatever were his own sentiments upon the subject of supernatural appearances,—and there is reason to think that he entertained a belief of them upon extraordinary occasions,—yet he was far from feeding the credulity of the vulgar, by sanctioning the impostures that were daily practised by cunning men laying wait to deceive. The works he composed are designed rather to unmask the popular delusion ; and, in stripping it of its magic, he often resorts to a strain of irony, which few could handle with greater effect.

From the succession of works produced by him upon the subject, and the elaborate manner in which he has treated it, there is reason to suppose that he was allured to it by taste, and that it occupied a large portion of his serious attention. At any rate, he could not easily have selected one that was likely to gain a larger share of popularity, or in which the depraved taste of the vulgar called more loudly for correction. It is to his credit, that whilst he administers to the amusement of the reader, he never loses sight of his improvement. Although there is no subject upon which curiosity is more awake, yet he forbears to gratify it by diving into the secrets of nature ; his treatises, therefore, partake less of the mechanism of science than of that moral instruction which he is most solicitous to impress upon his reader. But whilst our author appears more ambitious to be thought a moralist than a conjuror, his treatises display a considerable portion of learning and research ; and they are enlivened by a number of dialogues and stories, that strongly indicate the genius of the writer.

De Foe's first work in this class was 'The Political History of the Devil, as well Ancient as Modern : in Two Parts. London : 1726.' A fine satire upon the credulity of mankind. De Foe explodes the vulgar notions of his person and residence as the fictions of poets and painters, and "little more or less than the old story of Pluto, Cerberus, and Charon ; only that our tale is not half so well told, nor the parts of the fable so well laid together." He adds, "Let us learn to talk of these things as we should do ; and as we really cannot describe them to our reason and understanding, why should we describe them to our senses ?" His work exhibits much and various reading, strong natural sense, and an intimate knowledge of mankind. His talent for broad-buffeting sarcasm is applied with wonderful effect in exposing the popular delusions, whilst they supply him with materials for insinuating wholesome moral instruction. One of his leading objects is to correct the bad passions of mankind, by tracing them to their proper source, and by showing that they furnish a more accurate representation of Satan than the painted spectres with which the world has been so long amused and terrified. The matter and the mode conjoin to make this a charming performance. The author engages poetry and prose, reasoning and wit, persuasion and ridicule, on the side of religion and morals, with wonderful efficacy relieving his argument by a number of entertaining dialogues, and relating many instructive stories, partly real, and partly fictitious, in order to illustrate his subject, and confirm his moral.

In the following year, De Foe pursued the subject of his former treatise, in 'A System of Magic : or, a History of the Black Art. Being an Historical Account of Mankind's most early Dealing with the Devil ; and how the Acquaintance on both sides first began. London : 1727.' This is rather a satire upon the conjurors, than a book of rules for understanding their art. At a period when the dealers in the black art have been chased from the world, a treatise upon magic would recommend itself merely as an object of curiosity. The time is happily gone by for entertaining the subject in a serious light, the credulity that supported it having given way before the diffusion of rational knowledge. It was upon the wane when De Foe wrote ; but as the race of conjurors was not extinguished, his work was not only seasonable, but being written in a popular style, was eminently calculated to expose their knavery. The stories he has collected together for this purpose, are chosen appropriately and related with humour. The turn our author has given to the subject, renders it both an agreeable and an useful performance. The reader will find much information upon the early history of mankind, many scriptural illustrations, and some curious discussions upon the origin of witchcraft and idolatry. In tracing the corruptions of religious worship, he exhibits much learning and ingenuity, intermixed with many shrewd remarks upon the follies they occasion, and the knavery that produced them. His zeal for religion led him to encounter the atheists and sceptics of his day, and to level his satire at the vices of mankind, which diverted their attention from a subject of so much importance. In some few places, his zeal betrays him into improper personalities ; but his remarks in general are distinguished by their soundness, and partake of that keen caustic humour in which he so greatly excelled ; and as a work of mere amusement, delineating the manners of former times, and exhibiting a useful moral, it may be always read with pleasure.

In the same year De Foe produced another work of a kindred nature, entitled 'An Essay on the History and Reality of Apparitions. London : 1727.' The subject being popular, a second edition was soon called for, but not going off so soon as desired, a new title was printed in 1738, when it was announced as a third edition, with the following display of its contents : 'The Secrets of the Invisible World Disclosed ; or, an Universal History of Apparitions, Sacred and Profane, Human Souls departed, &c. By Andrew Moreton, Esq. London : 1738.'

Whoever peruses this treatise will find much to attract his attention, as well for the information it conveys as for the instruction it is intended to communicate. Whatever may be thought of his argument, the author cannot be denied the praise of great adroitness in managing it ; and he has seasoned his work with so many just reflections, as well as enlivened it with so much that is amusing, as to leave a strong impression of its practical utility. De Foe was far from believing the stories handed down by nurses and old women, to scare the minds of children and make up a winter evening's conversation ; and if some of the stories he relates are equally incredible, he lays less stress upon their authenticity than upon the moral to be derived from them. At the same time his impressions of whatever he chose to conceive, are so vivid and literal as almost to confound the distinction between reality and imagination. Not only could he "call spirits from the vasty deep," but they would "come when he did call for them."

The year 1727 also produced two pamphlets from De Foe, under the assumed name of Andrew Moreton. Influenced by the patriotic feeling, that "every man ought, as much as in him lies, to contribute in his station to the public welfare, and not be afraid or ashamed of doing, or at least meaning, well," he committed to the press 'The Protestant Monastery ; or, a Complaint against the Brutality of the Present Age, particularly the Pertness and Insolence of our Youth to Aged Persons. London : 1727 ;' from the strain of which there seems reason to apprehend that De Foe had experienced some undutiful treatment from his children, and, indeed, he tells us that he speaks by experience ; and a letter introduced hereafter will explain more fully the nature of his case. De Foe complains loudly of the forwardness of the young people of his age, which he attributes to the injudicious management of parents ; and he has some excellent remarks upon the mode of dealing with them, in order to their becoming good and useful members of society.

Not long afterwards, our author addressed himself to another public grievance, which called loudly for redress, and which he explained in 'Parochial Tyranny : or, the House-keeper's Complaint against the insupportable Exactions and partial Assessments of Select Vestries. With a Plain Detection of many Abuses committed in the Distribution of Public Charities. Together with a practicable Proposal for amending the same ; which will not only take off great part of the Parish Taxes now subsisting, but ease Parishioners from serving troublesome Offices, or paying exorbitant Fines. By Andrew Moreton, Esq. London.' In this work De Foe complains largely of the abuses resulting from select vestries, the amendment of which, being perpetual, he saw no prospect of. When the subject was brought forward in the session of 1829, by Mr Hobhouse, he took respectful notice of De Foe's pamphlet.

It appears to be known to but few persons, that De Foe published, in the year 1727, a third volume of his 'Family Instructor.' The subjects being of a controversial nature, and referring to points that have been so frequently handled by other writers, has occasioned it to be less popular than his practical treatises, and consequently less known. But those who may be desirous of instructing their families in such matters, will find much that is valuable for their purpose, in a compendious form, and conveyed in a familiar manner. The object of the writer in this, as well as in his former volumes, is the communication of religious knowledge ; but the subject relates to those controversies that have divided the Christian world. It is entitled 'A New Family Instructor. In familiar Discourses between a Father and his Children, on the most essential points of the Christian Religion. In two parts, &c.'

This, like the other Family Instructors, consists of a series of dialogues between a father and his children, and the children with each other. One of them, the eldest son, during his travels abroad, had turned Roman Catholic, which brings forward a long discussion upon the leading points in controversy between Papists and Protestants. The debate is managed with considerable humour, and elicits much historical information, gleaned from ecclesiastical writers. In the subsequent part of the work, De Foe turns the debate upon other topics, which he argues with perspicuity and great seriousness, and in so familiar a manner as to render them easy of comprehension to the plainest understanding. Having studied the controversies of the times, he was armed at all points with the arguments alleged by different parties, and states them with as much fairness as can be expected from one who has a system of his own to defend. He had read the Scriptures until they had become so familiar to him that he could cite them readily upon any subject that required their authority ; and the manner in which he often applies them, shows equal sagacity and judgment. Deeply impressed with the importance of religion, he aims, by the most solemn and persuasive arguments, to fix it upon the attention of his readers. To the rising generation, as most susceptible of impression, he addresses himself more particularly in the present work, endeavouring to allure their attention by diversifying his subject, and rendering it pleasing at the same time that it instructs.

In his anxiety to improve the morals of the age, De Foe now published a large treatise upon the subject of marriage ; principally with a view to correct the loose notions that prevailed with regard to it, and to counteract the abuses to which it sometimes led amongst the depraved of both sexes. It was first entitled 'Conjugal Lewdness ; or Matrimonial Whoredom : ' but this title being considered offensive to delicacy, he immediately cancelled it, and substituted the following :—'A Treatise concerning the Use and Abuse of the Marriage Bed, &c. 1727.'

De Foe had now arrived at a time of life when he could reprove the vices of the age with some degree of authority, and assume a dignified indifference to the reproaches that might be cast upon him for encountering such a subject. He was well aware of its delicacy, and of the clamours that would be raised against it by "the ill-nature of the age ;" but he resolved to silence the voice of censure, by avoiding any expressions that could justly offend the ears of modesty. He tells us it was almost thirty years since he had begun the work ; and that, during all that time, he had heard, with a just concern, the complaints of good men upon the subject. The grave and the sober, the lovers of virtue and of religion, had expressed themselves with grief upon the growing scandal, and often pressed him to finish and bring out this reproof. He says he had delayed the publication hitherto, partly on account of his years, and partly in hopes of reformation ; "but now despairing of amendment, grown old, and out of reach of scandal, sincerely aiming at the reformation of the guilty, and despising all unjust reproach from a vicious age, he closes his days with this satire, which he is so far from seeing cause to be ashamed of, that he hopes he shall not, where he is going to account for it."

De Foe informs us, that his work was no sooner advertised, than it was pronounced objectionable ; and this, not merely as it regarded the title, but even the subject itself, which it was thought impossible to handle in any other than an offensive manner. Nay, some went so far as to insinuate that it was a bait to the curiosity of that part of the reading world, whose vices would be prompted as much by the reproof as by the plainest description. De Foe wisely observes, that he shall answer these people best by silence in his introduction, and a speaking performance. The satisfactory manner in which he has redeemed his pledge, must be apparent to every reader, who will admire the extreme caution of the writer, and the delicacy of his allusions. "Words modestly expressed," says he, "can give no immodest ideas when the minds of those who read are chaste and uncorrupted." Although the principal object of our author is to expose the abuses that arise out of the marriage union, yet he discusses the subject of marriage in a variety of particulars, and has many useful remarks that are well deserving of attention. He was a great friend to matrimony, which he considered the highest state of human felicity; from whence it may be concluded that he was himself happy in that relation.

The matter of the work must be allowed to be excellent, and to be composed with great seriousness as well as force of argument. The satire is free from levity, the reproof pointed, but delicate, and the moral so pure and convincing, that the reader is constrained to do justice to the piety and benevolence of the writer. He, indeed, deserves the highest praise for encountering the prejudices of mankind, at the risk of personal obloquy. It is, in short, an estimable work, with an exceptionable title.

Although age was now advancing apace upon our author, and subjected him to bodily infirmities, yet his faculties appear to have lost none of their acuteness; his memory still retained its freshness, and his mind its accustomed vigour. Of this he gave a satisfying proof in some elaborate treatises which he now composed upon the subject of trade. No fewer than three volumes of considerable bulk, the fruit of long experience and accurate observation, were issued by him successively within the short space of little more than one year. It is painful to reflect that this surprising rapidity of his pen, towards the close of a long life, was probably urged forward by the imperious demands of necessity.

The first of these works appeared in the early part of 1727, under the title of 'The Compleat English Tradesman: in Familiar Letters, directing him in all the several Parts and Progressions of Trade, &c.: London: 1727,' the favourable reception of which induced our author to add a second volume in the same year, completing the work. Both these volumes are eminently characterized by sound sense, knowledge of the world, and the inculcation of moral principle. In them the tradesman will find many directions of business, and many lessons of prudence. De Foe was not one of those writers who consider private vices public benefits. "God forbid," he exclaims, "that I should be understood to prompt the vices of the age in order to promote any practice of traffic: trade need not be destroyed though vice were mortally wounded." If his former writings had not given abundant evidence of the fact, these volumes are sufficient to show the penetration of the writer, and that he was an accurate painter of life and manners in the middle classes of society. Although the lapse of a century has necessarily produced a considerable change both in habits and manners, yet the instruction conveyed in 'The Compleat Tradesman' will be always seasonable; and this, not merely as it respects the class of persons to whom it is addressed. The caustic satire of the writer reaches the buyer as well as the seller; and it is seen how much the honesty of the one is affected by the dealings of the other. Few persons, perhaps, would expect to meet with amusement upon so dull a subject as trade; yet, inspired by the genius of De Foe, it has furnished materials for a most amusing work.

"In the first place," observes Mr Chambers, "it is a capital specimen of the good plain old-fashioned English, of which De Foe was such a master, as well as of that unpretending, and yet singularly nervous colloquial style, in which he commemorated the adventures of his 'Crusoe.' In the second place, it contains all the general advices which a senior tradesman of the present day would be disposed to give to a junior; and thus after all, in one main and essential point, is as well calculated for the present age as for that of its author. But the grand recommendation of the book, and that which might make any existing author hesitate to attempt another by way of superseding it, is the admirable shrewdness and good sense which shine throughout its every page—good sense native to the author, but immensely improved by the experience of a long life, no small part of which had been spent in trade. It might, indeed, be well supposed beforehand of such a man as De Foe, that, when he was pleased to sit down in old age, and write all that his sagacious mind had observed and thought respecting that department of every-day world exertion, in which, as a private citizen, he had been chiefly engaged, the result could not fail to be one of the most instructive, and not the least entertaining, of all the books in our language; and such 'The Complete English Tradesman' really is.

"While chiefly to be esteemed for these qualities, there are others which may recommend it to many besides young tradesmen. It throws a curious light upon some of the customs of the time—as, for instance, where it describes the barbarous modes of procedure in cases of bankruptcy (chapter xiii), or where it speaks of the cotton-manufacturers of Manchester as "a kind of pedlars, who carry their goods themselves to the country shopkeepers everywhere." In chapter xviii there is a striking account of the consequences of the very worn and imperfect coinage which then existed, tradesmen of almost all kinds exerting themselves to pass off bad money, and men even going through the streets openly purchasing it at an inferior price, in order to profit by making it go as good. Upon the whole, the book conveys the impression that the honesty of the trading-class has considerably improved since 1726. There are many anecdotes, such as one can imagine to have been floating about Cheapside and Aldgate, in the reign of William and Mary, respecting trade and traders, which De Foe relates in a lively and dramatic manner. Even in De Foe's time we can gather that business had been no such pressing affair as it now is. He speaks of shopmen allowed to go away at the shutting of the shop, on condition that they should be at home again at nine o'clock, thus showing that business must have concluded long before nine—probably, we should think, at seven. From his insisting so much on the wives of tradesmen acquainting themselves with their husbands' business, and his scarcely making any allusion to out of town houses for the families of tradesmen, and from the small incomes he instances tradesmen as making, we readily see that a simple state of things then existed in London, such as is now perhaps to be found only in fourth-rate towns. Yet he speaks strongly of new and extravagant methods of fitting up shops, and of a general decline from the homely and economical manners of a past age. It might almost be supposed that his trading contemporaries, without exception, were tempted, by the ambition of a fine style of living, to exceed their incomes, and that this was a feature peculiar to the age. But even if the impossibility of a general excess like this were not sufficient to show that our author had written under a delusion, we have only to recollect certain scenes in 'Eastward Ho,' 'The City Madam,' and other plays of the reign of James I and Charles I, to be assured that 'bravery of living' was no new vice of the city. The author is probably right when he represents the religious habits of the Londoners as considerably changed in his recollection, for the impressions made in the time of the civil war had ever since been gradually wearing out; but, in all likelihood, the progress of domestic expense only kept pace with the increase of wealth, and refinement was added without any impairment of virtue."

The instructions laid down by our author for the management of trade, were followed soon afterwards by a luminous treatise upon its history and policy, with suggestions for its improvement. This he entitled 'A Plan of the English Commerce. Being a Compleat Prospect of the Trade of this Nation, as well the Home Trade as the Foreign. In Three Parts. London: 1728.' This work was probably the completion of an undertaking commenced by De Foe in 1713, and proposed to be published periodically, but extending only to two numbers. Soon after the publication of the 'Plan of Commerce,' a work somewhat similar in design was published by Joshua Gee, under the title of 'The Trade and Navigation of Great Britain Considered.' Mr Chalmers, who was fully conversant with such matters, draws the following parallel between the two writers:—"De Foe insisted that our industry, our commerce, our opulence, and our people, had increased, and were increasing. Gee represented that our manufactures had received mortal stabs; that our poor were destitute and our country miserable. De Foe maintained the truth which experience has taught to unwilling auditors. Gee asserted this falsehood without knowing the fact; yet Gee is quoted, while De Foe, with all his knowledge of the subject as a commercial writer, is almost forgotten. The reason may be found perhaps in the characteristic remark with which he opens his plan:—"Trade, like religion, is what everybody talks of, but few understand."

Amongst the productions of the year 1728 was a fictitious narrative of an English officer, belonging to the same class of writing as the 'Memoirs of a Cavalier,' and which, after having long passed as the production of the person to whom it relates, is now well known to be the work of our author. It is entitled 'The Military Memoirs of Captain George Carleton. From the Dutch War, 1672, in which he served, to the Conclusion of the Peace of Utrecht, 1713, &c. London: 1728.' A principal part of the work is a record of the military achievements of the celebrated Earl of Peterborough, who figured in Spain during the wars of Queen Anne; and it exhibits the character of a soldier distinguished alike by professional prowess and by devotion to the fair sex. The military details of which it is composed are relieved by many anecdotes and striking incidents, that contribute to render it an agreeable and an entertaining performance. Although full of the business of war, it abounds with picturesque descriptions of the country and its inhabitants, of many local customs and observances, and of the genius of the Roman Catholic religion. The moral reflections that are interspersed, the sarcasm upon duelling, and the hints upon predestination and providence, are quite in De Foe's taste, as are the few political allusions; and we are no less reminded of him by the plain, matter-of-fact, and off-handed manner of telling the story. The events detailed in the work are matters of history, and are related with all the minuteness and personality of an eye-witness and an actor upon the spot. So faithful is the likeness to truth, and so accurate the descriptions, that it has been generally read as an authentic work, like the 'History of the Plague,' and the 'Memoirs of a Cavalier.' As such it was considered by Dr Johnson, who expressed much satisfaction in the perusal. It was first introduced to his notice by Lord Eliot, in consequence of his observing upon the little that was known of Lord Peterborough, for whom he had a great veneration. Lord Eliot told him that the best account of that nobleman which he had happened to meet with was to be found in Captain Carleton's Memoirs.—"Carleton," he added, "was descended of an ancestor who distinguished himself at the siege of Derry. He was an officer, and what was rare at that time, had some knowledge of engineering;" particulars that he had collected from the Memoirs. Johnson observed that he had never heard of the book. After a good deal of inquiry, Boswell informs us that he procured a copy and sent it to Johnson, who told Sir Joshua Reynolds that he was going to bed when it came, but he was so much pleased with it that he sat up till he had read it through, and found in it such an air of truth that he could not doubt of its authenticity; adding, with a smile, "I did not think a young lord could have mentioned to me a book in the English history that was not known to me."

In this and the following year our author produced two more pamphlets, under the assumed name of Andrew Moreton, and both arising out of his zeal for national improvement. De Foe had long witnessed, with regret, the abuses in the administration of our laws, and was desirous of procuring fresh enactments to enforce their observance. The alarming state of crime in the metropolis called from him many energetic remonstrances, as well as plans for its prevention. He also suggests amendments in some of our public institutions, and projects others for the relief of the unfortunate, or for the improvement of mankind in knowledge and virtue. Among his suggestions are a London University, a Foundling Hospital, and a Metropolitan Police. De Foe's other schemes are as practicable as these have since been proved to be, and are all in the highest degree benevolent and useful. His first pamphlet embodying his idea of these reforms is entitled 'Augusta Triumphans; or, the Way to make London the most flourishing City in the Universe.' In this pamphlet, De Foe laid down a plain and practicable scheme for the total suppression and prevention of street robberies, "which scheme," says he, "has been approved of by several learned and judicious persons." Within a short time after its appearance, some other projector stepped in to rob him of his honours, and suggested a similar plan; which was submitted to parliament, and received the ostentatious support of venal news-writers. Indignant at this invasion of his property, De Foe resolved upon sending forth a new and enlarged version of his plan, preceded by a statement of his literary grievances. His second pamphlet is entitled 'Second Thoughts are Best; or, a Further Improvement of a late Scheme to Prevent Street Robberies. In which our streets will be so strongly guarded, and so gloriously illuminated, that any part of London will be as safe and pleasant at midnight as at noon-day; and Burglary totally impracticable. With some Thoughts for suppressing Robberies in all the Publick Roads of England, &c. By Andrew Moreton, Esq. London: 1729.'

Of an author who wrote so much as De Foe, and whose works are chiefly anonymous, it may be difficult to assign the last publication. From a passage in the preface to his 'Use and Abuse of the Marriage Bed,' it may be inferred that he expected to close his labours with that "upright intention for the good of mankind;" but we have seen that he lived to write several pieces afterwards. An Appendix to the 'Plan of the English Commerce,' added to the second edition of that work, in the early part of 1730, was, however, in all probability the conclusion of his literary labours; or, at any rate, the last of his published works. He was then upon the verge of his last voyage to that country upon which he had long fixed his attention, and from whence no traveller returns.

He had prepared another work for publication a little before his death, but owing to illness, or to some other cause, only one sheet of it appears to have been printed.* It was to have been entitled 'The Compleat Gentleman, containing useful observations on the general Neglect of Education of English Gentlemen, with the Reason and Remedies; the apparent Differences between a Well-Born and Well-Bred Gentleman; and

*The following letter to his printer, "Mr J. Watts, in Wild court," relates to the above work:—

"Sr,—I am to ask yo^r pardon for keeping the enclosed so long, Mr Baker having told me yo^r resolution of taking it in hand and working it off. But I have been exceeding ill. I have revised it again and contracted it very much, and hope to bring it within the bulk you desire, or as near it as possible. But this and some needful alterations will oblige you to much trouble in the first sheet, and perhaps almost as bad as setting it over again, which cannot be avoided. I will Instructions how Gentlemen may recover a Deficiency of their Latin, and be Men of Learning, though without the Pedantry of Schools.' The manuscript of the work, which is partly in Short-hand, is still in existence, and in the possession of one of his lineal descendants, the Rev. Henry De Foe Baker, by whose courtesy Mr Wilson was enabled to give the following analysis of its contents :—

Part the First. Chap. 1. Of the Gentleman born, in the common acceptation of the word, and as the Gentry amongst us are pleased to understand it. Chap. 2. Some Examples from History and from good Information of the Want of Care taken in the Education of Princes and Children of the Nobility in former times, as well in this Nation as in foreign Countries, and how fatal the Effects of it have been in their future Conduct ; with some few Examples of the contrary also. Chap. 3. Examples of the different Educations of Princes and Persons of rank from the beginning of the sixteenth century, viz., from the Reign of Henry VIII inclusive. With Observations down to the present time, on the Happiness of these Reigns in general, where the Princes have been Educated in Principles of Honour and Virtue ; and something of the contrary. Chap. 4. Of Royal Education. Chap. 5. The head of this chapter is erased. Chap. 6. Of the G—— ; of Himself, his Family, and Fortune.

Part the Second. Chap. 1. Of the Fund for Increase of our Nobility and Gentry in England ; being the Beginning of those we call Bred Gentlemen, with some Account of Difference. Chap. 2. There is no head to this chapter. Chap. 3. Of the General Ignorance of the English Gentry, and the True Cause of it in the Manner of their Introduction into Life. Chap. 4. Of what may be the Unhappy Cause of the General Defect in the Education of our Gentry ; with a Rational Proposal for Preventing those Consequences.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE rapidity with which his publications had followed each other, and the successive editions that were in demand during his life-time, if his gains were at all commensurate, ought to have ensured our author a considerable degree of wealth, but De Foe was never destined to be a rich man. Indeed, it is quite clear, that with all his ability and industry, however he might be formed to serve his country or delight mankind, he was not one of those who are born to make their fortunes,—either from a careless, improvident disposition, that squanders away its advantages, or a sanguine and restless temper, that constantly abandons a successful pursuit for some new and gilded project. He must, however, have been in easy circumstances during the first run of his romances. In 1721 he fined to the parish of Stoke Newington, to be excused serving parish offices. In the following year he obtained from the corporation of Colchester a lease for ninety-nine years of Kingswood heath, at a yearly rent of 120*l.*, besides a fine of 500*l.* But whether his speculation failed, or to whatever cause it was owing, he did not retain it long ; for we find the property transferred soon afterwards to Walter Bernard. At the time that Mr Chalmers wrote, Kingswood heath was worth 300*l.* a-year. It must have been about this time, or a little before, that he built a large and handsome house for his own residence at Stoke Newington ; and if we endeavour to send the rest of the copy so well corrected as to give you very little trouble. I here return the first sheet, and as much copy as will make near three sheets more ; you shall have all the remainder so as not to let you stand still at all.

“DE FOE.”

may believe the report of his literary opponents, he had the luxury of a coach and its accustomed appendages. But whatever may have been his pecuniary circumstances, they could not procure him the blessings of health. He was tormented with those dreadful maladies, the gout and the stone, occasioned in part, most probably, by his close application ; and they subjected him to continual attacks of illness during the remainder of his life.

Henry Baker, the celebrated natural philosopher, who married one of De Foe's daughters, left behind him some valuable papers. Amongst these is a short narrative of his early acquaintance with his wife, which, as containing some notice of De Foe at this period, will gratify the reader. It is as follows :—

“ In the year 1724 Mr H. Baker engaged in an undertaking which required his spending some days every week at Newington. Amongst the first who desired his acquaintance there was Mr De Foe, a gentleman well known by his writings, who had newly built there a very handsome house, as a retirement from London, and amused his time, either in the cultivation of a large and pleasant garden, or in the pursuit of his studies, which he found means of making very profitable. He was now at least sixty years of age, afflicted with the gout and stone, but retained all his mental faculties entire. Mr Baker readily accepted his invitation, and was so pleased with his conversation, that he seldom came to Newington without paying a visit to Mr De Foe. He met usually at the tea-table his three lovely daughters, who were admired for their beauty, their education, and their prudent conduct ; and if sometimes Mr De Foe's disorders made company inconvenient, Mr Baker was entertained by them, either singly or together, and that commonly in the garden, when the weather was favourable. Mr Baker very soon discovered the superior excellencies of Miss Sophia, the youngest daughter, (of whose person and manners the writer speaks in strains of the highest eulogium.) He knew nothing of Mr De Foe's circumstances ; only imagined, from his very genteel way of living, that he must be able to give his daughter a decent portion : he did not suppose a large one. On speaking to Mr De Foe, he sanctioned his proposals, and said he hoped he should be able to give her a certain sum specified ; but when urged to the point some time afterwards, his answer was, that formal articles he thought unnecessary ; that he could confide in the honour of Mr Baker ; that when they talked before, he did not know the true state of his own affairs ; that he found he could not part with any money at present ; but at his death, his daughter's portion would be more than he had promised ; and he offered his own bond as a guarantee for the payment.” With this, it seems, Mr Baker was not satisfied ; and their altercation upon money matters produced a coolness between them for some time, so that they seldom saw each other ; but Mr Baker constantly visited his fair Sophia. It is said that, by creating these difficulties, De Foe expected the impatience of the young people would be wearied into a marriage, without any previous agreement with him. But if so, he was disappointed ; for, after a protracted negotiation of almost two years, the same authority says, that he consented to engage his house at Newington as a security, and articles were executed accordingly. De Foe had no ready money to part with, but gave a bond with his daughter for 500*l.* payable after his death. It bears date, April 5, 1729, and the marriage was celebrated upon the 30th of the same month.

It appears that, whilst De Foe was negotiating with Mr Baker, he had another estate in Essex, which, with that at Newington, he had secured, in some way, for the benefit of his family. But his property was a source of much vexation to him, chiefly through the undutiful behaviour of his son.

Little as it may consist with the foregoing account of De Foe's circumstances, it was not long after his daughter's marriage, that he was doomed to undergo the privation, not only of the comforts he enjoyed in his retreat at Newington, but even of his personal liberty. The immediate occasion of it cannot now be known; but he was probably thrown into prison by some merciless creditor, whom he hints at as a "wicked and perjured enemy." He was not long in confinement, for we find him again at liberty in August 1730, although still not without apprehensions of renewed troubles. All this while he suffered greatly from bodily affliction, having been brought low by an attack of fever. But these were not the whole of De Foe's misfortunes. He who had borne so long the buffetings of the world, possessed a spirit that refused to sink under them, until he was touched by a hand that should have nourished and protected him. He could say in the language of the prophet, "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me." It seems that, to prevent the shipwreck of his property, he had conveyed it to his son, with a legal obligation, as well as private understanding, that it was for the joint benefit of his wife and two unmarried daughters. But he proved an unfaithful steward, converting the property to his own use, and leaving his mother and sisters to want. This unnatural conduct pierced his unhappy father to the very soul; but how it touched him can be told only by his own pen. The following letter to Mr Baker presents a scene of sorrow, such as, for the honour of human nature, it is to be hoped but rarely occurs. He who can read it with unmoistened eyes must be possessed of feelings that no man ought to envy.

"Dear Mr Baker,

"I have yo^r very kind and affecc'onate letter of the 1st, but not come to my hand till y^e 10th; where it had been delayed I kno' not. As your kind manner, and kinder thought, from w^h it flows (for I take all you say to be as I always believed you to be, sincere and Nathaniel like, without guile), was a particular satisfacc'on to me; so the stop of a letter, however it happened, deprived me of that cordial too many days, considering how much I stood in need of it, to support a mind sinking under the weight of an afflicc'on too heavy for my strength, and looking on myself as abandoned of every comfort, every friend, and every relative, except such only as are able to give me no assistance.

"I was sorry you should say at y^e beginning of your letter you were debarred seeing me. Depend upon my sincerity for this, I am far from debarring you. On y^e contrary, it would be a greater comfort to me than any I now enjoy, that I could have y^r agreeable visits wth safety, and could see both you and my dearest Sophia, could it be without giving her y^e grief of seeing her father in tenebris, and under y^e load of insupportable sorrows. I am sorry I must open my griefs so far as to tell her, it is not y^e blow I rec^d from a wicked, perjur'd, and contemptible enemy, that has broken in upon my spirit; w^{ch}, as she well knows, has carryed me on thro' greater disasters than these. But it has been the injustice, unkindness, and, I must say, inhuman dealing of my own son, w^{ch} has both ruined my family, and, in a word, has broken my heart; and as I am at this time under a weight of very heavy illness, w^{ch} I think will be a fever, I take this occasion to vent my grief in y^e breasts who I know will make a prudent use of it, and tell you, that nothing but this has conquered or could conquer me. Et tu! Brute. I depended upon him, I trusted him, I gave up my two dear unprovided children into his hands; but he has no compassion, and suffers them and their poor dying mother to beg their bread at his door, and to crave, as if it were an alms, what he is bound under hand and seal, besides the most sacred promises, to supply them with; himself, at y^e same time, living in a profusion of plenty. It is too much for me. Excuse my infirmity; I can say no more, my heart is too full. I only ask one thing of you as a dying request. Stand by them when I am gone, and let them not be wrong'd, while he is able to do them right. Stand by them as a brother; and if you have anything within you owing to my memory, who have bestow'd on you the best gift I had to give, let y^m not be injured and trampled on by false pretences, and unnatural reflections. I hope they will want no help but that of comfort and council; but that they will indeed want, being too easie to be manag'd by words and promises.

"It adds to my grief that it is so difficult to me to see you. I am at a distance from Londⁿ in Kent; nor have I a lodging in London, nor have I been at that place in the Old Bailey since I wrote you I was removed from it. At present I am weak, having had some fits of a fever that have left me low. But those things much more.

"I have not seen son or daughter, wife or child, many weeks, and kno' not which way to see them. They dare not come by water, and by land here is no coach, and I kno' not what to do.

"It is not possible for me to come to Enfield, unless you could find a retired lodging for me, where I might not be known, and might have the comfort of seeing you both now and then; upon such a circumstance I could gladly give the days to solitude, to have the comfort of half an hour now and then, with you both, for two or three weeks. But just to come and look at you, and retire immediately, 'tis a burden too heavy. The parting will be a price beyond the enjoyment.

"I would say (I hope) with comfort, that 'tis yet well. I am so near my journey's end, and am hastening to the place where y^e weary are at rest, and where the wicked cease to trouble; be it that the passage is rough, and the day stormy, by what way soever He please to bring me to the end of it, I desire to finish life with this temper of soul in all cases. Te Deum Laudamus.

"I congratulate you on y^e occasion of y^r happy advance in y^r employment. May all you do be prosperous, and all you meet with pleasant, and may you both escape the tortures and troubles of uneasie life. May you sail y^e dangerous voyage of life with a forcing wind, and make the port of heaven without a storm.

"It adds to my grief that I must never see the pledge of your mutual love, my little grandson. Give him my blessing, and may he be to you both your joy in youth, and your comfort in age, and never add a sigh to your sorrow. But, alas! that is not to be expected. Kiss my dear Sophy once more for me; and if I must see her no more, tell her this is from a father that loved her above all his comforts, to his last breath.

"Yor unhappy,

"About two miles from Greenwich, Kent,

"D. F.

Tuesday, Augst 12, 1730.

"P.S. I wrote you a letter some months ago, in answer to one from you, about selling y^e house; but you never signified to me whether you received it. I have not the policy of assurance; I suppose my wife, or Hannah, may have it.

"Idem.

From this scene of sorrow, we must now hasten to an event that dropped before it the dark curtain of time. Having received a wound that was incurable, there is too much reason to fear that the anguish arising from it sunk deep in his spirits, and hastened the crisis that, in a few months, brought his troubles to a final close. As the shadow of life declined, we may easily believe that his prospect of a better world grew stronger and brighter. It was long since that he had resolved the business of life into these two particulars: "Reflections upon things past; serious application to things future." His latter writings all lead to the conclusion, that he considered himself upon the verge of another world, and was setting his house in order, that he might not be taken by surprise. With a resolute purpose to devote his energies, so long as they continued, to the improvement of mankind, we observe a growing indifference to passing scenes, and an elevation of mind that raised his contemplations to spiritual objects. Those religious impressions which he had imbibed early, and carried with him through life, were sharpened by the asperities of his situation. They became his solace under the frowns of the world, and the staff of his old age. Disciplined in the school of affliction, he had been taught submission to the hand that inflicted it; and aware of the difficulties that beset a conscientious adherence to the path of duty, he made them a motive for vigilance and frequent self-examination. In a former work he has the following reflections suggested by the prospect of a future state:—"I believe nothing would contribute more to make us good Christians than to be able to look upon all things, causes, and persons here, with the same eyes as we do when we are looking into eternity. Death sets all in a clear light; and when a man is, as it were, in the very boat, pushing off from the shore of the world, his last views of it being abstracted from interests, hopes, or wishes, and influenced by the near view of the future state, must be clear, unbiassed, and impartial." *

With a mind elevated above the grovelling pursuits of the mere worldling, and steadily fixed upon the scenes that were opening to him as he approached the boundaries of time, De Foe could not be unprepared for the change that was to separate him from his dearest connexions. His death took place upon the 24th of April, 1731, when he was about seventy years of age, having been born in the year 1661. Cibber and others state that he died at his house at Islington; but this is incorrect. The parish of St Giles, Cripplegate, in which he drew his first breath, was also destined to receive his last. This we learn from the parish register, which further informs us, that he went off in a lethargy.† He was buried from thence, upon the 26th of April, in Tindall's Burying-ground, now most known by the name of Bunhill fields. The entry in the register, written by some person, who made a strange blunder of his name, is as follows: "1731. April 26. Mr Dubow. Cripplegate." Whether De Foe passed his latter days in the midst of his family, or in an obscure lodging by himself, can now be only matter of conjecture: it is to be hoped he was not without the solace of those who were best fitted to administer to him the little remnant of earthly enjoyment. After his death his widow, Susannah, continued to reside at Stoke Newington; and as his daughters were afterwards in independent circumstances, it may be presumed that they succeeded in recovering their property. Mr Baker, who appears to have been a kind-hearted man, probably stood their friend upon the occasion. Mrs De Foe did not long survive her husband, dying at the latter end of the following year. She was also removed to Bunhill fields for interment, as appears by the following entry: "1732. Decr. 19. Mrs Defow. Stoke Newington." The same register records the burial of another Mrs De Foe, about four years afterwards. She was brought from Hackney, and was most probably a daughter-in law. The entry stands thus: "1737. Janr. 19. Mrs Deffoe. St John's, Hackney."

It is lamentable to reflect, that a man of De Foe's genius and talents should have died insolvent; yet the events that befel him during the last year or two of his life, could have produced no other result. Although, during a long and active life, his pen had known but little intermission, and the profits from his publications latterly could not have been inconsiderable, yet the demands of a numerous family, upon whose education he had not been sparing of expense, must have quickly absorbed them. In addition to this, he was never free from the burthen of unsatisfied creditors, which acted as a mill-stone about his neck, and plunged him at last in irrecoverable poverty. He who had nothing to leave had no occasion for a will. Accordingly, there is none to be found in Doctors' Commons; but the books there inform us, that, in September 1773, letters of administration on his goods and chattels were granted to Mary Brooks, widow, a creditrix, after summoning in official form the next of kin to appear.

CHAPTER XX.

It now only remains to lay before our readers the various estimates which have been formed of De Foe's character by authors who have made him the subject of their consideration, commencing with Mr Wilson, to whom the present editor is indebted for the materials of the larger portion of this memoir.

"It has been justly remarked by a sensible writer, that 'No history can furnish us with an example of a man whose life and actions have been universally applauded: malice, or a different interest, being always ready to wound the noblest integrity.'* Of the truth of this sentiment De Foe was a memorable instance. Living at a period when the political horizon was overspread by faction, invading the peace of families, and diffusing a canker through the social system, a less prominent character would scarcely have escaped without scars upon his reputation. An eminent living writer, referring to the former part of it, and what he says is equally true of the latter, observed, 'A critic of that time never deemed that he had so effectually refuted the reasoning of his adversary, as when he had said something disrespectful of his talents, person, or moral character. Thus, literary contest was embittered by personal hatred, and truth was so far from being the object of the combatants, that even victory was tasteless unless obtained by the disgrace and degradation of the antagonist.'† But this illegitimate mode of warfare was not confined to literature: it was carried into the world of politics, where it assumed the highest tone of acrimony. In those sour days, both the understandings and the morals of men were estimated according to the party they belonged to, and received a colouring in proportion to their own importance, or to the skill of their adversaries. When the human character has been subjected to so precarious a test, it is no wonder that virtue and vice have changed their positions in history, and that they have been so shifted in their application as to be accommodated to the prejudices of those who had a turn to serve by their dishonesty. Although this perversion of ideas may be set straight by the cool judgment of posterity, yet when the poison is dilated through endless ramifications, the antidote has fearful odds to contend with. But, should time moderate the symptoms, it is not before the original purpose was answered. When men are stunned by clamour, and borne down by the voice of authority, their mouths are stopped from inquiry, and they easily take that for granted which, upon sober investigation, would turn out to be merely the result of prejudice. This circumstance, so unfavourable to the cause of truth, has given a real disadvantage to those who have contended against popular opinions; the merits of the question being shifted to foreign matters, or absorbed in the common share of scandal and abuse. At the period of which we are speaking, even men of the greatest names were not above stooping to these low and disingenuous arts; whilst the calumnies they propagated derived an authority from their sanction.

"In this ocean of slander no one was dipped more deeply than De Foe. To sink his reputation as a patriot he was charged with selfishness and venality; and to ruin him in the estimation of the virtuous, his moral character was assailed by the most impudent falsehoods. If we were to believe his enemies, there was scarcely a crime that gave deformity to human nature with which he was not chargeable. The extent to which this mode of warfare was carried can be known only to those who are conversant with the newswriters and pamphleteers of the day. That the libels heaped upon him by his contemporaries should have been wantonly adopted by succeeding writers, affords the less surprise, when we consider the voracious appetite that is indulged for slander, and the slender authority upon which reports are taken up and propagated. Experience shows that history may be written without investigation, and pass current in the world, in spite of the grossest inaccuracy. Of this we have a glaring instance in the volumes of the late Mark Noble, whose account of De Foe is one tissue of misrepresentation and falsehood. His flippancy and his bigotry might have been borne with if these offensive adjuncts had been accompanied by a tolerable share of accuracy; but the want of correctness that disfigures a large proportion of his pages, renders them a ludicrous contrast when placed in juxtaposition with the instructive volumes of the candid and judicious Granger.

“ But amidst the storms of reproach that De Foe was called upon to encounter, he maintained a calm serenity of mind, that could only be inspired by conscious rectitude. He was not insensible to the value of character, nor backward to vindicate himself when attacked; but, standing upon the solid ground of truth and honesty, he was able, with a virtuous indignation, to defy and confute, if not to silence, his calumniators. The frequency with which he had to meet these attacks constrained him sometimes to break through the dignified silence which he usually prescribed to himself, and to trespass upon that diffidence which he thought best befitting persons encompassed with infirmities. He avows that he is not more exempt from human frailties than other men, and is willing to look back upon the best actions of his life with the temper of a penitent. Yet, when he goes so far to stop the mouth of censure, he rejects with indignation the charge of offences that he was conscious had no foundation but in malice. He distinctly asserts that he was not a man of vice, and challenges all the world to prove the contrary; yet he was so far from boasting of his exemption from common vices that he ascribes it solely to the restraining power of divine grace. He thought that little satisfaction was to be derived from negative duties, unless accompanied by active exertions in Christian duty. For the correctness of De Foe’s private conduct we need seek no further evidence than his own manly avowal in the face of his enemies. No man can write in stronger language against the vices of the times; yet none would have had the hardihood to do so if he could be confronted with the vices he condemns. He therefore sets malice at defiance, and reposes in the consciousness of acting well. ‘He that cannot live above the scorn of scoundrels,’ says he, ‘is not fit to live: dogs will bark; and so they shall, without lessening one moment of my tranquillity.’ Anticipating the tongue of slander, he says,

‘ Malice shall write thy character in vain,
Thou know’st more faults than thy describers can;
But let the man that pens thy history
Correct his own, and first repent like thee.’

“ Although a frequenter of the coffee-houses, then the common resort of literary men, it did not trench upon his habits of temperance. Drunkards he denounces as ‘Philosophers in wickedness, who can extract pleasure to themselves in losing their understandings, and making themselves sick at heart for their diversion.’ That he was no swearer, we may justly argue from his constant ridicule of that ‘Frenzy of the tongue, in which there is neither pleasure nor profit.’ He was a great admirer of the fair sex, in the station assigned them by providence and the laws of society, and therefore had a high opinion of marriage, when suitably contracted, and founded upon mutual affection; but he despised the alienation of ‘God’s best gift to man,’ for vicious purposes, as a thing not worth the repentance. Rising above the narrow prejudices of his age, he was desirous of seeing greater attention bestowed upon the education of females, that they might become the companions of our leisure, as well as the directors of our households. No man had a greater relish for the pleasures of society, when restrained within the rules of decorum; but he had a great contempt for that 'low-prized wit,' which was shot off at the expense of decency and morals. With his companionable habits, united to a lively imagination, a good understanding, and a general knowledge, it is easy to conceive that he must have communicated as much pleasure as he derived from society; and we may be assured, that the man who attended the levees of Godolphin and Harley, and could ingratiate himself with King William and Queen Anne, must have possessed gentlemanly manners. To the natural goodness of his temper we have the testimony of his contemporary, Dunton, who knew him personally; and his writings sufficiently attest its peaceableness. Although frequently engaged in controversy, and treated with the utmost bitterness by his opponents, he rarely departs from gentleness of language, and studiously avoids the mixing up of personal animosities in general arguments; yet, when aroused by repeated injuries, he could exhibit the manliness and vigour of an upright and independent mind. Of his personal courage no one can doubt who looks into his 'Reviews.' For his freedoms in attacking the vices of the age he was often threatened with violence, but always treated such threats with ridicule. Against the absurd practice of duelling, in which the injured party puts himself upon a level with the party who commits the injury, he declares himself in forcible terms: yet it appears that he was once concerned in 'an affair of honour,' for which he expresses his penitence.

"With regard to his petty habits but little can now be told. His religious scruples led him to discourage the theatre, the ball-room, and the card-table, from an apprehension that they are injurious to morals. In this opinion he concurred with many eminent persons, as well of the laity as of the clergy, who signified their approbation of his writings upon those subjects.* There was nothing of effeminacy in De Foe's constitution. He was a friend to many sports and athletic exercises, as not only conducive to health, but calculated to support the reputation of the British character.

"His political opinions were as sound as they are useful, as liberal as they are just. Until the change in the ministry, towards the end of the reign of Queen Anne, he was commonly identified with the Whigs, because he advocated their political doctrines; but it does not appear that he ever derived from them any solid marks of favour. He seems to have possessed too much of a public spirit for the climate of party. He therefore never entered into the private views of the Whigs, nor lent himself to their schemes for personal aggrandizement. Before he lost their good word, he had said, 'I have never loved parties, but with my utmost zeal have sincerely espoused the great original interest of this nation, and of all nations ; I mean truth and liberty : and whoever are of that party, I desire to be with them.*' His obligations to Harley naturally linked him to that minister, and so far fettered him as to impose silence upon some measures that he could not approve. But he owed nothing to the Whigs, and was so far free to follow his patron, whose opinions upon all essential points corresponded with his own. De Foe, however, was not the man to sacrifice his independence to any minister. Whoever employed him, he made a reserve of his liberty to write upon any subject his judgment dictated ; and we have seen that he delivered his sentiments freely upon various measures that emanated from the government of his patron. But this the Whigs either had not the sense to see, or the honesty to acknowledge. In their vituperations of Harley they were equally unsparing of De Foe ; making him responsible for opinions that he never maintained, and for books that he did not write. With little regard to truth, and less charity, they accused him of political delinquencies which they could never establish ; whilst, in giving vent to their malice, they lost sight of their own factiousness. He who serves his country faithfully must expect reproach ; which he will be sure to get from the violent and the venal of all parties. Thus it was with De Foe. The Whigs hated him for his supposed alliance with the Tories : the latter, for his real attachment to the principles of the Whigs. In fact, no man was further removed from Toryism than De Foe, nor wrote more strenuously against it ; yet it was his fate to be misunderstood by the party he served, and that with more honesty than those who were loudest in their clamours against him. If upon some occasions he condemned the conduct of the Whigs, as proceeding from a spirit of faction ; and differed from them upon others that involved questions of national or commercial policy, posterity will give him praise for the greater patriotism and the sounder judgment : he never swerved, like them, from the principles of liberty, nor lost sight of those distinguished features that first gave them reputation as a party. Amidst the versatility of the times few men were less open to the charge of political apostacy than De Foe ; yet no man suffered more unmerited obloquy upon that account. His attachment to Harley, founded upon a sentiment of honour, and strengthened by the persecution of the Whigs, was attended by no compromise of principle, although it led him, perhaps, into some compliances with the times, which his better judgment disapproved ; but Harley's friendship was a crime which they could never forgive. The fall of that minister, therefore, was the signal of his own ruin ; for the Whigs, ascending to power, made him responsible for offences that were his greatest abhorrence. Of his overtures to them for a reconciliation ; of their unforgiving disposition ; and of the manner in which he reconciled himself to his lot, he gives a pathetic narrative in the ' Serious Reflections.'

* Amongst his correspondents was William Melmoth, Esq., a worthy barrister, and author of 'The Great Importance of a Religious Life,' &c. Being in pursuit of the same object as De Foe, he sought the assistance of his literary friends, and, says the writer of his life, wrote a letter to the famous author of a miscellaneous and instructive 'Review,' part of which is as follows:—"Sir,—The regard you have shown to the request I have lately made you, to pursue your design of exposing the stage, obliges me to repeat my thanks to you, which I assure you I do with great sincerity, being always pleased, I must own, whenever I see the play-houses attacked; for I am persuaded they greatly contribute to corrupt the present age. I have taken the freedom to send you Mr Bedford's new book, by which you will see that my charge is not ill-grounded, when I told you how little respect had been shown to her Majesty's order. I am the more induced to trouble you with this book, as thinking it may be of some use to you in the design in which you are engaged. I have likewise sent you the opinion of Archbishop Tillotson touching plays, which has lately been printed and dispersed in great numbers, and which, if it were still made more public, as it might be if printed in one of your 'Reviews,' would prove, I hope, of some use. His opinion, perhaps, may have some weight with those who are proof against other arguments; at least one would think it should make them consider a little what they are doing, when they give countenance to a set of men who seem to bid defiance to all that is serious, &c. &c."—Memoirs of a late eminent Advocate, pp. 54, 55.

"De Foe's religious opinions were conformable to the current standard of orthodoxy among Protestants. He appears to have been well acquainted with the theological controversies of his day, and evinces considerable skill as a disputant ; but, when speaking of his attainments, he always expressed himself with modesty. Living at a period when disputes were conducted with much intemperance, he protests earnestly against such a mode of warfare. It is not to be expected that a man of De Foe's temperament would be without his prejudices ; indeed, who amongst the sons of men can be said to be free from them ? If his zeal occasionally betrayed him into intemperate expressions, and led him to draw conclusions unfavourable to the character of those who differed from him, they are blemishes which occur but seldom in his writings. In the ecclesiastical disputes of the times he took part with the Dissenters. This was no small disadvantage to him in a financial view, as it incapacitated him for those employments in the state to which his talents and his connexions might lead him to aspire. But he gloried in the profession of Non-conformity, and was one of the ablest advocates of which the Dissenters could boast. His treatment by them was not of the most generous kind; for, if they had but little to give in the shape of honour or promotion, yet they were a wealthy body; and as he suffered in their cause, he had a right to look to them for some assistance in his troubles, and for more comfort and encouragement than he appears to have received. Oldmixon, who delights in misrepresentation, repeatedly calls him an Independent and a Republican; but he was as far from the one as from the other: in his religion he was a Presbyterian, and in his politics a friend to the British Constitution, as settled at the Revolution. Of his personal piety no one can doubt who has perused his writings. The cast of it was similar to that of the Puritans, but free from moroseness, and chastened by a free conversation with men and things. That he was a man of prayer, and made a conscience of religious duties, are no less evident; and there can be no doubt that he carried into his own family those admirable lessons which he laid down for the instruction of others. From the tenour of his writings it may be easily seen that religion was uppermost in his mind, that he reaped its consolations, and lived under an habitual sense of its practical importance. The earnestness with which he enforces it upon his readers leaves no doubt of his sincerity; whilst his language intimates that it had taken full possession of his heart. Of his benevolence in private life the following instance, communicated by a late respected friend, is one doubtless out of many others, which, if known, would illustrate and exalt his character. Mr Isaac James, in a letter to the author, says, 'I have a manuscript account of one Thomas Webb, of Devizes, who afterwards removed to London. After lamenting the death of his wife, in 1724, he says, "And poor distressed I left alone, and no one to go and speak to, save only Mr Deffoe, who hath acted a noble and generous part towards me and my poor children. The lord reward him and his with the blessings of upper and nether spring, with the blessings of his basket and store, &c."

"We must now," proceeds Mr Wilson, "consider De Foe's pretensions as a writer, and the bare catalogue of his works will be sufficient to show that, like the elder Scipio, 'he was never more employed than when at leisure, nor less solitary than when alone.' That he possessed talents of no ordinary cast is a sentiment now so fully established, as to triumph over every contemporary effort to destroy his fame. Though his abilities, in certain respects, were generally acknowledged, full justice was far from being done to his reputation, either during his life or for a considerable time after his decease. By some persons he has been spoken of with contempt, and others have regarded him as a ready miscellaneous writer; but the world is at last become sensible of his great and various talents. De Foe affords one out of many examples, that literary merit, however oppressed for a time by the influence of party, is sure, at length, to find its proper place in the estimation of mankind. He has now outlived his century, when, as Mr Chambers observes, 'he must be acknowledged as one of the ablest, as he was one of the most captivating writers, of which this island can boast.'

"For the qualities that constitute the basis of his fame De Foe was more indebted to nature than to any acquired endowments. Being shut out from the universities by barbarous statutes, his education was defective, and his learning rather various than profound. He appears, however, to have had a respectable acquaintance with the ancient and modern languages, was well read in history, and had improved himself by an extensive acquaintance with the world. Few men were better versed in the controversies of his time, whether political or ecclesiastical; or possessed more adroitness in the management of an argument. To extraordinary energy of mind he united the most perfect self-possession; being as provoking by his coolness as his pertinacity was galling. He possessed a large share of that dry, caustic wit, which gave a peculiar force to his language, and told more significantly than whole pages of sentiment. Perfect master of his own resources, he adapts himself to the humour of his opponents. When they argue fairly, he reasons with acuteness, vigour, and judgment; but when they lose their temper, he laughs at their weakness, and answers their railings by sarcasm. Unfettered by the opinions of other writers, and unawed by the authority of custom and precedent, he never fails to avow his convictions; justly considering that true wisdom consists in the right adaptation of means to existing circumstances, and that novelty should be no bar to improvement. In canvassing the most important subjects of human inquiry, he had to contend with strong prejudices, fortified by imposing sanctions, and defended with bitterness. To encounter them required skill, knowledge, and perseverance; and these De Foe possessed in an eminent degree. It will be found, upon a candid examination, that his sentiments upon most subjects are distinguished by good sense, and a profound acquaintance with human nature; and that his writings, generally, have for their object the diffusion of knowledge and happiness, and the advancement of the best interests of mankind.

“De Foe paid but little attention to the graces of composition. He wrote too fast to study correctness, and seems to have read more for the purpose of storing his mind with ideas, than to express them tastefully. His style is often negligent, and sometimes coarse and verbose. Yet there are many fine passages in his writings, distinguished alike for vigour of thought, smoothness of language, and even elegance of expression; but his usual characteristics are plainness and simplicity. He writes with ease, and generally expresses himself with force and perspicuity; and whilst he pleases by his familiarity, he is often so impressive as to awaken the deepest attention, and to produce impressions that are never effaced. Many of his works appear to have been composed upon the spur of the moment, and the materials gathered from the inexhaustible stores of a retentive memory. Having read and thought much upon almost every subject, he was never at a loss for ideas; and so accurate was his recollection, that he often quotes at a distance from his books, with all the freshness of a recent impression. But De Foe was a perfectly original writer. He gathered his knowledge from men as well as from books; and the use that he made of it discovers equal penetration and judgment. He was not only a keen observer of passing events, but dives into the recesses of the human heart. Whilst the surface of nature furnished him with pictures for delineation, its study enabled him to develope the secret springs that set it in motion. With a lively imagination, and powers of invention that have been rarely equalled, he brings up new worlds of ideas to the mind, that insensibly rivet the attention, and engage the best affections of the heart. Such was the acuteness of his perceptions, that he readily seizes upon every circumstance that constitutes an item in the great drama of life, and renders it available, by his genius, either for amusement or instruction. Having studied nature in her own school, he acquired a knowledge of her capabilities; whilst he drew upon the resources of his own mind for those lessons of prudence which were suggested by her wants, or dictated by her teachings. In estimating the claims of De Foe to literary merit, it would be unjust to measure him by the standard of a more advanced period. Addison and Swift, to whom he was inferior in the graces of style, and even Johnson himself, with all his vigour and discernment, would be unable to bear such a test. ‘To judge rightly of an author,’ observes the last great writer, ‘we must transport ourselves to his time, and examine what were the wants of his contemporaries, and what were his means of supplying them. That which is easy at one time was difficult at another.’

range of human speculation. Whether it were politics or morals, trade or religion, history or fiction, he seems to be equally at home, and to wield his pen with a power and facility that point him out as no ordinary man. Even the worst of his pieces, in spite of their uninviting style or forbidding subject, display marks of talent and genius that distinguish him from the herd of common-place writers. The number of his works, when we consider his other numerous engagements, evinces extraordinary rapidity of composition. As an illustration of his readiness, we are told, that he wrote two twelve-penny pamphlets in one day ; and those productions had not then attained the ample margin and loose printing of modern times. That he sometimes wrote for present support, may be as true of him as of Steele and others, and entails no discredit in either case ; but it appears that most of his writings were directed to some topic of public interest, in which he evinced greater zeal for the national welfare than for his own private advantage. The charge of his being a mercenary writer, therefore, is as unfounded as it was malicious ; and being circulated for party purposes, can no longer deceive. He had a great dislike to personal altercations, and thought the public ill-used when concerned in such debates. Although few men gave stronger evidence of moderation, yet even this was turned to his disadvantage ; for such was the violence of the times, that no man was safe in his reputation who had not the prevailing appetite for extremes.

“Perhaps few writers obtained distinction in so many walks of literature, and still fewer who deserved it so well. In one department only can he be said to have failed. It will now be scarcely believed that De Foe took his station with the poets of his day ; yet there were many who read and admired his verses. This might be partly owing to the excitement of the times, and the temporary nature of his subjects. The readers of poesy, however, will find little to gratify them in De Foe, beyond propriety of sentiment, keenness of satire, and benevolence of design ; and these, probably, compensated with the vulgar for a want of harmony. ‘Considered as a poet,’ says Cibber, ‘Daniel De Foe is not so eminent as in a political light. He has taken no pains in versification ; his ideas are masculine, his expressions coarse, and his numbers generally rough. He seems rather to have studied to speak truth by probing wounds to the bottom, than, by embellishing his versification, to give a more elegant keenness. This, however, seems to have proceeded more from carelessness in that particular than want of ability. Poetry was far from being the talent of De Foe. He wrote with more perspicuity and strength in prose ; and he seems to have understood as well as any man the civil constitution of the kingdom, which indeed was his chief study.’* With the exception of the ‘True-Born Englishman,’ in which are some tasteful and even elegant lines, his poetry would scarcely rescue his name from oblivion. The peculiar circumstances under which this poem was written, its political allusions, and its caustic satire, rendered it a favourite with the public long after the occasion that produced it, and raised a durable memorial to the author. From his perseverance in composing verses, it may be inferred that he was enamoured with the occupation, and thought better of them than has fallen to the judgment of posterity. That he had a relish for poetry, although his ear was not formed for music, may be conjectured from his criticisms upon the poets of his time, of whom he had but a mean opinion, and his judgment was probably correct. From Dryden to Pope, there was a dearth of English poets. De Foe accounts for it by ‘the drums and trumpets of war, together with the more terrible clamours of the street mobs, and all the et ceteras of parties ; and I am told,’ says he, ‘they can never make any music since.’

“As a political writer, De Foe takes a much higher rank. Possessed of an acute

* Cibber’s ‘Lives of the Poets,’ vol. iv.

“To an accurate acquaintance with the history of mankind generally, and of the British constitution in particular, he united sound opinions upon government; and the rational exercise of his powers enabled him to detect the sophisms invented by cunning or mistaken men, to enslave the world and encircle it with ignorance. In discussing a subject of such high importance, he brings learning and eloquence, reasons profoundly, and batters down the props of his opponents with seriousness or ridicule, as best suited the occasion. To strength and perspicuity of argument, and skill in its arrangement, he unites candour and fairness, and lets his adversary know that he is not to be driven from his point by sophistry on the one hand, or by railing on the other. Relying solely upon argument for a rational conviction, he strips it of its disguises, and recommends liberty to the world as a sacred deposit, worthy of a divine original, and rising superior to the pretences to power. ‘He that won’t fight for it is a fool; he that denies it to others must be a knave.’ The effects of tyranny, as they had passed under his own review, had given him a just abhorrence of a lawless government; he therefore rejoiced in the revolution settlement, and was a passionate admirer of its hero. De Foe’s labours in the cause of liberty have never been sufficiently appreciated. Amongst the political writers who then abounded, no one contributed more largely, nor more effectually, to the overthrow of those absurd tenets which were cherished under the Stuarts, and pertinaciously adhered to by the statesmen and priests of his day. It is to his credit that he employed his great talents in forcing the strongholds of despotism and priestcraft, and in assisting to relieve his countrymen from their oppressive influence. His political tracts abound in useful information, and are replete with solid arguments in defence of civil and religious liberty. He that would write, or even study, with accuracy, the history of that period of fermentation, alarm, and suspicion, in the public mind of England, cannot hope for success in his researches, unless he has patience to go over the fugitive pieces of Daniel De Foe. In many of them he will find more amusement than their subjects might lead him to expect—in all of them he will at least find traces of a genuine and masculine English intellect, and a power of language which he will seek for in vain among the far greater mass of miscellaneous politics, either of that or of any other period of our history.

“De Foe treated largely upon trade, both in his ‘Reviews,’ and in some separate publications; and the manner in which he handled it shows deep and uncommon penetration, knowledge as various as extensive, and a judgment at once discerning and profound. Intimately acquainted with the power and resources of his own country, he was desirous of seeing them rendered still more available by beating out new paths to enterprise and wealth. No man understood better the principles of commerce, its relative bearings, and its practical details; no man argued upon the subject more wisely, or possessed greater skill in detecting the errors and combating the prejudices with which it was surrounded. It is to the credit of De Foe that he argued the principles of free trade, and contended against monopolies, at a time when the current of opinion was set strong the other way. His acquaintance with foreign countries, their produce, their manners, and their government, gave him great advantage in discussing the subject, and shows no less the extent of his reading than his good sense in its application. Notwithstanding later treatises upon the subject of commerce, De Foe’s speculations may still be perused with advantage.

“Of his talent for executing the lighter narrative, De Foe exhibits favourable specimens in the ‘History of the Plague’ and the ‘Memoirs of a Cavalier.’ But his qualifications for a grave historian were fully exemplified in his ‘History of the Union,’ which displays a keen, penetrating, and energetic mind, turned to investigation, and capable of discriminating the niceties of a great political question. It is minute, even to excess ; but this, so far from being a fault, is a guarantee for its fidelity. The reader will find many important remarks interspersed through the work, as well as much historical information, not only as connected with that great transaction, but as relating to other parts of the affairs of Scotland. It has been justly remarked, that 'his history of the intrigues which preceded the completion of this long-desired conjunction of the two crowns, must always be read with the most lively interest.'*

"Whoever will be at the pains to examine his writings, must be satisfied that De Foe is entitled to take a high place amongst our English moralists. Whether he discusses politics or trade, history or manners, he converts it to the noble purpose of informing the judgment, or of ameliorating the heart. Not only his 'Family Instructor' and his 'Religious Courtship,' which have for their specific object the awakening mankind to serious reflection, but his writings generally, abound in prudential maxims, enforcing some sentiment of practical importance. Such was his anxiety for reformation, that he never slips an opportunity of introducing some hint or caution, or of suggesting some remark in the way of admonition or satire, with a view to the correction of vice, and the inculcation of moral principles. Yet he never goes out of his way for the purpose, but ingeniously contrives the moral to form a requisite part of his discourse. All his satires are written for the express purpose of exposing the follies of the age, and of inviting mankind to the regulation of their habits in conformity to the dictates of reason and religion. His prose writings, amidst the frequent ruggedness of their style, are rich in sentiment, and abound in sententious passages, that convey the soundest ideas upon some of the most important subjects of human inquiry. Whilst we respect his talents and revere his genius, it is impossible not to admire that purpose of instruction which is the end of all his performances. Although politics first raised his fame, and fiction has embalmed it with posterity, yet it should not be forgotten that he was one of the ablest moralists of his age. If Johnson surpassed him in purity of diction, he only equals him in energy of thought and propriety of sentiment.

"As a writer of fiction, whether we consider the originality of his genius, the simplicity of his design, or the utility of his moral, De Foe is now universally acknowledged to stand in the foremost ground. That his inventive powers were of the first order, no one can doubt ; nor that he possessed the art above most other men, of infusing into his performances all the genuine pathos of nature, without the least apparent effort or exaggeration. Although he is now most known by the first great effort of his genius, 'Robinson Crusoe,' yet in many of his other works he carries his art to the highest perfection. In these we discover the same unpretending simplicity, a like utility of purpose, and an undeviating likeness to real life. However uninviting his subject, the attention is insensibly chained down by the intense interest it excites, and the reader is inspired with a reluctance to lay down the story until the whole is finished. Much criticism has been employed to decipher the charm that rivets the faculties, and creates so much interest and delight. There have been writers who bring to their aid greater purity of language, and more attractive subjects for their discourse ; but how few of them can be read with the same absorbing attention, and from which of them can be extracted so much nutriment for reflection ? Whilst, in ordinary cases, a single perusal is amply sufficient, and often more than can be conquered without weariness, we return to the pages of De Foe with renewed delight, and read him to the close with an appetite that refuses to be satiated. Whether the charm consist in the artificial structure of his story, in the minuteness and quick transition of incidents, or in that intense persuasion of reality which everywhere exists, or in a combination of these together, the effect is no less certain than it is striking ; and however it may be explained, presents a rare occurrence in the history of literature. As De Foe wrote for the common people, who form the most numerous class of readers, he selected his subjects in accommodation to their habits and ideas ; and his language is the fittest in the world to recommend them to their attention. Let the same stories be told in the classical style of our purest writers, and they would at once lose their impressive attraction ; the charm would be broken, and they would bear about the same comparison with the great original as Patrick's ' Parable of the Pilgrim' by the side of the ' Pilgrim's Progress.' It is the homely, matter-of-fact style of De Foe, wholly free from artificial ornament and unincumbered by any aim at effect, that obtains credit with the reader. He is conscious of no disguise, nor is there any in fact ; for the matters detailed bear all the marks of authenticity, and are related exactly as they would have occurred had they actually taken place. It has been justly observed, by a distinguished living writer, that ' it is the last style which should be attempted by a writer of inferior genius ; for though it be possible to disguise mediocrity by fine writing, it appears in all its native inanity when it assumes the garb of simplicity.'*

"It may call for some surprise that De Foe should have been so little known as a novelist, beyond the range of ' Robinson Crusoe.' To recal the attention of the public to his other fictions, the present writer is happy to enrich his work with some original remarks upon his secondary novels by his early friend Charles Lamb, whose competency to form an accurate judgment upon the subject, no one will doubt who is acquainted with his genius.

"It has happened not seldom that one work of some author has so transcendently surpassed in execution the rest of his compositions, that the world has agreed to pass a sentence of dismissal upon the latter, and to consign them to total neglect and oblivion. It has done wisely in this, not to suffer the contemplation of excellencies of a lower standard to abate, or stand in the way of, the pleasure it has agreed to receive from the master-piece.

"Again it has happened, that from no inferior merit of execution in the rest, but from superior good fortune in the choice of its subject, some single work shall have been suffered to eclipse and cast into shade the deserts of its less fortunate brethren. This has been done with more or less injustice in the case of the popular allegory of Bunyan, in which the beautiful and scriptural image of a pilgrim or wayfarer (we are all such upon earth), addressing itself intelligibly and feelingly to the bosoms of all, has silenced, and made almost to be forgotten, the more awful and scarcely less tender beauties of the ' Holy War made by Shaddai upon Diabolus,' of the same author ; a romance less happy in its subject, but surely well worthy of a secondary immortality. But in no instance has this excluding partiality been exerted with more unfairness than against what may be termed the secondary novels or romances of De Foe.

"While all ages and descriptions of people hang delighted over the ' Adventures of Robinson Crusoe,' and shall continue to do so, we trust, while the world lasts, how few comparatively will bear to be told, that there exist other fictitious narratives by the same writer—four of them at least of no inferior interest, except what results from a less felicitous choice of situation. ' Roxana,' ' Singleton,' ' Moll Flanders,' ' Colonel Jack,' are all genuine offspring of the same father. They bear the veritable impress of De Foe. An unpractised midwife that would not swear to the nose, lip, forehead, and eye of every one of them ! They are in their way as full of incident, and some of them every bit as romantic ; only they want the uninhabited island, and the charm that has bewitched the world, of the striking solitary situation.

* Sir W. Scott's ' Miscellaneous Works,' iv. 302.

“ ‘ But are there no solitudes out of the cave and the desert ? or cannot the heart in the midst of crowds feel frightfully alone ? Singleton, on the world of waters, prowling about with pirates less merciful than the creatures of any howling wilderness ; is he not alone, with the faces of men about him, but without a guide that can conduct him through the mists of educational and habitual ignorance, or a fellow-heart that can interpret to him the new-born yearnings and aspirations of unpractised penitence ? Or when the boy Colonel Jack, in the loneliness of the heart (the worst solitude), goes to hide his ill-purchased treasure in the hollow tree by night, and miraculously loses, and miraculously finds it again—whom hath he there to sympathise with him ? or of what sort are his associates ?

“ ‘ The narrative manner of De Foe has a naturalness about it, beyond that of any other novel or romance writer. His fictions have all the air of true stories. It is impossible to believe, while you are reading them, that a real person is not narrating to you everywhere nothing but what really happened to himself. To this the extreme homeliness of their style mainly contributes. We use the word in its best and heartiest sense—that which comes home to the reader. The narrators everywhere are chosen from low life, or have had their origin in it ; therefore they tell their own tales, (Mr Coleridge has anticipated us in this remark,) as persons in their degree are observed to do, with infinite repetition, and an overacted exactness, lest the hearer should not have minded, or have forgotten, some things that had been told before. Hence the emphatic sentences marked in the good old (but deserted) Italic type ; and hence, too, the frequent interposition of the reminding old colloquial parenthesis, “ I say ” — “ mind ” — and the like, when the story-teller repeats what, to a practised reader, might appear to have been sufficiently insisted upon before : which made an ingenious critic observe, that his works, in this kind, were excellent reading for the kitchen. And, in truth, the heroes and heroines of De Foe can never again hope to be popular with a much higher class of readers than that of the servant-maid or the sailor. ‘ Crusoe ’ keeps its rank only by tough prescription ; ‘ Singleton,’ the pirate—‘ Colonel Jack,’ the thief—‘ Moll Flanders,’ both thief and harlot—‘ Roxana,’ harlot and something worse—would be startling ingredients in the bill of fare of modern literary delicacies. But, then, what pirates, what thieves, and what harlots is the thief, the harlot, and the pirate of De Foe ? We would not hesitate to say, that in no other book of fiction, where the lives of such characters are described, is guilt and delinquency made less seductive, or the suffering made more closely to follow the commission, or the penitence more earnest or more bleeding, or the intervening flashes of religious visitation, upon the rude and uninstructed soul, more meltingly and fearfully painted. They, in this, come near to the tenderness of Bunyan ; while the livelier pictures and incidents in them, as in Hogarth or in Fielding, tend to diminish that fastidiousness to the concerns and pursuits of common life, which an unrestrained passion for the ideal and the sentimental is in danger of producing.’

“ It has been intimated, that Richardson, who must have been a diligent reader of De Foe, may have taken him for his model. There is the more reason to suppose this, says Dr Towers, ‘ because it may be observed, that the dramatic form into which De Foe has thrown many parts of his works of imagination, has been evidently imitated by Richardson in his ‘ Pamela,’ ‘ Clarissa,’ and ‘ Sir Charles Grandison.’ Dr Kippis, taking up the same idea, observes, ‘ Richardson seems to have learned from him that mode of delineating character and carrying on dialogues, and that minute discrimination of the circumstances of events, in which De Foe so eminently excelled. If, in certain respects, the disciple rose above his master, as he undoubtedly did, in others he was inferior to him ; for his conversations are sometimes more tedious and diffuse ; and his works, though beautiful in their kind, are not by any means so various. Both of these writers had a wonderful ability in drawing pictures of human nature and human life. A careful perusal of the 'Family Instructor' and the 'Religious Courtship,' would particularly tend to show the resemblance between De Foe and Richardson.' But whatever likeness may be traced between the two writers, the diffuseness of Richardson will ever keep him in the back ground; whilst the very homeliness of De Foe's language, so perfectly adapted to his incidents as they respect persons, time, and place, imparts to them a witchery, which, in spite of all his defects, gives him an unrivalled claim to superiority. Dr Towers further observes, that 'If Richardson is to be traced to De Foe, we have sometimes thought that the latter was, with regard to simplicity of style, somewhat indebted to Bunyan, an author whom he must have read in his youth, and whose religious principles are obvious in the second volume of 'Robinson Crusoe.' In justification of this remark, it may be added, that examples of the likeness may be adduced from 'Moll Flanders,' as compared with Bunyan's 'Grace abounding to the chief of Sinners,' and it may be also traced in some of the other writings of De Foe.

"If the foregoing estimate of De Foe's talents has not been overstated," concludes Mr Wilson, "he will deserve to be considered as one of the most ingenious and enterprising writers of his age. But, if we regard the utility of his performances, he is entitled to still higher praise. He who aims to rescue mankind from the thralldom of oppression, who lays open the sources, and enforces the true principles of knowledge, virtue, and happiness, has no mean pretensions to our regard; and if the successful display of his talents be a just foundation for fame, but few will be disposed to withhold it from our author. His works have passed through more numerous editions than has fallen to the lot of most writers; no mean test, surely, of their merit. For, as Mr Chalmers observes, 'He whose works have pleased generally and pleased long, must be deemed a writer of no small estimation; the people's verdict being the proper test of what they are the proper judges.' Amidst the taste for collecting uniform editions of popular English writers, it is surprising that De Foe has not received such a distinction, and it confers some reproach upon the British press. In spite of the obloquy cast upon him by his contemporaries, the time is now arrived when he must be acknowledged as one of the most useful, because one of the most instructive, writers of his day. If he paid the tax of censure for his celebrity, it was in a cause that will be approved by the wise and the virtuous."

Mr Chalmers's criticism upon the genius and writings of De Foe is as follows:—"The time is come when De Foe must be acknowledged as one of the ablest, as he is one of the most captivating writers of which this island can boast. Before he can be admitted to this pre-eminence, he must be considered distinctly as a poet, as a novelist, as a polemic, as a commercial writer, and as a grave historian.

"As a poet, we must look to the end of his effusions rather than to his execution, ere we can allow him considerable praise. To mollify national animosities, or to vindicate national rights, are certainly noble objects, which merit the vigour and imagination of Milton, or the flow and precision of Pope; but our author's energy runs into harshness, and his sweetness is to be tasted in his prose more than in his poesy. If we regard the adventures of Crusoe, like the adventures of Telemachus, as a poem, his moral, his incidents, and his language, must lift him high on the poet's scale. His professed poems, whether we contemplate the propriety of sentiment or the suavity of their numbers, may indeed, without much loss of pleasure or instruction, be resigned to those who, in imitation of Pope, poach in the fields of obsolete poetry for brilliant thoughts, felicities of phrase, or for happy rhymes.

"As a novelist, every one will place him in the foremost rank, who considers his originality, his performance, and his purpose. 'The Ship of Fools' had indeed been launched in early times; but who, like De Foe, had ever carried his reader to sea, in order to mend the heart and regulate the practice of life, by showing his readers the effects of adversity, or how they might equally be called to sustain his hero's trials, as they sailed round the world? But, without attractions, neither the originality nor the end can have any salutary consequence. This he had foreseen; and for this he has provided by giving his adventures in a style so pleasing, because it is simple, and so interesting, because it is particular, that every one fancies he could write a similar language. It was, then, idle in Boyer formerly, or in Smollett lately, to speak of De Foe as a party writer in little estimation. The writings of no author since have run through more numerous editions, and he whose works have pleased generally and pleased long, must be deemed a writer of no small estimation; the people's verdict being the proper test of what they are the proper judges.

“As a polemic, I fear we must regard our author with less kindness, though it must be recollected that he lived during a contentious period, when two parties distracted the nation, and writers indulged in great asperities. But, in opposition to reproach, let it be ever remembered, that he defended freedom without anarchy; that he supported toleration without libertinism; that he pleaded for moderation even amidst violence. With acuteness of intellect, with keenness of wit, with archness of diction, and pertinacity of design, it must be allowed that nature had qualified, in a high degree, De Foe for a disputant. His polemical treatises, whatever might have been their attractions once, may now be delivered without reserve to those who delight in polemical reading. De Foe, it must be allowed, was a party writer; but were not Swift and Prior, Steele and Addison, Halifax and Bolingbroke, party writers? De Foe being a party writer upon settled principles, did not change with the change of parties; Addison and Steele, Prior and Swift, connected as they were with persons, changed their note as persons were elevated or depressed.

“As a commercial writer, De Foe is fairly entitled to stand in the foremost rank among his contemporaries, whatever may be their performances or their fame. Little would be his praise to say of him, that he wrote on commercial legislation like Addison, who, when he touches on trade, sinks into imbecility, without knowledge of fact, or power of argument.* The distinguishing characteristics of De Foe as a commercial disquisitor are originality and depth. He has many sentiments with regard to traffic, which are scattered through his Reviews, and which I never read in any other book. His ‘Giving Alms no Charity’ is a capital performance, with the exception of one or two thoughts about the abridgment of labour by machinery, which are either half formed or half expressed. Were we to compare De Foe with D’Avenant, it would be found that D’Avenant has more detail from official documents; that De Foe has more fact from wider inquiry. D’Avenant is more apt to consider laws in their particular application; De Foe more frequently investigates commercial legislation in its general effects. From the publications of D’Avenant it is sufficiently clear, that he was not very regardful of means, or very attentive to consequences; De Foe is more correct in his motives, and more salutary in his ends. But, as a commercial prophet, De Foe must yield the palm to Child, who, foreseeing from experience that men’s conduct must finally be directed by their principles, foretold the colonial revolt. De Foe, allowing his prejudices to obscure his sagacity, reprobated that suggestion, because he deemed interest a more strenuous prompter than enthusiasm. Were we, however, to form an opinion, not from special passages, but from whole performances, we must incline to De Foe, when compared with the ablest contemporary: we must allow him the preference, on recollection, that when he writes on commerce he seldom fails to insinuate some axiom of morals, or to inculcate some precept of religion.

* “See the ‘Present State of the War, and the Necessity of an Augmentation;’ and see his Commercial Papers in the ‘Freeholder.’

“As an historian, it will be found that our author had few equals in the English language when he wrote. His ‘Memoirs of a Cavalier’ show how well he could execute the lighter narratives. His ‘History of the Union’ evinces that he was equal to the higher department of historic composition. This is an account of a single event, difficult indeed in its execution, but beneficial certainly in its consequences. With extraordinary skill and information our author relates, not only the event, but the transactions which preceded, and the effects which followed. He is at once learned and intelligent. Considering the factiousness of the age, his candour is admirable. His moderation is exemplary. And if he spoke of James I as a tyrant, he only exercised the prerogative which our historians formerly enjoyed, of casting obloquy on an unfortunate race, in order to supply deficiency of knowledge, of elegance, and of style. In this instance De Foe allowed his prejudice to overpower his philosophy. If the language of his narrative want the dignity of the great historians of the current times, it has greater facility; if it is not always grammatical, it is generally precise; and if it be thought defective in strength, it must be allowed to excel in sweetness. Such are the pretensions of De Foe to be acknowledged as one of the ablest and most useful writers of our island.”*

Mr Hazlitt, in the ‘Edinburgh Review,’ remarks:—“De Foe was too fond of the right to pursue the expedient; and had much too dry, hard, and concentrated an understanding of the truth, to allow of any compromise with it from courtesy to the feelings or opinions of others. This kept him in perpetual hot water. It was a virtue, but carried to a repeated excess. It set the majority against him, and turned his dearest friends into his bitterest foes. If you make no concessions to the world, you must expect no favours from it. Our author’s blindness and simplicity on this head amount to the dramatic. He went on censuring and contradicting all sects and parties, setting them to rights, recommending peace to them, praying each to give up its darling prejudice and absurdity; and then he wonders that ‘a man of peace and reason,’ like himself, should be the butt of universal contumely and hatred. If an individual differs from you in common with others, you do not so much mind it—it is the act of a body, and implies no particular assumption of superior wisdom or virtue; but if he not only differs from you, but from his own side too, you then can endure the scandal no longer, but join to hunt him down as a prodigy of unheard of insolence and presumption, and to get rid of him and his boasted honesty and independence together. While, therefore, the author of ‘The True-Born Englishman,’ ‘The Shortest Way with the Dissenters,’ and ‘The Legion Petition,’ thought he was deserving well of God and his country, he was heaping coals of fire on his own head. Nothing produces such antipathy in others as a total seeming want of sympathy with them. De Foe was urged on by a straightforwardness and sturdiness of feeling, which did not permit him to give up a single iota of his convictions; but it was ‘stuff o’ the conscience’ with him; there was nothing of spleen, malevolence, or the spirit of contradiction in his nature. Still we consider him rather as an acute, zealous, and well-informed partisan, than as a general and dispassionate reasoner. He was a distinguished polemic, rather than a philosopher. Though he exercised his understanding powerfully and variously, yet it was always under the guidance of a certain banner—in support of a foregone conclusion. He was too much in the heat of the battle—too constantly occupied in attacking or defending one side or the other, to consider fairly whether both might not be in the wrong. He asked himself (as he was obliged to do in his own vindication), ‘Why am I in the right?’ and gave admirable reasons for it, supposing it to be so ; but he never thought of asking himself the farther question, 'Am I in the right or no?' This would have been entering on a new and unexplored tract, and might have led to no very welcome results. As an example of what we mean : De Foe, though a most strenuous and persevering advocate for the rights of conscience and toleration to those Dissenters who, in his view, agreed with the church in the essentials of Christianity, was, notwithstanding, far from being disposed to extend the same indulgence to Socinians, Anabaptists, or other heretical persons. Of course he would conceive that he, and those with whom he acted in concert, were not criminal in excluding others from the privilege in question ; but he did not enlarge his views beyond this point, so as to change places with those who entirely differed with him ; and in this respect fell short of the philosophical and liberal opinions of Locke, and even Toland, who placed toleration on the broad ground of a general principle, whatever exceptions might arise from particular circumstances, and urgent political expediency. We should, therefore, hardly be warranted in admitting De Foe into the class of perfectly free and unshackled speculative thinkers ; though we certainly may rank him among the foremost of polemical writers for vigour and ability of execution."

The opinion of an able writer in the 'Retrospective Review' upon the merits of De Foe, are thus expressed in a review of the 'Memoirs of a Cavalier :—“ We avail ourselves with some satisfaction of an opportunity of introducing to our readers an old and valued acquaintance, as one whom they may have had the misfortune to lose sight of, amidst the perplexities of life, and the competition of more obtrusive candidates for their notice. For our own part, surrounded as we are by the bustle and cares of middle age, the mere mention of our author's name falls upon us, as cool and refreshing as a drop of rain in the hot and parched midday ; for it never fails to bring along with it the recollection of the morning of our life—those green and pleasant years, when the solitary inhabitant of the desert-island was perpetually mingling with the day-dreams of our imagination. * * *

“ After a vain attempt to apply to De Foe those laws of criticism which hold in ordinary cases, we are compelled to regard him as a phenomenon, and to consider his genius as something rare and curious, which it is impossible to assign to any class whatever. Throughout the ample stores of fiction, in which our literature abounds more than that of any other people, there are no works which at all resemble his, either in the design or execution. Without any precursor in the strange and unwonted path he chose, and without a follower, he spun his web of coarse, but original materials, which no mortal had ever thought of using before ; and when he had done it seems as though he had snapped the thread, and conveyed it beyond the reach of imitation. To have a numerous train of followers is usually considered as adding to the reputation of a writer ; we deem it a circumstance of peculiar honour to De Foe that he had none ; for, in general, they are the faults of a great author, the parts where he exaggerates truth or deviates from propriety, that become the prey of the imitator. Wherever he has stolen a 'grace beyond the reach of art,' wherever the vigour and freshness of nature are apparent, there he is inaccessible to imitation. The fugitive charms which are thus imparted, the volatile and subtle spirit which gives life and animation to the work, baffle and elude the grasp of mere imitative genius. In the fictions of De Foe we meet with nothing that is artificial, or that does not breathe the breath of life. The ingenuity which could counterfeit works of a more elaborate kind, and much more highly as well as curiously wrought, could make nothing of a simplicity so naked, and a manner so perfectly natural. The most consummate art was unable to follow where no vestiges of art were to be seen, for either none has been employed, or its traces are concealed as carefully as the Indian hides his footsteps from the observation of his pursuers ; since, to the critical eye, nothing is visible but the easy unconstraint of nature, and the fearlessness of truth. Besides, it must be allowed that the temptation to imitate was as small as the difficulties were many and great ; for whilst he transcribed from the volume of life with a fidelity and closeness that have never been equalled, with a singularly mortified taste, he chose the plainest and least inviting pages of the whole book. Those who would imitate De Foe must copy from nature herself ; and, instead of dressing her out to advantage, content themselves with delineating some of her simplest and homeliest features.

“In the distribution of talents among men of genius, two or three are generally found united in the same mind, whilst not one of them is possessed in perfection. But Nature, when she made De Foe, seems to have forsaken her usual practice, and, in a playful mood, to have sent him into the world with one mighty talent for his portion, but destitute of almost every other. Amidst an entire ignorance of the more elevated passions and feelings of mankind, a surprising poverty of imagination, and a total dearth of humour and wit, of fancy and eloquence, our admiration, or rather our wonder, is still taxed to the utmost by a display of invention the most unbounded, and a faculty of imitation the most consummate. His fictions are not so much the counterfeit of something existing, as they are themselves the very originals ; the creations of his brain do not wear the semblance only of truth, but are absolutely quickened with its vitality ; his phantoms, if such we may call them, steal not forth at eventide, apparent only when the actual world is obscured ; they walk abroad in the open day, and are not to be distinguished from the substantial forms and realities of life. No unlucky mischance or awkward gesture betrays the hand that directs their motions ; the real author never for an instant obtrudes himself into the presence of his reader, the imaginary hero is the only person who appears upon the stage, and of his existence we are as well convinced as we are of our own. With a confiding security in the genuineness of his memoirs, we follow him over land and sea, engage with him in adventures, sometimes marvellous, always strange—accompany him in travels where human foot had never penetrated—sail with him in latitudes where ship had never been, along coasts that were never laid down in a chart ; and all the time have not the least suspicion that our companion is a mere shade, and that the author who has thus led us in imagination round the world never stirred from the desk at which he wrote. Our fellow traveller is sometimes a soldier, but more frequently a sailor, who is merchant or pirate as opportunity dictates, and always a rogue ; but this is respectable society. We are sometimes introduced into company of which an honest man may well be ashamed, and then we take a trip to the plantations, or skulk in holes and corners to avoid the pursuit of justice. But whether soldier or sailor, merchant or pirate, thief, or what not, we, at least, never suspect him of being an impostor, but give him ample credit for having perpetrated all the rogueries which he so deliberately recounts. All that he does, or says, or thinks, is in the line of his vocation, whatever that may happen to be. His language is always that of the plain and unlettered person he professes himself ; homely in phraseology,—in expression rude and inartificial ; yet like that of one who has received a distinct impression of objects which he has seen, it is often forcible, happy, and strongly descriptive. Generally speaking, in other fictitious narratives, a tendency to moralize out of reason, or in a vein too elevated for the character assumed, or a continued effort to be uniformly wise or elaborately witty, is almost sure to unmask the impostor, and expose the dreaming pedant at his desk ; or if these characteristic marks be wanting, either the narrative is inconsistent with itself, or it contradicts some known and established fact, or there is some anachronism, or some other overt act against truth is committed, which critical sagacity seldom fails to detect and punish. But our author is never caught tripping in this way ; he moralizes, to be sure, as much or more than most writers, but then his reflections are always in the right vein : he never steps from behind the curtain to figure away himself upon the stage. Either a vigilance that was perpetually on the watch preserved him from error, or he went right by mere instinct ; or he so identified himself with his imaginary hero that he became, in fancy, the very individual he was creating, and was therefore necessarily always in character. But, whatever vigilance he used, he has always the art to appear perfectly unconcerned ; there is none of the constraint that usually accompanies a painful effort to support imposture ; his hero is not stiff and awkward like a puppet, which has no voluntary motion, but moves freely and carelessly along the stage ; talks to us in an honest, open, confidential sort of way ; lays his inmost thoughts and feelings open before us, as before a confessor, without caution or subterfuge ; and by never asking our belief, never seeming conscious of a possibility of its being denied, fairly compels us to grant it.

“ A circumstance peculiar to the fictions of De Foe, and which greatly tends to give them an air of reality, is, that their subjects are not such as are usually adopted by the writers of romance. They think it beneath them to have aught to do with anything but great names and high rank ; or if ever they make a stoop from their greatness, it is to descend at once into the very lowest class of men, whose rudeness has something in it of the picturesque. Between the palace and the hovel there is seldom an intermediate stage for the genius of romance to put up at, and consequently we never expect to meet with the pains-taking people who inhabit houses of brick, dealers in small wares, shopkeepers, and masters of trading vessels, straying through the realms of fiction. Now this is precisely the sort of company into which De Foe introduces us, and their adventures have more the air of matters of fact, in consequence of their names and professions sounding so unromantic and common-place. There is another peculiarity in his fictions, which is still more remarkable. Our author's indifference to the fair sex is well known, as also that he has fallen under their ban for having presumed to show that any story could be made interesting with which they had no concern. Instead, therefore, of the stale and hackneyed subject, a couple of lovers led through every difficulty and danger which the author could possibly contrive to throw in their way, to be at length crowned with felicity and marriage, he shows us a man struggling for the acquisition of wealth, and getting rich at all events, by fair means or foul. Of love, at least the sentimental part of it, he clearly has no notion ; and marriage, if it happens to be mentioned at all, is quite by the way, purely incidental to the main action, and never allowed to interrupt the grand business of life. When the hero has made his fortune, the author lays down his pen : the interest of the story is at an end.

“ De Foe himself, during the greater part of his troubled life, laboured under pecuniary difficulties, and, in the end, is said to have died insolvent. It would seem, therefore, that he was resolved to feast his imagination with what he could not enjoy in reality ; and as he felt the miseries of poverty in his own person, and was probably always speculating for the acquisition of wealth, he was naturally led to consider it the most interesting pursuit in which his hero could possibly be engaged. Whatever truth there may be in this, the propensity to accumulate ideal riches is everywhere clearly evinced. If his imagination ever grows wanton, it is in some dream of ideal wealth ; if it ever warms, it is in the recital of some brisk trade which his hero is driving at a profit of a hundred per cent. With what complacency will he enumerate the several articles of a rich booty, no matter how obtained. How he revels in the idea of a stream that rolls down sands of gold, or an El-Dorado, where it is to be had for picking up, or an oyster-bed, where every oyster contains a pearl of immense price ! He is never contented with small gains, or fond of imagining unsuccessful speculations, but delights in a lucky adventure, and enriching his hero with the proceeds ; to abandon him, indeed, in poverty, seems to him as contrary to all rule as any other novelist would consider it to leave his principal personage unmarried. But this is a disposition altogether unheroic, and savours so little of romance, the employment and pursuits of his fictitious heroes constitute so completely the business of the class of people from whom they are taken, and the arts and practices they have recourse to are so much in the way of the world, that we never suspect these matter-of-fact personages of being the unsubstantial creatures of mere invention.

“The grand secret of his art, however, if art it can be called, and were not rather an instinct, consists doubtless of the astonishing minuteness of the details, and the circumstantial particularity with which everything is laid before us. It is by this, perhaps, more than anything else, that fictitious narratives are distinguishable from the genuine memoirs of those who have been eye-witnesses of what they relate. The facts in the one case may be as probable as in the other, the descriptions as vivid and striking, the style as natural and unconstrained; still there is an indefinable something which seems to be wanting to the former, though we may not have remarked its presence in the latter. Some unimportant particular, some minute circumstance, which none but he who had seen it with his own eyes would have thought of remarking, will always serve, like the scarcely discernible lines on a genuine note, to distinguish between the true and the counterfeit. The eye of imagination, however strong and piercing, cannot always pervade the whole scene, and see everything distinctly; the more prominent features, indeed, it may develop with the clearness and accuracy of an almost unclouded vision, but all besides is either obscured with mist, or lost in impenetrable shade; and he who paints from the ideal must consequently either leave these parts unfinished, or spread his colours at random. It is the singular merit of De Foe to have overcome this difficulty, and to have communicated to his fictitious narratives every characteristic mark by which we distinguish between real and pretended adventures. The whole scene lay expanded before him in the fulness of light and life, and, down to the minutest particular, everything is delineated with truth and accuracy. It is not necessary that we should have the light fall advantageously, or wink with our eyes, in order to make the delusion complete, by hiding the defects and softening down the harsh lines of the representation; the most penetrating gaze, aided by the strongest light, cannot detect the imposition, or distinguish between the shade and the substance. Writers of fiction may, in general, be said rather to shadow forth than fully to delineate their visions, either because they flit away too early, or are never seen with sufficient distinctness; like the first discoverers of countries, they trace out a few promontories on their chart, and give a faint outline of something indistinctly seen. In the solitude of his closet, De Foe could travel round the world in idea, seeing everything with the distinctness of natural vision, and noting everything with the minuteness of the most accurate observer. His chart presents us not merely with the bold headland, shooting forth into the deep, or the clearly defined mountain that rises into middle air behind; we have the whole coast fully and fairly traced out, with the soundings of every bay, the direction of every current, and the quarter of every wind that blows.

“The possession of this marvellous faculty has enabled him to communicate such an air of truth and reality to his fictions, that we are inclined to doubt whether human life was ever before, or has ever since been, so faithfully represented, and to suspect that every other author has, more or less, exaggerated or distorted, exalted or debased, the nature from which he drew. It may appear to savour somewhat of paradox, but we will venture to affirm that De Foe was not more indebted for this superiority to the possession of the single faculty we have mentioned, than to the want of those other powers by which more highly-gifted authors have been distinguished. These latter have enabled their possessors to excite every emotion in their readers which the human breast is capable of feeling, but at the same time they have unfitted them to be the humble copyists of nature, and the faithful historians of human life. We mean not to deny that nature formed the ground-work of their fictions, and supplied the elements of their characters, but it was nature wrought up to a higher pitch, and raised far above the level of common life. In their plots, for instance, instead of the ordinary number of events which would naturally arise in the course of any series of years, we find an assemblage of strange and diverting incidents, such as never occur in the experience of one man, or of any given number of men. The imaginary persons who occupy the several scenes of this drama are not only of much larger proportions than ordinary people, but form a collection of curious and eccentric characters, such as were never crowded together in any single stage of real life. Their wit, instead of flowing in the scanty stream in which it really pervades the intercourse of fashionable life, is poured along in a mighty tide, of which the most brilliant society furnishes no example; their dialogue is not the conversation of gentlemen, but the combat of intellectual gladiators. Their humour is a concentration of all the humour of all mankind, and runs through their works in a vein so rich as at every page to excite the laugh that will not be controlled, whereas the dull and serious drama of the world seldom furnishes just occasion for even a smile. The passions, as they are portrayed by these writers, have an energy and terror more than mortal; and grief, in particular,—an uninviting thing enough in the world of real woe,—is clothed with such an air of elegance and refinement, that it becomes a luxury in spite of fact, and is called the joy of grief, the favourite paradox of sickly poets. Then their descriptions of the visible world have a splendour and an illusion inconsistent with the sobriety of reality, and, instead of reminding the reader of earthly scenes, fill his imagination with the wonders of paradise, and the fabled glories of Elysium. Then would they present us, not with a chapter or two of human life, but an epitome of the whole, in which every detail is abridged, and none but the most surprising events fully developed. All that the writer's experience can furnish of the curious and diverting, whether facts or characters, gathered from every scene of life, and from among every class of men, is crowded into the narrative of a few years, and concentrated on a single stage. This quick succession of incidents, in themselves strange and various, together with the strong contrast produced by the opposition of character, eccentric or exaggerated, produces an effect delightful to the imagination, but no more resembling the tenour of real life than a landscape, in which the productions of all climates and seasons should be grouped together, would be like a scene of the true picturesque. To delight and astonish are perhaps the legitimate ends of fiction, and it may be necessary to heighten every colour, and strengthen every shade, in order to produce this effect. We will go still further, and allow that even, for the purposes of instruction, it may be expedient to exaggerate and embellish, in like manner as extreme cases are put to demonstrate truths, which escape our observation in the course of actual experience. But whilst the reader, especially the youthful one, is delighted and astonished, perhaps instructed; yet since the characters with whom he converses in the world of fiction are so humorous and eccentric, their wit so brilliant and redundant, the turns of fortune so strange and unexpected, he is led either to form a very erroneous estimate of real life, or, if his limited experience enable him to correct his judgment, is inspired with a premature and morbid distaste for its comparative languor and insipidity.

“We shall perhaps illustrate our meaning by an actual comparison, in one or two instances, between De Foe and the writers to whom we have alluded. Both he and Smollett have given us successful representations of a sailor's life, but in a very different style, and with very different effect. De Foe's sailor is of the ordinary description of men, one out of a thousand, with nothing very striking or characteristic about him; the sailor in Smollett is altogether an extraordinary being, whose every action is uncouth, and every expression ludicrous. The one has the usual marks of a sailor, but has everything else in common with the rest of mankind ; the other seems to belong to a different species, a creature formed and bred at sea, having a set of ideas, and modes of speaking and acting, perfectly distinct from those possessed by the men who live on shore. The one has merely the technical phrases and vices, the homeliness and simplicity, peculiar to his profession ; the other is not so much an individual character as an abstract of the humour of the whole British navy. The one is an every-day kind of person, whom we have seen an hundred times ; the other is a most amusing but imaginary being, whom we have never met with, but in the inimitable pages of his creator. In like manner, 'Colonel Jack' is a common thief ; one of the multitudes that infest the streets of the metropolis, and every session sees him hung at Tyburn. But 'Jonathan Wild' is a compound of elaborate villany, whom nature never made ; the materials, indeed, she furnished, but the workmanship is Fielding's, and his alone. An acquaintance with one or two of the tribe, a slight study of the 'Newgate Calendar,' or an occasional visit to the office in Bow street, would suffice to enable the inventive genius of De Foe to delineate the features of an ordinary pickpocket ; but the rogue of Fielding is the production of one who had made villany his study, and contemplated it in every possible variety. He is the quintessence of knavery, and the traits which went to the composition of his character were gathered from all the numberless villains that had appeared at the bar of the Westminster Justice. He cannot fail, therefore, of being the most striking figure of the two when he is so much larger than life. But the other is the real thief who picks our pockets, and then dives down an obscure alley to elude pursuit. Our acquaintance, Captain Dalgetty (we beg his pardon for introducing him in such company), is, we will venture to affirm, an infinitely more amusing personage than any cavalier who ever served in Flanders or elsewhere, but it is precisely because he is more amusing that we lose our confidence in his reality. The Ritt-Master is not sufficiently dull and common-place to rank among the genuine productions of nature, and will scarcely, we fear, be cited as historical authority by the grave and the learned of after ages, as is understood to have been the case with the far less striking but more rational cavalier of De Foe. Not to enumerate unnecessary examples, it appears to us that their authors have drawn their characters as the ancient painter did his portrait of Helen—they have not confined themselves to the imitation of any one particular figure, with the ambition of producing merely a living resemblance, but, from materials which their large acquaintance with the various and most striking forms of nature supplied, have created beings of their own much more remarkable than any that move upon earth, and these they have endowed as richly, and exalted as high above the level of common life, as wit, and humour, and imagination enabled them. But in their splendid creations we discern too clearly a style different from that of true nature, to be deluded into a persuasion that these are her productions ; and if we ever work ourselves up to a weak belief of what we read, it is only when reason suffers herself to be hoodwinked, that we may better enjoy the pleasures of the fiction. In this respect De Foe may be said to have been strong in his very weakness, and to have triumphed by the absence of the qualities which constitute the might of those with whom we have compared him. If he has none of the distinguished merits of these authors, neither can he be charged with the errors which grew out of them ; if he enjoyed not the qualities which are requisite to transport and astonish mankind, he was the better fitted to triumph over their discernment, and deceive them more effectually ; for, whilst the possession of one extraordinary power enabled him to delude them into a belief that his fictions were realities, he was not tempted to injure the exactness of the imitation by an effort to improve upon the original. His imagination, if such it can be called, which contemplated nothing but realities or matters of fact, though its visions were wonderfully distinct and accurate, never risks breaking the delusion by taking flight, and soaring beyond the atmosphere of breathing men.

Either the judgment reined it in with so strong a hand, as to compel it to go soberly on foot, or nature had not provided it wings wherewith to fly. He had no treacherous fancy to mislead him by spreading false colours and gay illusions on the objects he was about to represent, and cheat him into a belief that he was drawing from the actual, when he was disclosing only some vision of an ideal world. His was not a melancholy soul, which looked on the dark side of things, nor a merry one, that sought and found occasion for a laugh in every event of life; it was neither gloomy nor gay, but had a sort of cheerful sedateness which prevented him from being too sombre or too brilliant for truth. In short, he beheld nothing but what was, and saw everything just as it was. He could not be more bountiful to the creatures of his invention than nature had been to him, and not being eminently gifted with wit and humour himself, he was safe from the temptation of making his imaginary persons more witty and humorous than would have been consistent with the simplicity and homeliness of their characters. So far was he from colouring his scenes too highly, or flattering his subjects by the force of imagination, that he seems, if anything, to be less careful to heighten her realities than expose her deformities. Neither was he anxious to select such scenes for the purpose of representation as combined the greatest number of picturesque and striking forms, but contented himself with the most ordinary portion of the common field of men and manners. It is to be wished, indeed, that he had been more scrupulous or more ambitious in his choice of subjects, for most commonly his inimitable skill is lavished on objects which hardly seem worth the trouble of representation. But he was a painter after the Flemish fashion, took every line and feature with laborious accuracy, and if he did but produce a staring likeness, seems to have cared very little what the thing represented was. Yet, in one or two instances, the subject is worthy of the artist, and in that, in particular, by which De Foe is popularly known, the design is as well chosen as the conduct of the story is admirable. It was indeed a happy moment in which the idea of that most perfect and delightful of all fictions was conceived; and if the perusal of any work deserves to be accounted an epoch in a man's life, we know of none that is better entitled, from the interest it creates, and the irresistible hold it takes on the imagination, to be considered in the light of one. After the lapse of many years, its scenes and incidents remain imprinted on the mind in colours ever fresh and enduring, like some long-remembered scene of youth; no time can obliterate, and no fresher images banish it from our recollection. That island, placed "far amidst the melancholy main," and remote from the track of human wanderings, remains to the last the greenest spot in memory. At whatever distance of time, the scene expands before us as clearly and distinctly as when we first beheld it: we still see its green savannahs and silent woods, which mortal footstep had never disturbed; its birds of strange wing, that had never heard the report of a gun; its goats browsing securely in the vale, or peeping over the heights, in alarm at the first sight of man. We can yet follow its forlorn inhabitant on tiptoe with suspended breath, prying curiously into every recess, glancing fearfully at every shade, starting at every sound, and then look forth with him upon the lone and boisterous ocean with the sickening feelings of an exile cut off for ever from all human intercourse. Our sympathy is more truly engaged by the poor shipwrecked mariner, than by the great, the lovely, and the illustrious of the earth. We find a more effectual wisdom in his homely reflections than is to be derived from the discourses of the learned and the eloquent. The interest with which we converse with him in the retirement of his cave, or go abroad with him on the business of the day, is as various and powerful as the means by which it is kept up are simple and inartificial. So true is every thing to nature, and such reality is there in every particular, that the slightest circumstance creates a sensation, and the print of a man's foot or shoe is the source of more genuine terror than all the strange sights and odd noises in the romances of Mrs Radcliffe."

The writer of the Biographical Preface to Cadell's Edition of 'Robinson Crusoe,' has these remarks :—"The first thing that must strike every one who compares De Foe with any other writer of fictitious narrative, is the unequalled, intense reality which he throws around every part of his fiction. With such exquisite powers of fancy and of wit as he possessed, no one ever had the same command over himself to use those powers, wherever it was fit they should be used, without suffering the pleasure of employing them to lead into unnecessary ornament. He never describes anything merely for the sake of the description; everything is strictly subservient to the main matter in hand; nothing is omitted that can serve the true and main purpose of the story; nothing added only for the sake of displaying the powers of the writer. Above all, in three of his novels, where the chief personage is made to tell his own story, it is wonderful what superiority this part of his skill gives De Foe, even over authors of much higher powers, in one sense of the word, than himself. Others may invent incidents of a more happy nature, but it is the charm of De Foe that, let his incidents be as common-place as may be, we read them at the full stretch of interest; simply because, for the moment, the irresistible belief is upon us that these things really occurred exactly as they are set down in the book before us. Nobody ever skips over a page or two in one of his tales, because he is in a hurry to get on, and suspects that the story will be just as intelligible without what he is passing over as with it. We are bound to the page by the grave character of the history, at the same time that we read it with the delight of happiest fiction. Every thought that passed through the mind of the hero is set down, and we feel that there would be a want of candour in refusing to see what it was; we are gained over to his side, even if he be a villain, by the honesty with which he lets us into the secrets of his inmost heart. The nature that is so communicative cannot be entirely depraved; the charm of frankness and confidence overcomes and subdues us. The reader is made the father confessor of him that addresses him, and it would be a breach of duty to turn a deaf ear to anything he has to say.

"It is no easy matter, however, to decide by what particular art De Foe has continued to make his stories so much more real in their aspect than any other novelist; the chief secret, perhaps, is nothing but his delight in giving all the details of the action or course of thought he is engaged in. Other writers give us the main points, and please us by the opportunity they afford us of filling up the interstices by the exercise of our own imaginations for ourselves. Such is not the way of De Foe; he must be allowed to tell you all, or he will tell you nothing. He stops in the midst of the darkest horrors of the plague to give a long account of some old woman stealing beaver hats out of a warehouse; a trifling matter surely, and not worthy for itself of being told among the mass of black thoughts and doings to which the moral corruption of the pestilence gave rise. But then how completely this trifling circumstance establishes in our minds the conviction that we are listening to the narrative of a true and authentic eye-witness; not of one that had heard of the horrors of the plague, and is employing his imagination to body forth a picture of which the outline only had been supplied by his memory, but of one that had walked the streets of London during the awful visitation, with all his personal feelings and interests alive in his mind; surveying the dreary, calamity-struck city, with the eyes of a man and a Christian; but still remembering his own concerns, and watching, like a careful brother, over the safety of his absent brother's store-shop. When the author of 'Tom Jones,' or 'Roderick Random,' or 'Gil Blas,' introduces one of his characters, and gives you a full description of his person and attire, it is evidently for the purpose of amusing us; when the author of 'Waverley' and 'Ivanhoe' does so, it is from the delight he feels in communicating the vivacity of his own imagination to us, and bestowing the freshness of things seen on the phantoms of days gone by. When De Foe does the same thing, it is because the nature of the person in whose mouth he puts the description, is such as to make that an essential part of his communication ; we should rather say of her communication, for he commonly takes care to put such details into the mouth of a female. Roxana, the vain, beautiful, high-dressed Roxana, never mentions a beau or a belle, but she must tell us the colour of his breeches or the pattern of her petticoat. The coarser mind of Moll Flanders was never caught by such trifles as these ; but she dwells on the full muscular outline of her Lancashire husband's leg, and fills half a dozen pages with an account of the fat dishes they had at their wedding supper at the inn. Robinson Crusoe enumerates every nail he put into his cabin ; but then whatever Robinson Crusoe had was the work of his own ingenuity, and who can wonder at the pride of his detail ? The only novelist that ever rivalled De Foe in this point of his art was Richardson, but that is not the only particular in which Richardson is the imitator of De Foe.

“ It is not, however, by his circumstantiality and spirit of minute detail alone that De Foe gives this unequalled effect of truth and reality to his fiction. These are the first things that strike the reader's fancy ; but on laying down any one of his works, it is felt irresistibly that the essence of the charm lies in something far deeper than these. All other novelists, compared with him, are more or less painters of the ideal in human life ; we do not mean of the beau ideal, for that many of them totally despise as well as he, but of its ideal of excitement. He paints not only the minute items of human life and action exactly as they are, but its whole scope and tenor also is viewed and represented by him, and by him alone, exactly as it is. Others carry their heroes and heroines through all varieties of fortune, but they continue everything in order to make the interest progressive, and the last scene is always intended to be the exquisitely interesting catastrophe of a throughout interesting tale. De Foe, on the other hand, always shows himself to be perfectly aware that the prosaic part of existence is far greater than the poetic ; that mountains are ever succeeded and separated by valleys ; that the most romantic avenue often conducts into a dull and level wideness of plain ; and that the most picturesque of rivers expands into the tameness of utility before it melts into the all equalizing sea. Instead, therefore, of labouring to heighten the interest of one scene above that which has gone before, he is contented to make both natural ; and never fears, if they be so, but that both will be sufficiently interesting. His lovers are not always married, nor do his duellists always escape. The same laws by which men and things are governed in the world, govern them in his representations of the world ; an unforeseen storm sinks the fairest vessel into the sea, with her equipment ; absence cools the most ardent lovers ; time consoles the most despairing mourners ; the sonneteer burns his sonnets, and learns to laugh at himself ; and the widow's heart is made to sing aloud for joy. His women are never angels, nor his misers sentimental.

“ The writings of De Foe are valuable on many accounts, but for nothing so much as for the insight they give us into the true character and habits of the English people, as exemplified in walks of life little understood or far less happily represented by the other novelists and painters of manners our island has produced. Without reading and studying the ‘ Religious Courtship ’ in particular, the ‘ Complete English Tradesman,’ and the ‘ Family Instructor,’ no man can hope to understand thoroughly the character and manners of the middle classes of his countrymen. There cannot be a more perfectly national writer than De Foe—every thought of his, every word, every image is intensely English ; there is not one page in his works that does not remind one the author was born in London, and lived in the days of King William and Queen Anne. The homely way in which he looks at everything—the sagacious scorn with which he regards all pretences of the fine and the romantic—his thorough-going, citizen-like, substantial perception of the prudent and the seemly—his broad, buffeting style of sarcasm—his deep, sincere, masculine pathos—everything about him, and his “ round, unvarnished tales," reminds us that he was an English tradesman, and makes us honour the name of an English tradesman for the sake of Daniel De Foe. When he walks forth into the country (and few of his works are more delightful than his tours through England and Scotland), he carries all the prejudices of the city life along with him, and describes whatever he sees exactly as he might have done by word of mouth to his next door neighbour after returning from an actual trip in the way of business. London, and London alone, he describes with all the warmth and fulness of a lover. It is easy to see that in her was centred his idea of all human grandeur and magnificence; and who shall say that he was mistaken? Whig and Dissenter as he was, no man loved and revered all the old institutions of his country, more fervently than Daniel. He triumphs in describing the superior pomp and dignity with which the majesty of England was surrounded at Whitehall, and half forgets his puritanism beneath the vaults of Westminster Abbey.

"De Foe's love for the sea, and the affairs of the sea, was another strong and prevailing part of his character as an Englishman; and it is traceable more or less in almost all his writings. Trade was his original destination, and he understood it thoroughly in all its branches; his study of the trade of his country had filled him with a magnificent sense of her ocean greatness, and no man could have conceived some of the sublime meditations of Robinson Crusoe but a citizen of the Queen of Isles. It is now more than a hundred years since that book was written, and who shall say how many young hearts have in that time been smitten by its means with their first love for the element of their country's pride? Every English lad that reads 'Robinson Crusoe' has his little canoe and his mimic ship, and so long as the British Jack sweeps the sea, the youngest boy that rocks upon the mast will exhibit there the usefulness of those lessons of resolution and contempt of danger which he owes to 'Robinson Crusoe.' It is here, indeed, that the chief value and the chief merit of this performance are to be found. The happy imagination of the incidents of the mariner's life, and the profound knowledge of man's nature which is exhibited in the workings of his solitary soul,—even these would be comparatively nothing, were it not for the rich moral aim to which they are made subservient. The superiority of man to all external evils, his destination to contend with difficulties, and his duty to sustain them, and his pious humility in overcoming them,—these are the ideas which this, the most moral of all romances, throughout displays and inculcates. How happy that the book, which, as Dr Johnson says, "nobody ever laid down without wishing it longer," is not only the most charming of books, but the most instructive."

The following criticism by Sir Walter Scott will worthily conclude this portion of the work. "The fertility of De Foe was astonishing. He wrote on all occasions and on all subjects, and seemingly had little time for preparation upon the subject in hand, but treated it from the stores which his memory retained of early reading and such hints as he had caught up in society, not one of which seems to have been lost upon him. It cannot be doubted, therefore, that he possessed a powerful memory to furnish him with materials, and a no less copious vein of imagination to weave them up into a web of his own, and supply the rich embroidery which in reality constitutes their chief value. His language is genuine English, often simple even to vulgarity, but always so distinctly impressive that its very vulgarity has an efficacy in giving an air of truth or probability to the facts and sentiments it conveys. Exclusive of politics, De Foe's studies led chiefly to those popular narratives which are the amusement of children and of the lower classes; those accounts of travellers who have visited remote countries; of voyagers who have made discoveries of new lands and strange nations; of pirates and buccaneers who have acquired wealth by their desperate adventures on the ocean. There is reason to believe, from a passage in his 'Review,' that he was acquainted with Dampier, a mariner, whose scientific skill in his profession and power of literary composition were at that time rarely found in that profession, especially among those rough sons of the ocean who acknowledged no peace beyond the Line, and had as natural an enmity to a South-American Spaniard as a greyhound to a hare, and who, though distinguished by the somewhat milder term of buccaneer, were little better than absolute pirates. The English government, it is well known, were not, however, very active in destroying this class of adventurers, while they confined their depredations to the Dutch and Spaniards, and indeed seldom disturbed them if they returned from their roving life, and sat down to enjoy their ill-gotten gains. The courage of these men, the wonderful risks which they incurred, their hair-breadth escapes, and the romantic countries through which they travelled, seem to have had infinite charms for De Foe. All his works on this topic are entertaining in the highest degree, and remarkable for the accuracy with which he personates the character of a buccaneering adventurer. De Foe's general acquaintance with nautical affairs has not been doubted, as he is said never to misapply the various sea phrases, or show an ignorance unbecoming the character under which he wrote. He appears also to have been familiar with foreign countries, their produce, their manners, and government, and whatever rendered it easy or difficult to enter into trade with them. We may therefore conclude that Purchas's 'Pilgrim,' Hakluyt's 'Voyages,' and the other ancient authorities, had been curiously examined by him, as well as those of his friend Dampier, of Wafer, and others who had been in the South Seas, whether as privateers, or, as it was then called, upon the account.

"Shylock observes, there are land thieves and water thieves; and as De Foe was familiar with the latter, so he was not without some knowledge of the practices and devices of the former. We are afraid we must impute to his long imprisonment the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the secrets of thieves and mendicants, their acts of plunder, concealment, and escape. But whatever way he acquired his knowledge of low life, De Foe certainly possessed it in the most extensive sense, and applied it in the composition of several works of fiction in the style termed by the Spaniards Gusto Pícaresco, of which no man was ever a greater master. This class of fictitious narrative may be termed the Romance of Roguery, the subjects being the adventures of thieves, rogues, vagabonds, swindlers, viragoes, and courtezans. The strange and blackguard scenes which De Foe describes are fit to be compared to the 'Gipsy Boys' of Murillo, which are so justly admired as being, in truth of conception and spirit of execution, the very chef d'œuvre of art, however low and loathsome the originals from which they were taken.

"A third species of composition, to which the author's active and vigorous genius was peculiarly adapted, was the account of great national convulsions, whether by war, or by the pestilence, or the tempest. These were tales which are sure, when even moderately well told, to arrest the attention, and which, narrated with that impression of reality which De Foe knew so well how to convey, make the hair bristle and the skin creep. In this manner he has written the 'Memoirs of a Cavalier,' which have been often read and quoted as a real production of a real personage. Born himself almost immediately after the Restoration, De Foe must have known many of those who had been engaged in the civil turmoils of 1642-6, to which the period of these memoirs refers. He must have lived among them at that age when boys, such as we conceive De Foe must necessarily have been, cling to the knees of those who can tell them of the darings and the dangers of their youth, at a period when their own passions and views of pressing forward in life have not begun to operate upon their minds, and while they are still pleased to listen to the adventures which others have encountered on that stage which they themselves have not yet entered upon. The 'Memoirs of a Cavalier' have certainly been enriched with some such anecdotes as were likely to fire De Foe's active and powerful imagination, and hint to him in what colours the subject ought to be treated. The contrast, for instance, between the soldiers of the celebrated Tilly and those of the illustrious Gustavus Adolphus almost seems too minutely drawn to have been executed from anything short of ocular testimony. But De Foe's genius has shown, in this and other instances, how completely he could assume the character he describes.

“Another species of composition, for which this multifarious author showed a strong predilection, was that upon theurgy, magic, ghost-seeing, witchcraft, and the occult sciences. De Foe dwells on such subjects with so much unction as to leave as little doubt that he was to a certain point a believer in something resembling an immediate communication between the inhabitants of this world and of that which we shall in future inhabit. He is particularly strong on the subject of secret forebodings, mysterious impressions, bodements of good or evil, which arise in our own mind, but which yet seem impressed there by some external agent, and not to arise from the course of our natural reflections. * * * The general charm attached to the romances of De Foe is chiefly to be ascribed to the unequalled dexterity with which he has given an appearance of REALITY to the incidents which he narrates. Even De Foe's deficiencies in style, his homeliness of language, his rusticity of thought, expressive of what is called the Crassa Minerva, seem to claim credit for him as one who speaks the truth, the rather that we suppose he wants the skill to conceal or disguise it. It is greatly to be doubted whether De Foe could have changed his colloquial, circuitous, and periphrastic style for any other, whether more coarse or more elegant. We have little doubt it was connected with his nature, and the particular turn of his thoughts and ordinary expressions, and that he did not succeed so much by writing in an assumed manner, as by giving full scope to his own. The air of writing with all the plausibility of truth must, in almost every case, have its own peculiar value ; as we admire the paintings of some Flemish artists, where, though the subjects drawn are mean and disagreeable, and such as in nature we would not wish to study or look close upon, yet the skill with which they are represented by the painter gives an interest to the imitation upon canvass which the original entirely wants. But, on the other hand, when the power of exact and circumstantial delineation is applied to objects which we are anxiously desirous to see in their proper shape and colours, we have a double source of pleasure, both in the art of the painter and in the interest which we take in the subject represented. Thus the style of probability with which De Foe invested his narratives was perhaps ill-bestowed, or rather wasted, upon some of the works which he thought proper to produce ; but, on the other hand, the same talent throws an air of truth about the delightful history of ‘Robinson Crusoe,’ which we never could have believed it possible to have united with so extraordinary a situation as is assigned to the hero. All the usual scaffolding and machinery employed in composing fictitious history are carefully discarded. The early incidents of the tale, which in ordinary works of invention are usually thrown out as pegs to hang the conclusion upon, are in this work only touched upon, and suffered to drop out of sight. Robinson, for example, never hears anything more of his elder brother, who enters Lockhart's Dragoons in the beginning of the work, and who, in any common romance, would certainly have appeared before the conclusion. We lose sight at once and for ever of the interesting Xury ; and the whole earlier adventures of our voyager vanish, not to be recalled to our recollection by the subsequent course of the story. His father—the good old merchant of Hull—all the other persons who have been originally active in the drama, vanish from the scene, and appear not again. This is not the case in the ordinary romance, where the author, however luxuriant his invention, does not willingly quit possession of the creatures of his imagination till they have rendered him some services upon the scene ; whereas in common life it rarely happens that our early acquaintances exercise much influence upon the fortunes of our future life.”

De Foe was twice married ; the name of his first wife was Mary, that of his second Susannah, but their maiden names are not known. In 1706 he appears to have had seven children, but of these one, Martha, died in 1707 at Hackney, and was carried out of the parish to be buried, probably in Bunhill Fields, the common receptacle for Dissenters. The other six children survived their father. The eldest, Daniel, who married early in life, and had several children, emigrated to Carolina between the years 1725 and 1730, and died there at an advanced age. De Foe's second son, Bernard (or, as Mr Chalmers calls him, Benjamin) assumed, for some reason or other with which we are not acquainted, the name of Norton, and followed his father's profession of a writer. He is introduced in the 'Dunciad' as

"Norton, from Daniel and Ostræa sprung, Bless'd with his father's front and mother's tongue."*

The imputation rests upon no better evidence than this, and may be safely dismissed as nothing more than a random shot of the petulant poet, who spared no man in his anger. This Norton De Foe, however, appears to have been a very inferior scribe. He succeeded Ridpath, who died in 1726, as editor of 'The Flying Post,' and is, besides, author of 'A Compleat English Dictionary, by B. N. De Foe, Gent., 1735 ;' 'Memoirs of the House of Orange ;' and 'The Life of Alderman Barber.'

De Foe's eldest daughter, Maria, married a person of the name of Langley ; Hannah, the second daughter, remained single, and after her father's death, went to reside at Winborne Minster, in Dorsetshire. As she lived upon her own property, which afterwards passed to a nephew, it may be concluded that De Foe's daughters succeeded in recovering their estates out of the hands of their brother. From a document in the hands of Mr Upcott, it seems that Hannah De Foe was possessed of property in the books of the South Sea Company during her father's lifetime. She died 25th April, 1759, and was buried at Winborne.† Henrietta, the third daughter, married Mr John Boston, of Much-Hadham, a man of good family and estate at Boston, in Lincolnshire. He was appointed supervisor of excise at Winborne, and died there. His widow died March 5, 1760, and was buried in the same vault with her husband and sister. Sophia, De Foe's youngest daughter, married Mr Henry Baker, the celebrated natural philosopher, and dying 4th January, 1762, was buried in the churchyard of St Mary-le-Strand. Her husband departed this life 25th November, 1774, in his 77th year. Their son, David Erskine, so named after his godfather, the Earl of Buchan, was the author of 'The Companion to the Playhouse.' A great grandson of De Foe (it is not known from which of our author's sons he was descended) was hanged at Tyburn, Jan. 2, 1771, for a highway robbery, and a brother of his, named Daniel, who was apprenticed to a watchmaker, ran away and went to sea. He afterwards became cook on board the Savage sloop of war, and was living in that employment in 1787. The circumstance is thus mentioned by a correspondent of 'The Gentleman's Magazine,' Edward Herbert, who, in speaking of De Foe, says :—"His grandson (great grandson) is at this time cook to the gentlemen of the gun-room of the Savage sloop of war. Having been lately surgeon of one of his Majesty's ships on the coast of Scotland, and business requiring me on board that vessel, I casually heard a Daniel De Foe mentioned among the seamen. The name being so familiar to me, I inquired, from motives of curiosity, concerning his family. He told me his father was a calico-printer in London, who had failed in business ; that his grandfather had written 'Robinson Crusoe,' 'The True-Born Englishman,' &c. I felt myself much affected when I saw the descendant of so ingenious a man in so unworthy a situation, and, making the circumstance known, recommended him to the attention of the gentlemen on board." From this branch descends the present representative of the family of De Foe, a respectable carpenter and packing-case maker, in Bedford street, Covent garden.

* Pope had collected this scandal from Savage, who says, in the preface to his 'Author to be Let'—"Had it not been an honest livelihood for Mr Norton (Daniel De Foe's son of love by a lady who vended oysters) to have dealt in a fish-market, than to be dealing out the dialect of Billingsgate in 'The Flying Post.'"

† The late Mr Duncan, formerly Dissenting minister at Winborne, drew up a history of his church, in which he says—"The celebrated Daniel De Foe was here frequently." He adds—"I am in possession of two manuscript volumes of Daniel De Foe's; one is corrected for the press, with a dedication. He wrote a neat, fair hand. He entitles the book thus: 'Historical Collections; or, Memoirs of Passages collected from several Authors. 1682.' I think it would be well if it were published. I have also some original poems of his in his own handwriting. He was truly a great man, and I much wonder that he is so little known in the world at this day, either by men of letters, politics, or religion; for he certainly had his share of all these, particularly the two latter." Mr Wilson adds, that he had made careful inquiry for these MSS., but without success.

AN APPEAL TO HONOUR AND JUSTICE,

THOUGH IT BE OF HIS WORST ENEMIES,

BY DANIEL DE FOE;

BEING A TRUE ACCOUNT OF HIS CONDUCT IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

I HOPE the time is come at last when the voice of moderate principles may be heard. Hitherto the noise has been so great, and the prejudices and passions of men so strong, that it had been but in vain to offer at any argument, or for any man to talk of giving a reason for his actions; and this alone has been the cause why, when other men, who, I think, have less to say in their own defence, are appealing to the public, and struggling to defend themselves, I alone have been silent under the infinite clamours and reproaches, causeless curses, unusual threatenings, and the most unjust and injurious treatment in the world.

I hear much of people's calling out to punish the guilty, but very few are concerned to clear the innocent. I hope some will be inclined to judge impartially, and have yet reserved so much of the Christian as to believe, and at least to hope, that a rational creature cannot abandon himself so as to act without some reason, and are willing not only to have me defend myself, but to be able to answer for me where they hear me causelessly insulted by others, and, therefore, are willing to have such just arguments put into their mouths as the cause will bear.

As for those who are prepossessed, and according to the modern justice of parties are resolved to be so, let them go; I am not arguing with them, but against them; they act so contrary to justice, to reason, to religion, so contrary to the rules of Christians and of good manners, that they are not to be argued with, but to be exposed, or entirely neglected. I have a receipt against all the uneasiness which it may be supposed to give me, and that is, to contemn slander, and think it not worth the least concern; neither should I think it worth while to give any answer to it, if it were not on some other accounts of which I shall speak as I go on. If any young man ask me why I am in such haste to publish this matter at this time, among many other good reasons which I could give, these are some:—

1. I think I have long enough been made Fabula Vulgi, and borne the weight of general slander; and I should be wanting to truth, to my family, and to myself, if I did not give a fair and true state of my conduct, for impartial men to judge of, when I am no more in being to answer for myself.

2. By the hints of mortality, and by the infirmities of a life of sorrow and fatigue, I have reason to think I am not a great way off from, if not very near to, the great ocean of eternity, and the time may not be long ere I embark on the last voyage. Wherefore, I think I should even accounts with this world before I go, that no actions (slanders) may lie against my heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to disturb them in the peaceable possession of their father's (character) inheritance.

3. I fear—God grant I have not a second sight in it—that this lucid interval of temper and moderation, which shines, though dimly too, upon us at this time, will be but of short continuance, and that some men, who know not how to use the advantage God has put into their hands with moderation, will push, in spite of the best prince in the world, at such extravagant things, and act with such an intemperate forwardness, as will revive the heats and animosities which wise and good men were in hopes should be allayed by the happy accession of the king to the throne.

It is and ever was my opinion, that moderation is the only virtue by which the peace and tranquillity of this nation can be preserved. Even the king himself—I believe his majesty will allow me that freedom—can only be happy in the enjoyment of the crown by a moderate administration. If his majesty should be obliged, contrary to his known disposition, to join with intemperate councils, if it does not lessen his security, I am persuaded it will lessen his satisfaction. It cannot be pleasant or agreeable, and I think it cannot be safe, to any just prince, to rule over a divided people, split into incensed and exasperated parties. Though a skilful mariner may have courage to master a tempest, and goes fearless through a storm, yet he can never be said to delight in the danger; a fresh, fair gale, and a quiet sea, is the pleasure of his voyage, and we have a saying worth notice to them that are otherwise minded, "Qui amat periculum, periebat in illo."

To attain at the happy calm, which, as I say, is the safety of Britain, is the question which should now move us all ; and he would merit to be called the nation's physician that could prescribe the specific for it. I think I may be allowed to say, a conquest of parties will never do it ; a balance of parties may. Some are for the former ; they talk high of punishments, letting blood, revenging the treatment they have met with, and the like. If they, not knowing what spirit they are of, think this the course to be taken, let them try their hands ; I shall give them up for lost, and look for their downfall from that time ; for the ruin of all such tempers slumbereth not.

It is many years that I have professed myself an enemy to all precipitations in public administrations ; and often I have attempted to show, that hot councils have ever been destructive to those who have made use of them. Indeed, they have not always been a disadvantage to the nation, as in King James II's reign, when, as I have often said in print, his precipitation was the safety of us all : and if he had proceeded temperately and politically, we had been undone. Felix quem faciunt.

But these things have been spoken when your ferment has been too high for anything to be heard ; whether you will hear it now or no, I know not ; and therefore it was that I said, I fear the present cessation of party arms will not hold long. These are some of the reasons why I think this is the proper juncture for me to give some account of myself, and of my past conduct to the world ; and that I may do this as effectually as I can, being perhaps never more to speak from the press, I shall, as concisely as I can, give an abridgment of my own history during the few unhappy years I have employed myself, or been employed, in public in the world.

Misfortunes in business having unhinged me from matters of trade, it was about the year 1694 when I was invited by some merchants, with whom I had corresponded abroad, and some also at home, to settle at Cadiz, in Spain, and that with offers of very good commissions. But Providence, which had other work for me to do, placed a secret aversion in my mind to quitting England upon any account, and made me refuse the best offers of that kind, to be concerned with some eminent persons at home in proposing ways and means to the government, for raising money to supply the occasions of the war then newly begun. Some time after this I was, without the least application of mine, and being then seventy miles from London, sent for to be accountant to the commissioners of the glass duty, in which service I continued to the determination of their commission.

During this time there came out a vile abhorred pamphlet, in very ill verse, written by one Mr Tutchin, and called 'The Foreigners,' in which the author—who he was I then knew not—fell personally upon the king himself, and then upon the Dutch nation ; and after having reproached his majesty with crimes that his worst enemy could not think of without horror, he sums up all in the odious name of FOREIGNER.

This filled me with a kind of rage against the book, and gave birth to a trifle, which I never could hope should have met with so general an acceptance as it did ; I mean 'The True-born Englishman.' How this poem was the occasion of my being known to his majesty ; how I was afterwards received by him ; how employed ; and how, above my capacity of deserving, rewarded, is no part of the present case, and is only mentioned here, as I take all occasions to do, for the expressing the honour I ever preserved for the immortal and glorious memory of that greatest and best of princes, and whom it was my honour and advantage to call master, as well as sovereign ; whose goodness to me I never forgot, neither can forget ; and whose memory I never patiently heard abused, nor ever can do so ; and who, had he lived, would never have suffered me to be treated as I have been in the world. But Heaven for our sins removed him in judgment. How far the treatment he met with from the nation he came to save, and whose deliverance he finished, was admitted by Heaven to be a means of his death, I desire to forget for their sakes who are guilty ; and if this calls any of it to mind, it is mentioned to move them to treat him better who is now, with like principles of goodness and clemency, appointed by God and the constitution to be their sovereign, lest he that protects righteous princes avenge the injuries they receive from an ungrateful people by giving them up to the confusions their madness leads them to.

And in their just acclamations at the happy accession of his present majesty to the throne, I cannot but advise them to look back and call to mind who it was that first guided them to the family of Hanover, and to pass by all the popish branches of Orleans and Savoy ; recognising the just authority of Parliament in the undoubted right of limiting the succession, and establishing that glorious maxim of our settlement, viz., that it is inconsistent with the constitution of this protestant kingdom to be governed by a popish prince. I say, let them call to mind who it was that guided their thoughts first to the protestant race of our own kings in the house of Hanover ; and that it is to King William, next to Heaven itself, to whom we owe the enjoying a protestant king at this time. I need not go back to the particulars of his majesty's conduct in that affair ; his journey in person to the country of Hanover and the court of Zell ; his particular management of the affair afterwards at home, perfecting the design by naming the illustrious family to the nation, and bringing about a parliamentary settlement to effect it ; entailing the crown thereby in so effectual a manner as we see has been sufficient to prevent the worst designs of our Jacobite people in behalf of the Pretender ; a settlement, together with the subsequent acts which followed it, and the union with Scotland, which made it unalterable, that gave a complete satisfaction to those who knew and understood it, and removed those terrible apprehensions of the Pretender (which some entertained) from the minds of others, who were yet as zealous against him as it was possible for any to be. Upon this settlement, as I shall show presently, I grounded my opinion, which I often expressed, viz., that I did not see it possible the Jacobites could ever set up their idol here, and I think my opinion abundantly justified in the consequences ; of which by and bye.

This digression, as a debt to the glorious memory of King William, I could not in justice omit; and as the reign of his present majesty is esteemed happy, and looked upon as a blessing from heaven by us, it will most necessarily lead us to bless the memory of King William, to whom we owe so much of it. How easily could his majesty have lead us to other branches, whose relation to the crown might have had large pretences! What prince but would have submitted to have educated a successor of his race in the protestant religion for the sake of such a crown? But the king, who had our happiness in view, and saw as far into it as any human sight could penetrate; who knew we were not to be governed by inexperienced youths; that the protestant religion was not to be established by political converts; and that princes, under French influence, or instructed in French politics, were not proper instruments to preserve the liberties of Britain, fixed his eyes upon the family which now possesses the crown, as not only having an undoubted relation to it by blood, but as being first and principally zealous and powerful assertors of the protestant religion and interest against popery; and, secondly, stored with a visible succession of worthy and promising branches, who appeared equal to the weight of government, qualified to fill a throne and guide a nation, which, without reflection, are not famed to be the most easy to rule in the world.

Whether the consequence has been a credit to King William's judgment I need not say. I am not writing panegyrics here, but doing justice to the memory of the king my master, whom I have had the honour very often to hear express himself with great satisfaction in having brought the settlement of the succession to so good an issue; and, to repeat his majesty's own words, that he knew no prince in Europe so fit to be King of England as the Elector of Hanover. I am persuaded, without any flattery, that if it should not every way answer the expectations his majesty had of it, the fault will be our own. God grant the King may have more comfort of his crown than we suffered King William to have!

The king being dead, and the queen proclaimed, the hot men of that side, as the hot men of all sides do, thinking the game in their own hands, and all other people under their feet, began to run out into those mad extremes, and precipitate themselves into such measures as, according to the fate of all intemperate councils, ended in their own confusion, and threw them at last out of the saddle.

The queen, who, though willing to favour the high-church party, did not thereby design the ruin of those whom she did not employ, was soon alarmed at their wild conduct, and turned them out, adhering to the moderate counsels of those who better understood, or more faithfully pursued, her majesty's and the country's interest. In this turn fell Sir Edward Seymour's party, for so the high men were then called; and to this turn we owe the conversion of several other great men, who became whigs on that occasion, which it is known they were not before; which conversion afterwards begat that unkind distinction of old whig and modern whig, which some of the former were with very little justice pleased to run up afterwards to an extreme very pernicious to both.

But I am gone too far in this part. I return to my own story.

In the interval of these things, and during the heat of the first fury of high-flying, I fell a sacrifice for writing against the rage and madness of that high party, and in the service of the dissenters. What justice I met with, and, above all, what mercy, is too well known to need repetition.

This introduction is made that it may bring me to what has been the foundation of all my further concern in public affairs, and will produce a sufficient reason for my adhering to those whose obligations upon me were too strong to be resisted, even when many things were done by them which I could not approve; and for this reason it is that I think it necessary to distinguish how far I did or did not adhere to, or join in or with, the persons or conduct of the late government: and those who are willing to judge with impartiality and charity, will see reason to use me the more tenderly in their thoughts, when they weigh the particulars.

I will make no reflections upon the treatment I met with from the people I suffered for, or how I was abandoned even in my sufferings, at the same time that they acknowledged the service I had been to their cause; but I must mention it to let you know that while I lay friendless and distressed in the prison of Newgate, my family ruined, and myself without hope of deliverance, a message was brought me from a person of honour, who, till that time, I had never had the least acquaintance with, or knowledge of, other than by fame, or by sight, as we know men of quality by seeing them on public occasions. I gave no present answer to the person who brought it, having not duly weighed the import of the message. The message was by word of mouth thus:—"Pray, ask that gentleman what I can do for him?" But in return to this kind and generous message, I immediately took my pen and ink and wrote the story of the blind man in the gospel, who followed our Saviour, and to whom our blessed Lord put the question, "What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?" Who, as if he had made it strange that such a question should be asked, or as if he had said that I am blind, and yet ask me what thou shalt do for me? My answer is plain in my misery, "Lord, that I may receive my sight."

I needed not to make the application. And from this time, although I lay four months in prison after this, and heard no more of it, yet from this time, as I learned afterwards, this noble person made it his business to have my case represented to her majesty, and methods taken for my deliverance.

I mention this part, because I am no more to forget the obligation upon me to the queen, than to my first benefactor.

When her majesty came to have the truth of the case laid before her, I soon felt the effects of her royal goodness and compassion. And first, her majesty declared, that she left all that matter to a certain person, and did not think he would have used me in such a manner. Probaby these words may seem imaginary to some, and the speaking them to be of no value, and so they would have been had they not been followed with further and more convincing proofs of what they imported, which were these, that her majesty was pleased particularly to inquire into my circumstances and family, and by my Lord Treasurer Godolphin to send a considerable supply to my wife and family, and to send to me the prison money to pay my fine and the expenses of my discharge. Whether this be a just foundation let my enemies judge. Here is the foundation on which I built my first sense of duty to her majesty's person, and the indelible bond of gratitude to my first benefactor.

Gratitude and fidelity are inseparable from an honest man. But, to be thus obliged by a stranger, by a man of quality and honour, and after that by the sovereign under whose administration I was suffering, let any one put himself in my stead, and examine upon what principles I could ever act against either such a queen, or such a benefactor; and what must my own heart reproach me with, what blushes must have covered my face when I had looked in, and called myself ungrateful to him that saved me thus from distress, or her that fetched me out of the dungeon, and gave my family relief? Let any man who knows what principles are, what engagements of honour and gratitude are, make his case his own, and say what I could have done more or less than I have done.

I must go on a little with the detail of the obligation, and then I shall descend to relate what I have done, and what I have not done, in the case.

Being delivered from the distress I was in, her majesty, who was not satisfied to do me good by a single act of her bounty, had the goodness to think of taking me into her service, and I had the honour to be employed in several honourable, though secret services, by the interposition of my first benefactor, who then appeared as a member in the public administration.

I had the happiness to discharge myself in all these trusts so much to the satisfaction of those who employed me, though oftentimes with difficulty and danger, that my Lord Treasurer Godolphin, whose memory I have always honoured, was pleased to continue his favour to me, and to do me all good offices with her majesty, even after an unhappy breach had separated him from my first benefactor, the particulars of which may not be improper to relate; and as it is not an injustice to any, so I hope it will not be offensive.

When, upon that fatal breach, the Secretary of State was dismissed from the service, I looked upon myself as lost; it being a general rule in such cases, when a great officer falls, that all who came in by his interest fall with him; and resolving never to abandon the fortunes of the man to whom I owed so much of my own, I quitted the usual applications which I had made to my lord treasurer.

But my generous benefactor, when he understood it, frankly told me that I should by no means do so; "For," said he, in the most engaging terms, "my lord treasurer will employ you in nothing but what is for the public service, and agreeably to your own sentiments of things; and besides, it is the queen you are serving, who has been very good to you. Pray, apply yourself as you used to do; I shall not take it ill from you in the least."

Upon this, I went to wait on my lord treasurer, who received me with great freedom, and told me smiling he had not seen me a long while. I told his lordship very frankly the occasion—that the unhappy breach that had fallen out had made me doubtful whether I should be acceptable to his lordship. That I knew it was usual when great persons fall, that all who were in their interest fell with them. That his lordship knew the obligations I was under, and that I could not but fear my interest in his lordship was lessened on that account. "Not all, Mr De Foe," replied his lordship; "I always think a man honest till I find to the contrary."

Upon this I attended his lordship as usual; and being resolved to remove all possible ground of suspicion that I kept any secret correspondence, I never visited, or wrote to, or any way corresponded with my principal benefactor for above three years; which he so well knew the reason of, and so well approved that punctual behaviour in me, that he never took it ill from me at all.

In consequence of this reception, my Lord Godolphin had the goodness, not only to introduce me for the second time to her majesty, and to the honour of kissing her hand, but obtained for me the continuance of an appointment which her majesty had been pleased to make me, in consideration of a formal special service I had done, and in which I had run as much risk of my life as a grenadier upon the counterscarp; and which appointment, however, was first obtained for me at the intercession of my said first benefactor, and is all owing to that intercession, and her majesty's bounty. Upon this second introduction, her majesty was pleased to tell me, with a goodness peculiar to herself, that she had such satisfaction in my former services, that she had appointed me for another affair, which was something nice, and that my lord treasurer should tell me the rest; and so I withdrew.

The next day, his lordship having commanded me to attend, told me that he must send me to Scotland, and gave me but three days to prepare myself. Accordingly, I went to Scotland, where neither my business, nor the manner of my discharging it, is material to this tract; nor will it be ever any part of my character, that I reveal what should be concealed. And yet, my errand was such as was far from being unfit for a sovereign to direct, or an honest man to perform; and the service I did upon that occasion, as it is not unknown to the greatest man now in the nation under the king and the prince, so, I dare say, his grace was never displeased with the part I had in it, and I hope will not forget it.

These things I mention upon this account, and no other, viz. to state the obligation I have been in all along to her majesty personally, and to my first benefactor principally; by which I say, I think I was at least obliged not to act against them, even in those things which I might not approve. Whether I have acted with them farther than I ought, shall be spoken to by itself.

Having said thus much of the obligations laid on me, and the persons by whom, I have this only to add, that I think no man will say, a subject could be under greater bonds to his prince, or a private person to a minister of state; and I shall ever preserve this principle, that an honest man cannot be ungrateful to his benefactor.

But let no man run away now with the notion, that I am now intending to plead the obligation that was laid upon me from her majesty, or from any other person, to justify my doing anything that is not otherwise to be justified in itself.

Nothing would be more injurious than such a construction; and therefore I capitulate for so much justice as to explain myself by this declaration, viz. that I only speak of those obligations as binding me to a negative conduct, not to fly in the face of, or concern myself in disputes with those to whom I was under such obligations, although I might not, in my judgment, join in many things that were done. No obligation could excuse me in calling evil good, or good evil; but I am of the opinion, that I might justly think myself obliged to defend what I thought was to be defended, and to be silent in anything which I might think was not.

If this is a crime, I must plead guilty, and give in the history of my obligation above mentioned as an extenuation at least, if not a justification of my conduct.

Suppose a man's father was guilty of several things unlawful and unjustifiable; a man may heartily detest the unjustifiable thing, and yet it ought not to be expected that he should expose his father. I think the case on my side exactly the same, nor can the duty to a parent be more strongly obliging than the obligation laid on me; but I must allow the case on the other side not the same.

And this brings me to the affirmative, and inquire what the matters of fact are; what I have done, or have not done, on account of these obligations which I am under.

It is a general suggestion, and is affirmed with such assurance, that they tell me it is in vain to contradict it, that I have been employed by the Earl of Oxford, late lord treasurer, in the late disputes about public affairs, to write for him, or to put it into their own particulars, have written by his direction, taken the materials from him, been dictated to or instructed by him, or by other persons from him, by his order, and the like; and that I have received a pension, or salary, or payment from his lordship for such services as these. It was impossible, since these things have been so confidently affirmed, but that, if I could put it into words that would more fully express the meaning of these people, I profess I would do it. One would think that some evidence might be produced, some facts might appear, some one or other might be found that could speak of certain knowledge. To say things have been carried too closely to be discovered, is saying nothing, for then they must own that it is not discovered; and how then can they affirm it, as they do, with such an assurance as nothing ought to be affirmed by honest men, unless they were able to prove it?

To speak, then, to the fact. Were the reproach upon me only in this particular, I should not mention it. I should not think it a reproach to be directed by a man to whom the queen had at that time entrusted the administration of the government. But, as it is a reproach upon his lordship, justice requires that I do right in this case. The thing is true or false. I would recommend it to those who would be called honest men, to consider but one thing, viz. what if it should not be true? Can they justify the injury done to that person, or to any person concerned? If it cannot be proved, if no vestiges appear to ground it upon, how can they charge men upon rumours and reports, and join to run down men's characters by the stream of clamour?

"Sed quo rapit impetus undæ."

In answer to the charge, I bear witness to posterity, that every part of it is false and forged. And I do solemnly protest, in the fear and presence of him that shall judge us all, both the slanderers and the slandered, that I have not received any instructions, directions, orders, or let them call it what they will of that kind, for the writing any part of what I have written, or any materials for the putting together for the forming any book or pamphlet whatsoever, from the said Earl of Oxford, late lord treasurer, or from any person by his order or direction, since the time that the late Earl of Godolphin was lord treasurer. Neither did I ever show, or cause to be shown to his lordship, for his approbation, correction, alteration, or for any other cause, any book, paper, or pamphlet which I have written and published, before the same was worked off at the press and published.

If any man living can detect me of the least prevarication in this, or in any part of it, I desire him to do it by all means; and I challenge all the world to do it. And if they cannot, then I appeal, as in my title, to the honour and justice of my worst enemies, to know upon what foundation of truth or conscience they can affirm these things, and for what it is that I bear these reproaches.

In all my writing, I ever capitulated for my liberty to speak according to my own judgment of things; I ever had that liberty allowed me, nor was I ever imposed upon to write this way or that against my judgment by any person whatsoever.

I come now historically to the point of time when my Lord Godolphin was dismissed from his employment, and the late unhappy division broke out at court. I waited on my lord the day he was displaced, and humbly asked his lordship's direction what course I should take? His lordship's answer was, "that he had the same goodwill to assist me, but not the same power; that I was the queen's servant, and that all he had done for me was by her majesty's special and particular direction; and that whoever should succeed him, it was not material to me; he supposed I should be employed in nothing relating to the present differences. My business was to wait till I saw things settled, and then apply myself to the ministers of state, to receive her majesty's commands from them."

It occurred to me immediately, as a principle for my conduct, that it was not material to me what ministers her majesty was pleased to employ; my duty was to go along with every ministry, so far as they did not break in upon the constitution, and the laws and liberties of my country; my part being only the duty of a subject, viz. to submit to all lawful commands, and to enter into no service which was not justifiable by the laws: to all which I have exactly obliged myself.

By this, I was providentially cast back upon my original benefactor, who, according to his wonted goodness, was pleased to lay my case before her majesty; and thereby I preserved my interest in her majesty's favour, but without any engagement of service.

As for consideration, pension, gratification, or reward, I declare to all the world I have had none, except only that old appointment which her majesty was pleased to make me in the days of the ministry of my Lord Godolphin; of which I have spoken already, and which was for services done in a foreign country some years before. Neither have I been employed, directed, or ordered by my lord treasurer aforesaid to do, or not to do, anything in the affairs of the unhappy differences which have so long perplexed us, and for which I have suffered so many, and such unjust reproaches.

I come next to enter into the matters of fact, and what it is I have done, or not done, which may justify the treatment I have met with; and first, for the negative part, what I have not done.

The first thing in the unhappy breaches which have fallen out, is the heaping up scandal upon the persons and conduct of men of honour on one side as well as on the other; those unworthy methods of falling upon one another by personal calumny and reproach. This I have often in print complained of as an unchristian, ungenerous, and unjustifiable practice. Not a word can be found in all I have written reflecting on the persons or conduct of any of the former ministry. I served her majesty under their administration; they acted honourably and justly in every transaction in which I had the honour to be concerned with them, and I never published or said anything dishonourable of any of them in my life; nor can the worst enemy I have produce any such thing against me. I always regretted the change, and looked upon it as a great disaster to the nation in general, I am sure it was so to me in particular; and the divisions and feuds among parties which followed that change were doubtless a disaster to us all.

The next thing that followed the change was the peace: no man can say that ever I once said in my life that I approved of the peace. I wrote a public paper at that time, and there it remains upon record against me. I printed it openly, and that so plainly as others durst not do, that I did not like the peace; neither that which was made, nor that which was before making; that I thought the protestant interest was not taken care of in either; that the peace I was for was such as should neither have given the Spanish monarchy to the house of Bourbon nor to the house of Austria, but that this bone of contention should have been broken to pieces, that it might not be dangerous to Europe; and that the protestant powers, viz. Britain and the States, should have so strengthened and fortified their interest by their sharing the commerce and strength of Spain, as should have made them no more afraid either of France or the Emperor: so that the protestant interest should have been superior to all the powers of Europe, and been in no more danger of exorbitant power, whether French or Austrian. This was the peace I always argued for, pursuant to the design of King William in the Treaty of Partition, and pursuant to that article of the grand alliance which was directed by the same glorious hand at the beginning of this last war, viz. that all we should conquer in the Spanish West Indies should be our own.

This was with a true design that England and Holland should have turned their naval power, which was eminently superior to that of France, to the conquest of the Spanish West Indies, by which the channel of trade and return of bullion, which now enriches the enemies of both, had been ours; and as the wealth, so the strength of the world had been in protestant hands. Spain, whoever had it, must then have been dependent upon us. The house of Bourbon would have found it so poor without us, as to be scarce worth fighting for: and the people so averse to them, for want of their commerce, as not to make it ever likely that France could keep it.

This was the foundation I ever acted upon with relation to the peace. It is true, that when it was made, and could not be otherwise, I thought our business was to make the best of it, and rather to inquire what improvements were to be made of it, than to be continually exclaiming at those who made it; and where the objection lies against this part, I cannot yet see.

While I spoke of things in this manner, I bore infinite reproaches from clamouring pens, of being in the French interest, being hired and bribed to defend a bad peace, and the like; and most of this was upon a supposition of my writing, or being the author of, abundance of pamphlets which came out every day, and which I had no hand in. And indeed, as I shall observe again by and bye, this was one of the greatest pieces of injustice that could be done me, and which I labour still under without any redress; that whenever any piece comes out which is not liked, I am immediately charged with being the author; and very often the first knowledge I have had of a book being published, has been from seeing myself abused for being the author of it, in some other pamphlet published in answer to it.

Finding myself treated in this manner, I declined writing at all, and for a great part of a year never set pen to paper, except in the public paper called the 'Review.' After this I was long absent in the north of England; and, observing the insolence of the Jacobite party, and how they insinuated fine things into the heads of the common people of the right and claim of the Pretender, and of the great things he would do for us if he was to come in; of his being to turn a protestant, of his being resolved to maintain our liberties, support our friends, give liberty to dissenters, and the like; and finding that the people began to be deluded, and that the Jacobites gained ground among them by these insinuations, I thought it the best service I could do the protestant interest, and the best way to open people's eyes of the protestant succession, if I took some course effectually to alarm the people with what they really ought to expect, if the Pretender should come to be king. And this made me set pen to paper again.

And this brings me to the affirmative part, or to what really I have done; and in this, I am sorry to say, I have one of the foulest, most unjust, and unchristian clamours to complain of, that any man has suffered, I believe, since the days of the tyranny of King James the Second. The fact is thus:

In order to detect the influence of Jacobite emissaries, as above, the first thing I wrote was a small tract, called 'A Seasonable Caution;' a book sincerely written to open the eyes of the poor, ignorant country people, and to warn them against the subtle insinuations of the emissaries of the Pretender; and that it might be effectual to that purpose, I prevailed with several of my friends to give them away among the poor people, all over England, especially in the north; and several thousands were actually given away, the price being reduced so low, that the bare expense of paper and press was only preserved, that every one might be convinced that nothing of gain was designed, but a sincere endeavour to do a public good, and assist to keep the people entirely in the interest of the protestant succession.

Next to this, and with the same sincere design, I wrote two pamphlets, one entitled, 'What if the Pretender should come?' the other, 'Reasons against the Succession of the House of Hanover.'

Nothing can be more plain than that the titles of these books were amusements, in order to put the books into the hands of those people whom the Jacobites had deluded, and to bring them to be read by them.

Previous to what I shall farther say of these books, I must observe, that all these books met with so general a reception and approbation among those who were most sincere for the protestant succession, that they sent them all over the kingdom, and recommended them to the people as excellent and useful pieces; insomuch that about seven editions of them were printed, and they were reprinted in other places. And I do protest, had his present majesty, then Elector of Hanover, given me a thousand pounds to have written for the interest of his succession, and to expose and render the interest of the Pretender odious and ridiculous, I could have done nothing more effectual to those purposes than these books were.

And that I may make my worst enemies, to whom this is a fair appeal, judges of this, I must take leave, by and bye, to repeat some of the expressions in these books, which were direct and need no explanation, which I think no man that was in the interest of the Pretender, nay, which no man but one who was entirely in the interest of the Hanover succession, could write.

Nothing can be severer in the fate of a man than to act so between two parties, that both sides should be provoked against him. It is certain, the Jacobites cursed those tracts and the author, and when they came to read them, being deluded by the titles according to the design they threw them by with the greatest indignation imaginable. Had the Pretender ever come to the throne, I could have expected nothing but death, and all the ignominy and reproach that the most inveterate enemy of his person and claim could be supposed to suffer.

On the other hand, I leave it to any considering man to judge, what a surprise it must be to me to meet with all the public clamour that informers could invent, as being guilty of writing against the Hanover succession, and as having written several pamphlets in favour of the Pretender.

No man in this nation ever had a more rivetted aversion to the Pretender, and to all the family he pretended to come of, than I, a man that had been in arms under the Duke of Monmouth, against the cruelty and arbitrary government of his pretended father; that for twenty years had to my utmost opposed him (King James) and his party after his abdication; and had served King William to his satisfaction, and the friends of the Revolution after his death, at all hazards and upon all occasions; that had suffered and been ruined under the administration of highflyers and Jacobites, of whom some at this day counterfeit whigs. It could not be! The nature of the thing could by no means allow it; it must be monstrous; and that the wonder may cease, I shall take leave to quote some of the expressions out of these books, of which the worst enemy I have in the world is left to judge whether they are in favour of the Pretender or no; but of this in its place. For these books I was prosecuted, taken into custody, and obliged to give eight hundred pounds bail.

I do not in the least object here against, or design to reflect upon the proceedings of the judges which were subsequent to this. I acknowledged then, and now acknowledge again, that upon the information given, there was a sufficient ground for all they did; and my unhappy entering upon my own vindication in print, while the case was before their lordships in a judicial way, was an error which I did not understand, and which I did not foresee; and therefore, although I had great reason to reflect upon the informers, yet I was wrong in making that defence in the manner and time I then made it; and which when I found, I made no scruple afterwards to petition the judges, and acknowledge they had just ground to resent it. Upon which petition and acknowledgment their lordships were pleased, with particular marks of goodness, to release me, and not to take the advantage of an error of ignorance, as if it had been considered and premeditated.

But against the informers I think I have great reason to complain; and against the injustice of those writers who, in many pamphlets, charged me with writing for the Pretender, and the government with pardoning an author who wrote for the Pretender. And, indeed, the justice of these men can be in nothing more clearly stated than in this case of mine; where the charge, in their printed papers and public discourse, was brought; not that they themselves believed me guilty of the crime, but because it was necessary to blacken the man, that a general reproach might serve for an answer to whatever he should say that was not for their turn. So that it was the person, not the crime, they fell upon; and they may justly be said to persecute for the sake of persecution, as will thus appear.

This matter making some noise, people began to inquire into it, and ask what De Foe was prosecuted for, seeing the books were manifestly written against the Pretender, and for the interest of the House of Hanover. And my friends expostulated freely with some of the men who appeared in it, who answered with more truth than honesty, that they knew this book had nothing in it, and that it was meant another way; but that De Foe had disobliged them in other things, and they were resolved to take the advantage they had, both to punish and expose him. They were no inconsiderable people who said this; and had the case come to a trial, I had provided good evidence to prove the words.

This is the christianity and justice by which I have been treated, and this in justice is the thing I complain of.

Now, as this was the plot of a few men to see if they could brand me in the world for a Jacobite, and persuade rash and ignorant people that I was turned about for the Pretender, I think they might as easily have proved me to be a Mahometan; therefore, I say, this obliges me to state the matter as it really stands, that impartial men may judge whether those books were written for or against the Pretender. And this cannot be better done than by the account of what followed after the information, which, in a few words, was this:—

Upon the several days appointed, I appeared at the Queen's Bench bar to discharge my bail; and at last had an indictment for high crimes and misdemeanors exhibited against me by her majesty's attorney-general, which, as I was informed, contained two hundred sheets of paper.

What was the substance of the indictment I shall not mention here, neither could I enter upon it, having never seen the particulars; but I was told that I should be brought to trial the very next term.

I was not ignorant that in such cases it is easy to make any book a libel, and that the jury must have found the matter of fact in the indictment, viz. that I had written such books, and then what might have followed I knew not. Wherefore, I thought it was my only way to cast myself on the clemency of her majesty, of whose goodness I had so much experience many ways; representing in my petition, that I was far from the least intention to favour the interest of the Pretender, but that the books were all written with a sincere design to promote the interest of the House of Hanover; and humbly laid before her Majesty, as I do now before the rest of the world, the books themselves to plead in my behalf; representing farther, that I was maliciously informed against by those who were willing to put a construction upon the expressions different from my true meaning; and therefore, flying to her majesty's goodness and clemency, I entreated her gracious pardon.

It was not only the native disposition of her majesty to acts of clemency and goodness that obtained me this pardon; but, as I was informed, her majesty was pleased to express it in the council, "She saw nothing but private pique in the first prosecution." And therefore I think I cannot give a better and clearer vindication of myself, than what is contained in the preamble to the pardon which her majesty was pleased to grant me; and I must be allowed to say to those who are still willing to object, that I think what satisfied her majesty might be sufficient to satisfy them; and I can assure them that this pardon was not granted without her majesty's being specially and particularly acquainted with the things alleged in the petition, the books also being looked into, to find the expressions quoted in the petition. The preamble to the patent for a pardon, as far as relates to the matters of fact, runs thus:

"Whereas, in the term of the Holy Trinity last past, our attorney-general did exhibit an information, in our Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, against Daniel De Foe, late of London, gent., for writing, printing, and publishing, and causing to be written, printed, and published, three libels, the one entitled, 'Reasons against the Succession of the House of Hanover; with an Enquiry how far the Abdication of King James, supposing it to be legal, ought to affect the person of the Pretender.' One other, entitled, 'And what if the Pretender should come? or, some Considerations of the Advantages and real Consequences of the Pretender's possessing the Crown of Great Britain.' And one other, entitled, 'An Answer to a Question that nobody thinks of, viz. What if the Queen should die?'

"And whereas the said Daniel De Foe hath by his humble petition represented to us, that he, with a sincere design to propagate the interest of the Hanover succession, and to animate the people against the designs of the Pretender, whom he always looked on as an enemy to our sacred person and government, did publish the said pamphlets: in all which books, although the titles seemed to look as if written in favour of the Pretender, and several expressions, as in all ironical writing it must be, may be wrested against the true design of the whole, and turned to a meaning quite different from the intention of the author, yet the petitioner humbly assures us, in the solemnest manner, that his true and only design in all the said books was, by an ironical discourse of recommending the Pretender, in the strongest and most forcible manner to expose his designs, and the ruinous consequences of his succeeding therein; which, as the petitioner humbly represents, will appear to our satisfaction by the books themselves, where the following expressions are very plain: viz. 'That the Pretender is recommended as a person proper to amass the English liberties into his own sovereignty; supply them with the privilege of wearing wooden shoes; easing them of the trouble of choosing parliaments; and the nobility and gentry of the hazard and expense of winter journeys, by governing them in that more righteous method, of his absolute will, and enforcing the laws by a glorious standing army; paying all the nation's debts at once by stopping the funds and shutting up the exchequer; easing and quieting their differences in religion, by bringing them to the union of popery, or leaving them at liberty to have no religion at all:" that these were some of the very expressions in the said books, which the petitioner sincerely designed to expose and oppose, and as far as in him lies, the interest of the Pretender, and with no other intention; nevertheless, the petitioner, to his great surprise, has been misrepresented, and his said books misconstrued, as if written in favour of the Pretender; and the petitioner is now under prosecution for the same; which prosecution, if further carried on, will be the utter ruin of the petitioner and his family. Wherefore, the petitioner, humbly assuring us of the innocence of his design as aforesaid, flies to our clemency, and most humbly prays our most gracious and free pardon.

"We, taking the premises and the circumstances of the petitioner into our royal consideration, are graciously pleased to extend our royal mercy to the petitioner. Our will and pleasure therefore is, that you prepare a bill for our royal signature, to pass our great seal, containing our gracious and free pardon unto him, the said Daniel De Foe, of the offences aforementioned, and of all indictments, convictions, pains, penalties, and forfeitures incurred thereby; and you are to insert therein all such apt beneficial clauses as you shall deem requisite to make this our intended pardon more full, valid, and effectual; and for so doing, this shall be your warrant. Given at our castle at Windsor, the twentieth day of November, 1713, in the twentieth year of our reign. By her majesty's command. "BOLINGBROKE."

Let any indifferent man judge whether I was not treated with particular malice in this matter; who was, notwithstanding this, reproached in the daily public prints with having written treasonable books in behalf of the Pretender; nay, and in some of those books, as before, the queen herself was reproached with having granted her pardon to an author who writ for the Pretender.

I think I might with much more justice say, I was the first man that ever was obliged to seek a pardon for writing for the Hanover succession, and the first man that these people ever sought to ruin for writing against the Pretender. For, if ever a book was sincerely designed to further and propagate the affection and zeal of the nation against the Pretender, nay, and was made use of, and that with success too, for that purpose, these books were so; and I ask no more favour of the world to determine the opinion of honest men for or against me, than what is drawn constructively from these books. Let one word, either written or spoken by me, either published or not published, be produced, that was in the least disrespectful to the protestant succession, or to any branch of the family of Hanover, or that can be judged to be favourable to the interest or person of the Pretender, and I will be willing to waive her majesty's pardon, and render myself to public justice, to be punished for it, as I should well deserve.

I freely and openly challenge the worst of my enemies to charge me with any discourse, conversation, or behaviour, in my whole life, which had the least word in it injurious to the protestant succession, unbecoming or disrespectful to any of the persons of the royal family of Hanover, or the least favourable word of the persons, the designs, or friends of the Pretender. If they can do it, let them stand forth and speak; no doubt but that they may be heard; and I, for my part, will relinquish all pleas, pardons, and defences, and cast myself into the hands of justice. Nay, to go further, I defy them to prove that I ever kept company, or had any society, friendship, or conversation, with any Jacobite. So averse have I been to the interest and the people, that I have studiously avoided their company on all occasions.

As nothing in the world has been more my aversion than the society of Jacobites, so nothing can be a greater misfortune to me than to be accused and publicly reproached with what is, of all things in the world, most abhorred by me; and that which has made it the more afflicting is, that this charge arises from those very things which I did with the sincerest design to manifest the contrary.

But such is my present fate, and I am to submit to it; which I do with meekness and calmness, as to a judgment from heaven, and am practising that duty which I have studied long ago, of forgiving my enemies, and praying for them that despitefully use me.

Having given this brief history of the pardon, &c., I hope the impartial part of the world will grant me, that being thus graciously delivered a second time from the cruelty of my implacable enemies, and the ruin of a cruel and unjust persecution, and that by the mere clemency and goodness of the queen, my obligation to her majesty's goodness was far from being made less than it was before.

I have now run through the history of my obligation to her majesty, and to the person of my benefactor aforesaid. I shall state everything that followed this with all the clearness I can, and leave myself liable to as little cavil as I may; for I see myself assaulted by a sort of people who will do me no justice. I hear a great noise made of punishing those that are guilty, but, as I said before, not one word of clearing those that are innocent; and I must say, in this part they treat me, not only as I were no Christian, but as if they themselves were not Christians. They will neither prove the charge nor hear the defence, which is the unjustest thing in the world.

I foresee what will be alleged to the clause of my obligation, &c. to great persons, and I resolve to give my adversaries all the advantage they can desire by acknowledging beforehand, that no obligation to the queen, or to any benefactor, can justify any man's acting against the interest of his country, against his principles, his conscience, and his former profession.

I think this will anticipate all that can be said upon that head, and it will then remain to tell the fact, as I am not chargeable with it; which I shall do as clearly as possible in a few words.

It is none of my work to enter into the conduct of the queen or of the ministry in this case; the question is not what they have done, but what I have done; and though I am very far from thinking of them as some other people think, yet, for the sake of the present argument,

I am to give them all up, and suppose, though not granting, that all which is suggested of them by the worst temper, the most censorious writer, the most scandalous pamphlet or lampoon should be true; and I'll go through some of the particulars, as I meet with them in public.

1st. That they made a scandalous peace, unjustly broke the alliance, betrayed the confederates, and sold us all to the French.

God forbid it should be all truth, in the manner that we see it in print; but that I say is none of my business. But what hand had I in all this? I never wrote one word for the peace before it was made, or to justify it after it was made; let them produce it if they can. Nay, in a 'Review' upon that subject while it was making, I printed it in plainer words than other men durst speak it at that time, that I did not like the peace, nor did I like any peace that was making since that of the partition, and that the protestant interest was not taken care of either in that or the treaty of Gertrudenburg before it.

It is true that I did say, that since the peace was made, and we could not help it, that it was our business and our duty to make the best of it, to make the utmost advantage of it by commerce, navigation, and all kind of improvement that we could, and this I say still; and I must think it is more our duty to do so than the exclamations against the thing itself, which it is not in our power to retrieve. This is all that the worst enemy I have can charge me with. After the peace was made, and the Dutch and the emperor stood out, I gave my opinion of what I foresaw would necessarily be the consequence of that difference, viz.—that it would inevitably involve these nations in a war with one or other of them; any one who was master of common sense in the public affairs might see that the standing out of the Dutch could have no other event. For if the confederates had conquered the French, they would certainly have fallen upon us by way of resentment, and there was no doubt but the same councils that led us to make a peace would oblige us to maintain it, by preventing too great impressions upon the French.

On the other hand, I alleged, that should the French prevail against the Dutch, unless he stopped at such limitations of conquest as the treaty obliged him to do, we must have been under the same necessity to renew the war against France; and for this reason, seeing we had made a peace, we were obliged to bring the rest of the confederates into it, and to bring the French to give them all such terms as they ought to be satisfied with.

This way of arguing was either so little understood, or so much maligned, that I suffered innumerable reproaches in print for having written for a war with the Dutch, which was neither in the expression, nor ever in my imagination; but I pass by these injuries as small and trifling compared to others I suffer under.

However, one thing I must say of the peace, let it be good or ill in itself, I cannot but think we have all reason to rejoice in behalf of his present majesty, that at his accession to the crown he found the nation in peace, and had the hands of the King of France tied up by a peace so as not to be able, without the most infamous breach of articles, to offer the least disturbance to his taking a quiet and leisurely possession, or so much as to countenance those that would.

Not but that I believe, if the war had been at the height, we should have been able to have preserved the crown for his present majesty, its only rightful lord; but I will not say it should have been so easy, so bloodless, so undisputed as now; and all the difference must be acknowledged to the peace, and this is all the good I ever yet said of it.

I come next to the general clamour of the ministry being for the Pretender. I must speak my sentiments solemnly and plainly, as I always did in that matter, viz. that if it was so, I did not see it, nor did I ever see reason to believe it; this I am sure of, that if it was so, I never took one step in that kind of service, nor did I ever hear one word spoken by any one of the ministry that I had the honour to know or converse with, that favoured the Pretender; but have had the honour to hear them all protest that there was no design to oppose the succession of Hanover in the least.

It may be objected to me, that they might be in the interest of the Pretender for all that; it is true they might, but that is nothing to me. I am not vindicating their conduct, but my own; as I never was employed in anything that way, so I do still protest I do not believe it was ever in their design, and I have many reasons to confirm my thoughts in that case, which are not material to the present case. But be that as it will, it is enough to me that I acted nothing in any such interest, neither did I ever sin against the protestant succession of Hanover in thought, word, or deed; and if the ministry did, I did not see it, or so much as suspect them of it.

It was a disaster to the ministry, to be driven to the necessity of taking that set of men by the hand, who nobody can deny, were in that interest: but as the former ministry answered, when they were charged with a design to overthrow the church, because they favoured, joined with, and were united to the dissenters; I say they answered, that they made use of the dissenters, but granted them nothing (which, by the way, was too true): so these gentlemen answer, that it is true they made use of Jacobites, but did nothing for them.

But this by the bye. Necessity is pleaded by both parties for doing things which neither side can justify. I wish both sides would for ever avoid the necessity of doing evil; for certainly it is the worst plea in the world, and generally made use of for the worst things.

I have often lamented the disaster which I saw employing Jacobites was to the late ministry, and certainly it gave the greatest handle to the enemies of the ministry to fix that universal reproach upon them of being in the interest of the Pretender. But there was no medium. The whigs refused to show them a safe retreat, or to give them the least opportunity to take any other measures, but at the risk of their own destruction; and they ventured upon that course in hopes of being able to stand alone at last without help of either the one or the other; in which, no doubt, they were mistaken.

However, in this part, as I was always assured, and have good reason still to believe, that her majesty was steady in the interest of the house of Hanover, and as nothing was ever offered to me, or required of me, to the prejudice of that interest, on what ground can I be reproached with the secret reserved designs of any, if they had such designs, as I still verily believe they had not?

I see there are some men who would fain persuade the world, that every man that was in the interest of the late ministry, or employed by the late government, or that served the late queen, was for the Pretender.

God forbid this should be true; and I think there needs very little to be said in answer to it. I can answer for myself, that it is notoriously false; and I think the easy and uninterrupted accession of his majesty to the crown contradicts it. I see no end which such a suggestion aims at, but to leave an odium upon all that had any duty or regard to her late majesty.

A subject is not always master of his sovereign's measures, nor always to examine what persons or parties the prince he serves employs, so be it that they break not in upon the constitution; that they govern according to law, and that he is employed in no illegal act, or have nothing desired of him inconsistent with the liberties and laws of his country. If this be not right, then a servant of the king's is in a worse case than a servant to any private person.

In all these things I have not erred; neither have I acted or done anything in the whole course of my life, either in the service of her majesty or of her ministry, that any one can say has the least deviation from the strictest regard to the protestant succession, and to the laws and liberties of my country.

I never saw an arbitrary action offered at, a law dispensed with, justice denied, or oppression set up either by queen or ministry, in any branch of the administration, wherein I had the least concern.

If I have sinned against the whigs, it has been all negatively, viz. that I have not joined in the loud exclamations against the queen and against the ministry, and against their measures; and if this be my crime, my plea is two-fold.

1. I did not really see cause for carrying their complaints to that violent degree.

2. Where I did see what, as before, I lamented and was sorry for, and could not join with or approve,—as joining with Jacobites, the peace, &c.,—my obligation is my plea for my silence.

I have all the good thoughts of the person, and good wishes for the prosperity of my benefactor, that charity and that gratitude can inspire me with. I ever believed him to have the true interest of the protestant religion and of his country in his view; and if it should be otherwise, I should be very sorry. And I must repeat it again, that he always left me so entirely to my own judgment, in everything I did, that he never prescribed to me what I should write, or should not write, in my life; neither did he ever concern himself to dictate to or restrain me in any kind; nor did he see any one tract that I ever wrote before it was printed: so that all the notion of my writing by his direction is as much a slander upon him as it is possible anything of that kind can be; and if I have written anything which is offensive, unjust, or untrue, I must do that justice as to declare, he has no hand in it; the crime is my own.

As the reproach of his directing me to write is a slander upon the person I am speaking of, so that of my receiving pensions and payments from him for writing, is a slander upon me; and I speak it with the greatest sincerity, seriousness, and solemnity that it is possible for a Christian man to speak, that except the appointment I mentioned before, which her majesty was pleased to make me formerly, and which I received during the time of my Lord Godolphin's ministry, I have not received of the late lord treasurer, or of any one else by his order, knowledge, or direction, one farthing, or the value of a farthing, during his whole administration; nor has all the interest I have been supposed to have in his lordship been able to procure me the arrears due to me in the time of the other ministry. So help me God.

I am under no necessity of making this declaration. The services I did, and for which her majesty was pleased to make me a small allowance, are known to the greatest men in the present administration; and some of them were then of the opinion, and I hope are so still, that I was not unworthy of her majesty's favour. The effect of those services, however small, is enjoyed by those great persons and by the whole nation to this day; and I had the honour once to be told, that they should never be forgotten. It is a misfortune that no man can avoid, to forfeit for his deference to the person and services of his queen, to whom he was inexpressibly obliged; and if I am fallen under the displeasure of the present government for anything I ever did in obedience to her majesty in the past, I may say it is my disaster; but I can never say it is my fault.

This brings me again to that other oppression which, as I said, I suffer under, and which, I think, is of a kind that no man ever suffered under so much as myself; and this is to have every libel, every pamphlet, be it ever so foolish, so malicious, so unmannerly, or so dangerous, be laid at my door, and be called publicly by my name. It has been in vain for me to struggle with this injury; it has been in vain for me to protest, to declare solemnly, nay, if I would have sworn that I had no hand in such a book or paper, never saw it, never read it, and the like, it was the same thing.

My name has been hackneyed about the street by the hawkers, and about the coffee-houses by the politicians, at such a rate as no patience could bear. One man will swear to the style; another to this or that expression; another to the way of printing; and all so positive that it is to no purpose to oppose it.

I published once, to stop this way of using me, that I would print nothing but what I set my name to, and I held it for a year or two; but it was all one; I had the same treatment. I now have resolved for some time to write nothing at all, and yet I find it the same thing; two books lately published being called mine, for no other reason that I know of than that, at the request of the printer, I revised two sheets of them at the press, and that they seemed to be written in favour of a certain person; which person, also, as I have been assured, had no hand in them, or any knowledge of them, till they were published in print.

This is a flail which I have no fence against, but to complain of the injustice of it, and that is but the shortest way to be treated with more injustice.

There is a mighty charge against me for being author and publisher of a paper called the 'Mercator.' I'll state the fact first, and then speak to the subject.

It is true, that being desired to give my opinion in the affair of the commerce with France, I did, as I often had done in print many years before, declare that it was my opinion we ought to have an open trade with France, because I did believe we might have the advantage by such a trade; and of this opinion I am still. What part I had in the 'Mercator' is well known; and could men answer with argument, and not with personal abuse, I would at any time defend every part of the 'Mercator' which was of my doing. But to say the 'Mercator' was mine, is false; I neither was the author of it, had the property of it, the printing of it, or the profit by it. I had never any payment or reward for writing any part of it, nor had I the power to put what I would into it. Yet the whole clamour fell upon me, because they knew not who else to load with it. And when they came to answer, the method was, instead of argument, to threaten and reflect upon me, reproach me with private circumstances and misfortunes, and give language which no Christian ought to give, and which no gentleman ought to take.

I thought any Englishman had the liberty to speak his opinion in such things, for this had nothing to do with the public. The press was open to me as well as to others; and how or when I lost my English liberty of speaking my mind, I know not; neither how my speaking my opinion without fee or reward, could authorise them to call me villain, rascal, traitor, and such opprobrious names.

It was ever my opinion, and is so still, that were our wool kept from France, and our manufactures spread in France upon reasonable duties, all the improvement which the French have made in the woollen manufactures would decay, and in the end be little worth; and consequently, the hurt they could do us by them would be of little moment.

It was my opinion, and is so still, that the ninth article of the treaty of commerce was calculated for the advantage of our trade, let who will make it. That is nothing to me. My reasons are because it tied up the French to open the door to our manufactures at a certain duty of importation there, and left the Parliament of Britain at liberty to shut theirs out by as high duties as they pleased here, there being no limitation upon us as to duties on French goods; but that other nations should pay the same.

While the French were thus bound, and the British free, I always thought we must be in a condition to trade to advantage, or it must be our own fault. This was my opinion, and is so still; and I would venture to maintain it against any man upon a public stage, before a jury of fifty merchants, and venture my life upon the cause, if I were assured of fair play in the dispute. But that it was my opinion that we might carry on a trade with France to our great advantage, and that we ought for that reason to trade with them, appears in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth volumes of the 'Review,' above nine years before the 'Mercator' was thought of. It was not thought criminal to say so then; how it comes to be villanous to say so now, God knows; I can give no account of it. I am still of the same opinion, and shall never be brought to say otherwise, unless I see the state of trade so altered as to alter my opinion; and if ever I do I shall be able to give good reasons for it.

The answer to these things, whether mine or no, was all pointed at me, and the arguments were generally in the terms villain, rascal, miscreant, liar, bankrupt, fellow, hireling, turncoat, &c. What the arguments were bettered by these methods I leave others to judge of. Also, most of those things in the 'Mercator,' for which I had such usage, were such as I was not the author of.

I do grant, had all the books which had been called by my name been written by me, I must of necessity have exasperated every side, and perhaps have deserved it; but I have the greatest injustice imaginable in this treatment, as I have in the perverting the design of what I have really written.

To sum up, therefore, my complaint in a few words:—

I was, from my first entering into the knowledge of public matters, and have ever been to this day, a sincere lover of the constitution of my country; zealous for liberty and the Protestant interest; but a constant follower of moderate principles, a vigorous opposer of hot measures in all parties. I never once changed my opinion, my principles, or my party; and let what will be said of changing sides, this I maintain, that I never once deviated from the revolution principles, nor from the doctrine of liberty and property on which it was founded.

I own I could never be convinced of the great danger of the Pretender in the time of the late ministry; nor can I be now convinced of the great danger of the church under this ministry. I believe the cry of the one was politically made use of then to serve other designs, and I plainly see the like use made of the other now. I spoke my mind freely then, and I have done the like now, in a small tract to that purpose not yet made public; and which if I live to publish I will publicly own, as I purpose to do everything I write, that my friends may know when I am abused, and they imposed on.

It has been the disaster of all parties in this nation to be very hot in their turn; and as often as they have been so I have differed with them, and ever must and shall do so. I'll repeat some of the occasions on the whigs' side, because from that quarter the accusation of my turning about comes.

The first time I had the misfortune to differ with my friends was about the year 1683, when the Turks were besieging Vienna, and the whigs in England, generally speaking, were for the Turks taking it; which I, having read the history of the cruelty and perfidious dealings of the Turks in their wars, and how they had rooted out the name of the Christian religion in above three-score and ten kingdoms, could by no means agree with. And though then but a young man, and a younger author, I opposed it, and wrote against it, which was taken very unkindly indeed.

The next time I differed with my friends was when King James was wheedling the dissenters to take off the penal laws and test, which I could by no means come into. And, as in the first, I used to say, I had rather the popish house of Austria should ruin the protestants in Hungaria, than the infidel house of Ottoman should ruin both protestants and papists by over-running Germany; so, in the other, I told the dissenters I had rather the Church of England should pull our clothes off by fines and forfeitures, than the papists should fall both upon the church and the dissenters, and pull our skins off by fire and faggot.

The next difference I had with good men was about the scandalous practice of occasional conformity, in which I had the misfortune to make many honest men angry, rather because I had the better of the argument, than because they disliked what I said.

And now I have lived to see the dissenters themselves very quiet, if not very well pleased with an act of parliament to prevent it. Their friends indeed laid it on; they would be friends indeed if they would talk of taking it off again.

Again, I had a breach with honest men for their maltreating King William; of which I say nothing, because I think they are now opening their eyes, and making what amends they can to his memory.

The fifth difference I had with them was about the treaty of Partition, in which many honest men are mistaken, and in which I told them plainly then that they would at last end the war upon worse terms; and so it is my opinion they would have done, though the treaty of Gertrudenburg had taken place.

The sixth time I differed with them was when the old whigs fell upon the modern whigs, and when the Duke of Marlborough and my Lord Godolphin were used by the 'Observer' in a manner worse, I must confess, for the time it lasted, than ever they were used since; nay, though it were by 'Abel' and the 'Examiner;' but the success failed. In this dispute my Lord Godolphin did me the honour to tell me, I had served him and his grace also both faithfully and successfully. But his lordship is dead, and I have now no testimony of it but what is to be found in the 'Observer,' where I am plentifully abused for being an enemy to my country, by acting in the interest of my Lord Godolphin and the Duke of Marlborough. What weather-cock can turn with such tempers as these!

I am now on the seventh breach with them, and my crime now is, that I will not believe and say the same things of the queen and the late treasurer which I could not believe before of my Lord Godolphin and the Duke of Marlborough, and which in truth I cannot believe, and therefore could not say it of either of them; and which, if I had believed, yet I ought not to have been the man that should have said it for the reasons aforesaid.

In such turns of tempers and times, a man must be tenfold a vicar of Bray, or it is impossible but he must one time or other be out with everybody. This is my present condition, and for this I am reviled with having abandoned my principles, turned Jacobite, and what not. God judge between me and these men. Would they come to any particulars with me, what real guilt I may have I would freely acknowledge; and if they would produce any evidence of the bribes, the pensions, and the rewards I have taken, I would declare honestly whether they were true or no. If they would give a list of the books which they charge me with, and the reasons why they lay them at my door, I would acknowledge my mistake, own what I have done, and let them know what I have not done. But these men neither show mercy, nor leave place for repentance; in which they act not only unlike their master, but contrary to his express commands.

It is true, good men have been used thus in former times; and all the comfort I have is, that these men have not the last judgment in their hands: if they had, dreadful would be the case of those who oppose them. But that day will show many men and things also in a different state from what they may now appear in. Some that now appear clear and fair will then be seen to be black and foul, and some that are now thought black and foul will then be approved and accepted; and thither I cheerfully appeal, concluding this part in the words of the prophet—"I heard the defaming of many; fear on every side; report, say they, and we will report it; all my familiars watched for my halting, saying, peradventure he will be enticed, and we shall prevail against him, and we shall take our revenge on him."—Jer. xx, 10.

Mr Poole's 'Annotations' has the following remarks on these lines; which, I think, are so much to that part of my case which is to follow, that I do not omit them. The words are these:—

"The prophet," says he, "here rendereth a reason why he thought of giving over his work as a prophet; his ears were continually filled with the obloquies and reproaches of such as reproached him; and besides, he was afraid on all hands, there were so many traps laid for him, so many devices devised against him. They did not only take advantage against him, but sought advantages, and invited others to raise stories of him; not only strangers, but those that he might have expected the greatest kindness from; those that pretended most courteously; 'They watch,' says he, 'for opportunities to do me justice, and lay in wait for my halting, desiring nothing more than that I might be enticed to speak, or do something which they might find matter of a colourable accusation, that so they might satisfy their malice upon me.' This hath always been the genius of wicked men. Job and David both made complaints much like this." These are Mr Poole's words.

And this leads me to several particulars, in which my case may, without any arrogance, be likened to that of the sacred prophet, excepting the vast disparity of the persons.

No sooner was the queen dead, and the king, as right required, proclaimed, but the rage of men increased upon me to that degree, that the threats and insults I received were such as I am not able to express. If I offered to say a word in favour of the present settlement, it was called fawning, and turning round again; on the other hand, though I have meddled neither one way nor the other, nor written one book since the queen's death, yet a great many things are called by my name, and I bear every day the reproaches which all the answerers of those books cast, as well upon the subjects as the authors. I have not seen or spoken to my Lord of Oxford but once since the king's landing, nor received the least message, order, or writing from his lordship, or any other way corresponded with him, yet he bears the reproach of my writing in his defence, and I the rage of men for doing it. I cannot say it is no affliction to me to be thus used, though my being entirely clear of the facts is a true support to me.

I am unconcerned at the rage and clamour of party men; but I cannot be unconcerned to hear men, who I think are good men and good Christians, prepossessed and mistaken about me. However, I cannot doubt but some time or other it will please God to open such men's eyes. A constant, steady adhering to personal virtue and to public peace, which, I thank God, I can appeal to him has always been my practice, will at last restore me to the opinion of sober and impartial men, and that is all I desire. What it will do with those who are resolutely partial and unjust, I cannot say, neither is that much my concern. But I cannot forbear giving one example of the hard treatment I receive, which has happened even while I am writing this tract. I have six children; I have educated them as well as my circumstances will permit, and so as I hope shall recommend them to better usage than their father meets with in this world.

I am not indebted one shilling in the world for any part of their education, or for anything else belonging to their bringing up; yet the author of the 'Flying Post' published lately that I never paid for the education of any of my children. If any man in Britain has a shilling to demand of me for any part of their education, or anything belonging to them, let them come for it.

But these men care not what injurious things they write, nor what they say, whether truth or not, if it may but raise a reproach on me, though it were to be my ruin. I may well appeal to the honour and justice of my worst enemies in such cases as this.

Conscia mens recti fama mendacia ridet.

CONCLUSION BY THE PUBLISHER.

WHILE this was at the press, and the copy thus far finished, the author was seized with a violent fit of an apoplexy, whereby he was disabled finishing what he designed in his further defence; and continuing now for above six weeks in a weak and languishing condition, neither able to go on or likely to recover, at least in any short time, his friends thought it not fit to delay the publication of this any longer. If he recovers he may be able to finish what he began; if not, it is the opinion of most that know him that the treatment which he here complains of, and some others that he would have spoken of, have been the apparent cause of his disaster.

CHRONOLOGICAL CATALOGUE

THE WORKS OF DANIEL DE FOE.

1. Speculum Crape-Gownorum; or, a Looking glass for the Young Academicks, new foyl'd. With Reflections on some of the late high-flown Sermons. To which is added, an Essay towards a Sermon of the newest Fashion. By a Guide to the inferiour Clergie. "Ridentem dicere verum quis vetat." London: printed for E. Rydal, 1682. 4to. pp. 34.
2. Speculum Crape-Gownorum, the second Part, or a Continuation of Observations upon the late Sermons of some that would be thought Goliaths for the Church of England. By the same Author. 4to. pp. 40. R. Baldwin, 1682.

6. A Tract upon the Dispensing Power. (The exact title not known.) 1687.
7. An Essay upon Projects. London: printed by R. R., for Thomas Cockeril, at the corner of Warwick lane, near Paternoster row. 1697. 8vo. pp. 350.
- T. Cockeril afterwards removed from the corner of Warwick lane to the Poultry, when the following title was printed, apparently as a substitute for the above:—'Several Essays relating to Academies, Banks, Bankrupts, Charity-lotteries, Courts of Engineers, Court Merchants, Friendly Societies, Highways, Pension Office, Seamen, Wagering &c. Now communicated to the world for public good. T. Cockeril, 1700.' This work came to a second edition in 1702; or rather, the bookseller placed a new title-page before the remaining copies of the same impression. It was as follows:—'Essays upon several Subjects; or, effectual Ways for advancing the Interests of the Nation; wherein are plainly laid down the means by which the subjects in general may be eased and enriched, the poor relieved, and trade increased in the most material branches of it, viz. in constituting seamen to theirs and the nation's advantage; for encouragement of merchants and merchandizing; for relief of the poor by friendly societies; for discouraging vice, and encouraging virtue; the usefulness of banks and assurances; to prevent bankrupts, with the surest way to recover bad debts; and many other considerable things profitable and conducing to the great advantage of the nation in general. London: printed and sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster. 1702.
- 8 An Enquiry into the occasional Conformity of Dissenters, in Cases of Preferment: with a Preface to the Lord Mayor, occasioned by his carrying the Sword to a Conventicle. London: printed an. dom. 1697. 4to. pp. 28.
This tract was reprinted in 1701, with a Preface to Mr How.
- 9 Some Reflections on a Pamphlet, lately published, entitled 'An Argument, showing that a Standing Army is inconsistent with a free Government, and absolutely destructive to the Constitution of the English Monarchy. London: published for E. Whitlock, near Stationers' Hall. 1697. 4to. pp. 28.
- 10 An Argument, showing that a Standing Army, with Consent of Parliament, is not inconsistent with a free Government, and absolutely destructive to the Constitution of the English Monarchy. 2 Chronic. ix. 25. London: printed for E. Whitlock, near Stationers' Hall. 1698. 4to. pp. 26.
- 11 The Character of Dr Annesley, by way of Elegy. 1697.
- 12 A new Discovery of an old Intrigue, a Satyr: levelled at Treachery and Ambition. Calculated to the Nativity of the Rapparee Plot, and the Modesty of the Jacobite Clergy: designed by way of Conviction to the CXVII Petitioners, and for the Benefit of those that study the City Mathematics. London. 1697.
- 13 The Poor Man's Plea, in relation to all the Proclamations, Declarations, Acts of Parliament, &c., which have been, or shall be made, or published, for a Reformation of Manners, and suppressing Immorality in the Nation. London: printed in the year 1698. 4to. pp. 31.
- 14 The Pacificator: a Poem. London: printed and are to be sold by J. Nutt, near Stationers' Hall. 1700. Folio.
- 15 The two Great Questions considered:—1. What the French King will do with respect to the Spanish Monarchy? 2. What Measures the English ought to take? London: printed by R. T. for R. Baldwin, at the Bedford Arms, in Warwick lane. 1700. 4to. pp. 28.
- 16 The two Great Questions further considered: with some Reply to the Remarks. Non licet hominem muliebriter rixare. London. 1700. 4to.
- 17 The Danger of the Protestant Religion from the present Prospect of a Religious War in Europe. London. 1700. 4to.
- 18 Six Distinguishing Characters of a Parliament Man. London. 1701. 4to.

- 19 The Freeholder's Plea against Stock-jobbing Elections of Parliament Men. London: printed in the year 1701. 4to. pp. 27.
- 20 The Villany of Stock-jobbers detected, and the Causes of the late Run upon the Bank and Bankers discovered and considered. London: printed in the year 1701. 4to. pp. 26.
- 21 The True Born Englishman: a Satyr. 'Statuimus pacem, et securitatem, et concordiam, judicium et justiciam, inter Anglos et Normandos, Francos, et Britones Walliæ et Cornubiæ, Pictos et Scotos Albaniam, similiter inter Francos et Insulares Provincias et Patrias quæ pertinent ad coronam nostram et inter omnes nobis subjectos, firmiter et inviolabiliter observari.' Charta Regis Wilhelmi Conquistoris de pace publicâ. Cap. I. London. 1701. 4to. pp. 60.
- 22 The Succession to the Crown of England considered. London: printed in the year 1701. 4to. pp. 38.
- 23 A Memorial from the Gentlemen Freeholders and Inhabitants of the Counties of —, in behalf of themselves and many Thousands of the good People of England. London. 1701.

This is the celebrated Legion Letter. The points of charge brought against the Commons by Legion were infused into a ballad, and publicly cried about the streets, as was Legion himself, to the great annoyance of his opponents. To turn the edge of these satires, an anonymous writer thought fit to reprint them, with a Commentary of his own, under the title of 'The Ballad; or some scurrilous Reflections, in verse, on the Proceedings of the Honourable House of Commons, answered Stanza by Stanza. With the Memorial, alias Legion, replied to, Paragraph by Paragraph. London: printed by D. Edwards. 1701.'

- 24 History of the Kentish Petition. London. 1701. 4to.
- 25 The Original Power of the Collective Body of the People of England examined and asserted. With a double Dedication to the King, and to the Parliament. London. 1701. Folio.

This tract was reprinted, in 1769, by R. Baldwin in Paternoster row, with a Dedication "To the Lord Mayor (Beckford), the Aldermen and Commons of the City of London;" and again, in 1790, by Mr J. Walker, in his Selection from the writings of De Foe.

- 26 The Present State of Jacobitism considered, in Two Queries:—1. What Measures the French King will take with respect to the Person and Title of the P. P. of Wales? 2. What the Jacobites in England ought to do on the same Account? London. 1701. 4to. pp. 22.
- 27 Reasons against a War with France; or, an Argument, showing that the French King's owning the Prince of Wales as King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, is no sufficient Ground of a War. London: printed in the year 1701. 4to. pp. 30.
- 28 A Letter to Mr How, by way of Reply to his Considerations of the Preface to an Enquiry into the occasional Conformity of Dissenters. London. 1701. 4to.
- 29 Legion's New Paper; being a second Memorial to the Gentlemen of a late House of Commons. With Legion's humble Address to his Majesty. London: printed and sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster. 1702. 4to. pp. 20.

- 30 The Mock Mourners; a Satyr, by way of Elegy on King William. By the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' London: printed in the year 1702. 4to.

Reprinted in 'Poems on Affairs of State.'

- 31 The Spanish Descent; a Poem. London. 1702. 4to.
- 32 A New Test of the Church of England's Loyalty; or, Whiggish Loyalty and Church Loyalty compared. Printed in the year 1702. 4to.

There is another tract published in 1687, under the same title of 'A New Test of the Church of England's Loyalty;' which is often confounded with our author's work.

- 33 An Enquiry into occasional Conformity, showing that the Dissenters are no ways concerned in it. London. 1702. 4to.
- 34 Reformation of Manners; a Satyr, "Væ vobis hypocritæ." Printed in the year 1702. 4to. pp. 64.
- 35 The Shortest Way with the Dissenters; or, Proposals for the Establishment of the Church. London: printed in the year 1702. 4to. pp. 29.
- 36 A Brief Explanation of a late Pamphlet, entitled 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters.' London: printed in the year 1703. 4to.
- 37 A Hymn to the Pillory. London: printed in the year 1703. 4to. pp. 24.
- 38 More Reformation, a Satyr upon Himself. By the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' London: printed in the year 1703. 4to. pp. 52.
- 39 The Shortest Way to Peace and Union. By the Author of 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters.' London: printed in the year 1703. 4to. pp. 26.
- 40 A True Collection of the Writings of the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' Corrected by Himself. London: printed and are to be sold by most Booksellers in London and Westminster. 1703. 8vo. pp. 465.

- 49 Essay upon the Regulation of the Press. London: 1704.
- 50 The Liberty of Episcopal Dissenters in Scotland truly stated. London: printed in the year 1704.
- 51 The Parallel, or Persecution of Protestants the Shortest Way to prevent the Growth of Popery in Ireland. London: 1704.
- 52 A serious Inquiry into this grand Question, whether a Law to prevent the occasional Conformity of Dissenters would not be inconsistent with the Act of Toleration, and a Breach of the Queen's Promise? London: 1704. 4to.
- 53 More Short Wars with the Dissenters. London: 1704. 4to. pp. 24.
- Advertised in the 'Review' of April 29, as "published yesterday, price 6d."
- 54 The Dissenters Misrepresented and Represented. London: 1704. 4to.
- 55 The Protestant Jesuit Unmasked; in answer to the Two Parts of Cassandra: wherein the author and his libels are laid open, with the true reason why he would have the Dissenters humbled. London: 1704.
- 56 A new Test of the Church of England's Honesty. London: 1704. 4to. pp. 24.
- 57 The Storm; or a Collection of the most remarkable Casualties and Disasters which happened in the late dreadful Tempest, both by Sea and Land. "The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet."—Nehemiah i. 3. London: printed for S. Sawbridge, in Little Britain, and sold by J. Nutt, near Stationers' Hall. 1704. 8vo. pp. 272.

Later editions of the work were sent abroad with a new title as follows: 'A Collection of the most remarkable Casualties and Disasters which happened in the late dreadful Tempest, both by Sea and Land, on Friday, November 26th, 1703. To which is added, several very surprising deliverances; the natural causes and origin of winds; of the opinion of the ancients that this island was more subject to storms than any other part of the world. With several other curious observations upon the storm. The whole divided into chapters, under proper heads. The Second Edition. London: printed for Geo. Sawbridge, at the Three Golden Fleur-de-Lis, in Little Britain, and J. Nutt, in the Savoy. Price, bound, 3s. 6d.' The matter in both editions is precisely the same.

- 58 Elegy on the Author of 'The True Born Englishman. With an Essay on the late Storm. By the Author of the 'Hymn to the Pillory.' London: 1704. 4to. pp. 56.
- 59 A Hymn to Victory. London: printed for J. Nutt, near Stationers' Hall. 1704. 4to. pp. 52.
- 60 An Inquiry into the Case of Mr Asgill's General Translation; shewing that it is not a nearer Way to Heaven than the Grave. By the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' "And for this cause God shall send them strong delusions."—2 Thess. ii. 11. London: printed and sold by J. Nutt, near Stationers' Hall. 1704. 8vo. pp. 48.
- 61 Giving Alms no Charity, and Employing the Poor, a Grievance to the Nation. Being an Essay upon this great Question, whether Workhouses, Corporations, and Houses of Correction for Employing the Poor, as now practised in England, or Parish-stocks, as proposed in a late pamphlet, entitled 'A Bill for the Better Relief, Employment, and Settlement of the Poor, &c.,' are not mischievous to the Nation; tending to the Destruction of our Trade, and to increase the Number and Misery of the Poor. Addressed to the Parliament of England. London: printed and sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster. 1704. 8vo. pp. 28.
- 62 A Review of the Affairs of France, and of all Europe, as influenced by that Nation: being Historical Observations on the Public Transactions of the World, purged from the Errors and Partiality of News-writers and petty Statesmen of all sides. With an entertaining Part in every Sheet, being Advice from the Scandal Club to the curious Enquirers; in Answer to Letters sent them for that purpose. London: printed in the year 1705. 4to. pp. 456.
- 63 The Double Welcome to the Duke of Marlborough. By the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' London: printed for Benjamin Bragge, in Ave Maria lane, Ludgate street. 1705. 4to.
- 64 Party Tyranny; or, an Occasional Bill in Miniature; as now practised in Carolina. Humbly offered to the Consideration of both Houses of Parliament. London: printed in the year 1705. 4to. pp. 30.
- 65 Advice to all Parties. By the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' London: printed and are to be sold by Benj. Bragge, at the Blue Ball, in Ave Maria lane. 1705. Price 6d. 4to. pp. 24.
- 66 Writings of the Author of 'The True Born Englishman' (a second Volume of); some whereof never before published. Corrected and enlarged by the Author. 1705. The following are the Pieces in this Volume:—
1. A New Discovery of an old Intrigue. 2. More Reformation. 3. An Elegy on the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' 4. The Storm, an Essay. 5. A Hymn to the Pillory. 6. A Hymn to Victory. 7. The Pacificator. 8. The Double Welcome to the Duke of Marlborough. 9. The Dissenter's Answer to the High Church Challenge. 10. A Challenge of Peace to the whole Nation. 11. Peace without Union. 12. More Short Ways. 13. A new Test of the Church of England's Honesty. 14. A Serious Inquiry. 15. The Dissenter Misrepresented, and Represented. 16. The Parallel. 17. Giving Alms no Charity. 18. Royal Religion.

A third Edition, or perhaps the remainder of the impressions of the first, was published in 1710, with the addition of a key to many of the names. They were sold by John Morphew, near Stationers' Hall, price 12s.

67 The Consolidator; or, Memoirs of Sundry Transactions from the World in the Moon. Translated from the Lunar language by the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' London: printed and are to be sold by Benjamin Bragge, at the Blue Ball, in Ave Maria lane. 1705. 8vo. pp. 360.

'The Consolidator' gave birth to two half-sheet Tracts: they are entitled 'A Journey to the World in the Moon,' by the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' Printed in the year 1705. 4to. And the other, 'A Second and more strange Journey to the World in the Moon; containing a comical description of that country, with the characters and humours of the inhabitants, &c.; by the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' Printed in the year 1705.' 4to. At the end of the first Tract is the following advertisement: "There is now in the press, and will speedily be published, 'A Letter from the Man in the Moon to the Author of the True Born Englishman;' containing a variety of diverting news and comical intrigues relating to the present posture of affairs in Europe." All these were piracies from the author's book, and cried about the streets at a low price, for the benefit of some needy and unprincipled printer.

68 The Experiment; or, the Shortest Way with the Dissenters Exemplified. Being the Case of Mr Abraham Gill, a Dissenting Minister of the Isle of Ely; and a full Account of his being sent for a Soldier, by Mr Fern (an ecclesiastical Justice of the Peace) and other Conspirators. To the eternal Honour of the Temper and Moderation of High Church Principles. Humbly dedicated to the Queen. London: printed and sold by B. Bragge, at the Blue Ball, in Ave Maria lane. 1705. 4to. pp. 58.

The remaining copies of this Tract were sent forth in 1707, with the following new title: 'The Modesty and Sincerity of those worthy Gentlemen, commonly called High Churchmen, Exemplified in a Modern Instance.' Most humbly dedicated to her Majesty, and her High Court of Parliament. London: printed and sold by B. Bragge, in Paternoster row. 1707.

69 The Dyet of Poland; a Satyr. Printed at Dantzick in the year 1705. 4to. pp. 60.

70 High Church Legion; or, the Memorial Examined; being a new Test of Moderation, as it is recommended to all that love the Church of England and the Constitution. London: printed in the year 1705. 4to. pp. 21.

71 A Declaration without Doors. By the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' Sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster. 1705. 4to.

72 An Answer to Lord Haversham's Speech. London. 1705. 4to.

A half sheet, reprinted from the 'Review' for the 24th of November.

73 A Reply to a Pamphlet called 'The Lord Haversham's Vindication of his Speech,' &c. By the Author of the 'Review.' London: printed in the year 1706. 4to. pp. 32.

74 A True Relation of the Apparition of one Mrs Veal, the next day after her Death, to one Mrs Bargrave at Canterbury, the 8th of September, 1705. Which Apparition recommends the perusal of Drelincourt's Book of Consolations against the Fear of Death. London. 1705. 4to.

75 A Review of the Affairs of France; with Observations on Transactions at Home. Vol. II. London: printed in the year 1705. 4to. pp. 558.

77 Remarks on the Bill to prevent Frauds committed by Bankrupts; with Observations on the Effect it may have upon Trade. London: printed in the year 1706. 4to. pp. 29.

78 A Preface to a New Edition of Delaune's Plea for the Nonconformists. London. 1706.

79 A Sermon preached by Mr Daniel De Foe, on the Fitting-up of Dr Burgess's late Meeting House. Taken from his 'Review' of Thursday, 20th of June, 1706. 4to.

80 Jure Divino; a Satyr, in 12 Books. By the Author of 'The True Born Englishman.' "O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis numina." London: printed in the year 1706. Folio. pp. 346. Preface, 28.

The 8vo. edition of the same date is spurious, and full of blunders of every description. More than a century after the appearance of De Foe's work, it was partially revived by a living political writer in a pamphlet entitled, 'The Right Divine of Kings to govern wrong. Dedicated to the Holy Alliance. By the Author of 'The Political House that Jack built.' London: printed for William Hone, 45 Ludgate street. 1821.'

81 The Advantages of the Act of Security, compared with those of the intended Union; founded on the Revolution Principles. By D. De Foe. London. 1706. 4to.

103 A Letter from Captain Tom to the Mob now Raised by Dr Sacheverell. London: J. Baker. 1710.

104 Instructions from Rome, in favour of the Pretender. Inscribed to the most elevated Don Sacheverellio, and his brother Don Higginisco; and which all Perkinites, Non-jurors, High-flyers, Popish desirers, Wooden-shoe admirers, and absolute Non-resistance drivers, are obliged to pursue and maintain, under pain of his Unholiness's Damnation, in order to carry on their intended subversion of a Government fixed upon Revolution Principles. London: J. Baker. Registered in the Stationers' Hall Book. 1710. 8vo.

105 A Review of the British Nation. Vol. VI. London: printed in the year 1710. 4to. pp. 600.

106 An Essay upon Public Credit. Being an Inquiry how the Public Credit came to depend upon the Change of the Ministry, or the Dissolutions of Parliaments; and whether it does so, or no? With an Argument proving that the public credit may be upheld and maintained in this nation, and perhaps brought to a greater height than it ever yet arrived at, though all the changes or dissolutions already made, pretended to, and now discoursed of, should come to pass in the world. London. 1710. 8vo.

107 An Essay upon Loans; or an Argument, proving that substantial Funds, settled by Parliament, with the Encouragement of Interests, and the Advances of prompt Payment usually allowed, will bring in Loans of Money to the Exchequer, in spite of all the Conspiracies of Parties to the contrary; while a just, honourable, and punctual Performance on the part of the Government supports the Credit of the Nation. By the Author of the 'Essay on Credit.' London. 1710. 8vo. pp. 27.

108 A New Test of the Sense of the Nation. Being a modest Comparison between the Addresses to the late King James and those to her present Majesty, in order to observe how far the Sense of the Nation may be judged of by either of them. London: printed in the year 1710. 8vo. pp. 91.

109 A Word against a New Election; that the People of England may see the happy Difference between English Liberty and French Slavery, and may consider well before they make the Exchange. Printed in the year 1700. 8vo. pp. 23.

110 A Review of the State of the British Nation. Vol. VII. London: printed in the year 1711. 4to. pp. 620.

- Observations. London: printed for J. Baker. 1711. 8vo. pp. 89.
- 113 An Essay at a plain Exposition of that difficult Phrase—'A Good Peace.' Printed for J. Baker. 1711. 8vo. pp. 52.
- 114 The Felonious Treaty; or, an Inquiry into the Reasons which moved his late Majesty King William, of glorious Memory, to enter into a Treaty at two several times with the King of France for the Partition of the Spanish Monarchy. With an Essay proving that it was always the Sense, both of King William and of all the Confederates, and even of the Grand Alliance itself, that the Spanish Monarchy should never be united in the Person of the Emperor. By the Author of the 'Review.' London: printed and sold by J. Baker. 1711. Price 6d. 8vo. pp. 48.
- 115 An Essay on the History of Parties and Persecution in Britain: beginning with a brief Account of the Test Act, and an Historical Inquiry into the Reasons, the Original, and the Consequences of the occasional Conformity of Dissenters; with some Remarks on the several Attempts already made and now making for an Occasional Bill; enquiring how far the same may be esteemed a Preservation to the Church, or an Injury to the Dissenters. London: printed for J. Baker. 1711. 8vo. pp. 48.
- 116 The Conduct of Parties in England, more especially of those Whigs who now appear against the new Ministry and a Treaty of Peace. Printed in the year 1712. 8vo. pp. 62.
- 117 The present State of Parties in Great Britain, particularly an Inquiry into the State of the Dissenters in England, and the Presbyterians in Scotland; their Religious and Political Interest considered, as it respects their Circumstances before and since the late Acts against Occasional Conformity in England; and for Toleration of Common Prayer in Scotland. 1712. London: printed and sold by J. Baker, in Paternoster row, Price 5s. 8vo. pp. 352.

Dodd, without Temple Bar; and J. Graves, in St James's street. 1722. 8vo. pp. 287.

This first edition of the work is amongst the scarcest of De Foe's pieces, and when brought to market bears a high price. In the subsequent editions the title is altered. The second, published by F. and J. Noble in 1754, is called 'The History of the Great Plague in London in the Year 1665;' containing Observations, &c. To which is added, 'A Journal of the Plague at Marseilles in the Year 1720.' 8vo. The latter piece forms no part of De Foe's publication.

160 Religious Courtship: being Historical Discourses on the Necessity of marrying Religious Husbands and Wives only; as also of Husbands and Wives being of the same Opinions in Religion with one another. With an Appendix, of the Necessity of taking none but Religious Servants, and a Proposal for the better managing of Servants. London: printed for E. Matthews, at the Bible, and A. Bettesworth, at the Red Lion, in Paternoster row; J. Brotherton and W. Meadows, in Cornhill. 1722. 8vo. pp. 358.

161 The Fortunate Mistress; or, A History of the Life and vast Variety of Fortunes of Mademoiselle De Belean, afterwards called the Countess De Wintelsheim, in Germany; being the Person known by the name of the Lady Roxana in the time of Charles II. London: printed for T. Warner, at the Black Boy in Paternoster row; W. Meadows, at the Angel in Cornhill; W. Pepper, at the Crown in Maiden lane, Covent garden; S. Harding, at the Post House in St Martin's lane; and T. Edlin, at the Prince's Arms against Exeter Change, in the Strand. 1724.

162 A Tour through the whole Island of Great Britain, divided into Circuits or Journies. Giving a Particular and Diverting Account of whatever is Curious and worth Observation, viz: 1. A Description of the principal Cities and Towns, their Situation, Magnitude, Government, and Commerce. 2. The Customs, Manners, Speech, as also the Exercises, Diversions, and Employment of the Poor. 3. The Produce and Improvement of the Lands, the Trade and Manufactures. 4. The Sea-ports and Fortifications, the Course of Rivers, and the Inland Navigation. 5. The public Edifices, Seats, and Palaces of the Nobility and Gentry: with useful Observations upon the whole. Particularly fitted for the reading of such as desire to travel over the Island. By a Gentleman. London: printed and sold by G. Strahan, in Cornhill; W. Mears, at the Lamb, without Temple Bar; R. Francklin, under Tom's Coffee House, Covent garden; T. Chapman, at the Angel in Pall Mall; R. Stagg, in Westminster Hall; and J. Graves, in St James's street. 1724.

All the subsequent editions vary considerably from the original. This work is frequently confounded with John Macky's 'Journey through England, in Familiar Letters from a Gentleman here to his Friend abroad.' 1722.

163 The Great Law of Subordination Considered; or, the Insolence and unsufferable Behaviour of Servants in England, duly inquired into. Illustrated with a great variety of Examples, historical Cases, and remarkable Stories of the Behaviour of some particular Servants, suited to all the several Arguments made use of as they go on. In Ten Familiar Letters; together with a Conclusion, being an earnest and moving Remonstrance to the Housekeepers and Heads of Families in Great Britain, pressing them not to cease using their utmost Interest (especially at this Juncture) to obtain sufficient Laws for the effectual Regulations of the Manners and Behaviour of their Servants. As also, a Proposal, containing such Heads, or Constitutions, as would effectually answer this great end, and bring Servants of every Class to a just, and yet not a grievous Regulation. London: sold by S. Harding, at the Post House in St Martin's lane, and other Booksellers. 1724. 8vo. pp. 302.

164 A Tour through the whole Island of Great Britain, divided into Circuits or Journies. Giving a Particular and Diverting Account of whatever is curious and worth Observation, viz: 1. A Description of the principal Cities and Towns, their Situation, Magnitude, Government, and Commerce. 2. The Customs, Manners, Speech, as also the Exercises, Diversions, and Employment of the Poor. 3. The Produce and Improvement of the Lands, the Trade and Manufactures. 4. The Sea-ports and Fortifications, the Course of Rivers, and the Inland Navigation. 5. The public Edifices, Seats, and Palaces of the Nobility and Gentry: with useful Observations upon the whole. Particularly fitted for the reading of such as desire to travel over the Island. With a Map of England and Wales by Mr Moll. Vol. 2. By a Gentleman. London: printed and sold by G. Strahan, in Cornhill; W. Mears, at the Lamb, without Temple Bar; R. Francklin, under Tom's Coffee House, Covent garden; S. Chapman and J. Jackson, in Pall Mall; R. Stagg, in Westminster Hall. 1725.

165 Everybody's Business is Nobody's Business; or, Private Abuses public Grievances. Exemplified in the Pride, Insolence, and exorbitant Wages of our Women-Servants, Footmen, &c. With a Proposal for Amendment of the same, as also, for the clearing the Streets of those Vermin called Shoe Cleaners, and substituting in their stead many Thousands of industrious Poor now ready to starve. With divers other Hints of great Use to the Public. Humbly submitted to the Consideration of our Legislature, and the careful Perusal of all Masters and Mistresses of Families. By Andrew Moreton, Esq. London: printed for W. Meadows, in Cornhill; and sold by T. Warner, Paternoster row; A. Dodd, without Temple Bar; and E. Nutt, at the Royal Exchange. 1725. 8vo. pp. 36.

This work gave rise to several curious replies. One of these is entitled 'Every Man mind his own Business; or, private Piques no public Precedents.' Being an Answer to a late scurrilous Pamphlet, entitled 'Everybody's Business Nobody's Business.' Written by an old peevish trading J—ce, whose false Reasoning is here exposed, the Cruelty of Masters and Mistresses exemplified, and the Hardships of Servants set in a clear light. In a letter to A—M—, Esq. By Catherine Comb-Brush, Lady's Woman. London: printed and sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster. 1725. 8vo. Mrs Comb-Brush, who mistakes her author for a Justice of the Peace, is very eloquent in street-abuse. She is angry that "Mr Moreton's Essay is read in every house;" and adds, "His doctrines, like weeds, spread all abroad, and every master and mistress copy this great original." Another of De Foe's antagonists published 'Servitude:' a Poem. To which is prefixed an Introduction, humbly submitted to the Considerations of all Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Ladies who keep many servants. Also, a Postscript, occasioned by a late trifling Pamphlet, entitled 'Everybody's Business Nobody's.' Written by a Footman: in behalf of good Servants, and to excite the bad to their Duty. London: printed for T. Worrall, at the Judge's Head, against St Dunstan's Church, in Fleet street. 8vo. No date. De Foe's Pamphlet was reprinted in 1767.

166 Mere Nature Delineated; or, a Body without a Soul. Being Observations upon 'The Young Forester,' lately brought to town from Germany: with suitable Applications. Also a brief Dissertation upon the Usefulness and Necessity of Fools, whether political or natural. London: printed for T. Warner, at the Black Boy, in Paternoster row. 1726. Price 1s. 6d. 8vo. pp. 123.

167 A New Voyage round the World, by a Course never sailed before. Being a Voyage undertaken by some Merchants, who afterwards proposed the setting up an East India Company in Flanders. London: printed for and sold by A. Bettsworth, at the Red Lion, in Paternoster row; and W. Mears, at the Lamb, without Temple Bar. 1725.

168 An Essay upon Literature; or, An Inquiry into the Antiquity and Origin of Letters; proving that the Two Tables, written by the finger of God in Mount Sinai, was the first writing in the world; and that all other Alphabets derive from the Hebrew. With a short View of the Methods made use of by the Ancients to supply the Want of Letters before, and impose the Use of them after they were known. London: printed for Thomas Bowles, Printseller, next to the Chapter House, St Paul's Church-yard; John Clark, Bookseller, under the Piazza, Royal Exchange; and John Bowles, Printseller, over against the Stocks Market. 1726. 8vo. pp. 127.

169 The Political History of the Devil, as well Ancient as Modern: in two Parts. Part I. Containing a state of the Devil's Circumstances, and the various turns of his Affairs, from his Expulsion out of Heaven to the Creation of Man; with Remarks on the several Mistakes concerning the Reason and Manner of his Fall. Also, his Proceedings with Mankind ever since Adam, to the first Planting of the Christian Religion in the World. Part II. Containing his more Private Conduct, down to the present Time: his Government, his Appearance, his Manner of Working, and the Tools he works with.

Bad as he is, the devil may be abused,
Be falsely charged and causelessly accused;
When men, unwilling to be blamed alone,
Shift all the crimes on him which are their own.

London: printed for T. Warner, at the Black Boy in Paternoster row. 1726. 8vo. pp. 408.

In the second edition, published in the same year, it is called simply, 'The History of the Devil,' &c. but in the subsequent editions the original title is restored. A third edition was called for in 1734; a fourth in 1739; another in 1770; and since then it has been frequently reprinted both in London and the country.

170 The History of the Principal Discoveries and Improvements in the several Arts and Sciences; particularly the great branches of Commerce, Navigation, and Plantation, in all parts of the known World. London: printed for W. Mears, at the Lamb; F. Clay, at the Bible; and D. Browne, at the Black Swan, without Temple Bar. 1727.

171 A Tour through the whole Island of Great Britain, divided into Circuits or Journies. Giving a Particular and Diverting Account of whatever is curious and worth Observation, viz: 1. A Description of the principal Cities and Towns, their Situation, Magnitude, Government, and Commerce. 2. The Customs, Manners, Speech, as also the Exercises, Diversions, and Employment of the Poor. 3. The Produce and Improvement of the Lands, the Trade and Manufactures. 4. The Sea-ports and Fortifications, the Course of Rivers, and the Inland Navigation. 5. The public Edifices, Seats, and Palaces of the Nobility and Gentry: with useful Observations upon the whole. Particularly fitted for the reading of such as desire to travel over the Island. Vol. 3. Which completes the work, and contains a Tour through Scotland, &c. With a Map of Scotland by Mr Mole. By a Gentleman. London: printed and sold by G. Strahan, in Cornhill; W. Mears, at the Lamb, without Temple Bar; and R. Stagg, in Westminster Hall. 1727.

172 A System of Magic; or, A History of the Black Art. Being an Historical Account of Mankind's most early Dealings with the Devil, and how the Acquaintance on both sides first began.

Our magic now commands the troops of hell,
The devil himself submits to charm and spell,
The conjuror in his orders and his rounds,
Just whistles up his spirits, as men do hounds;
The obsequious devil obeys the sorcerer's skill,
The mill turns round the horse, that first turns round
[the mill.]

London: printed and sold by J. Roberts, in Warwick lane. 1727. 8vo. pp. 403.

173 An Essay on the History and Reality of Apparitions. Being an Account of what they are, and are not. As also, how we may distinguish between the Apparitions of Good and Evil Spirits, and how we ought to behave to them. With a great Variety of Surprising and Diverting Examples, never published before.

By death transported to th' eternal shore,
Souls so removed revisit us no more;
Engrossed with joys of a superior kind,
They leave the trifling thoughts of life behind.

London: printed and sold by J. Roberts, in Warwick lane. 1727. 8vo. pp. 395.

This work was issued for the third time, in 1738, with the following title: 'The Secrets of the Invisible World Disclosed; or, An Universal History of Apparitions, Sacred and Profane, under all Denominations, whether Angelical, Diabolical, or Human Souls departed, showing—1. Their various Returns to this World; with some Rules to know, by their Manner of Appearing, if they are Good or Evil ones. 2. The Differences of the Apparitions of Ancient and Modern Times; and an Inquiry into the Spiritual Doctrine of Spirits. 3. The many Species of Apparitions, their real Existence and Operations by Divine Appointment. 4. The nature of seeing Ghosts before and after Death; and how we should behave towards them. 5. The Effects of Fancy, Vapours, Dreams, Hyppo, and of real and imaginary Appearances. 6. A Collection of the most Authentic Relations of Apparitions, particularly that surprising one attested by the learned Dr Scott. By Andrew Moreton, Esq. London: printed and sold by J. Roberts, in Warwick lane.' 8vo. pp. 395. It has since been reprinted in a smaller size.

174 The Protestant Monastery; or, a Complaint against the Brutality of the present Age, particularly the Pertness and Insolence of our Youth to aged Persons. With a Caution to People in Years, how they give the Staff out of their own Hands, and leave themselves at the Mercy of others; concluding with a Proposal for erecting a Protestant Monastery, where Persons of Small Fortunes may end their Days in Plenty, Ease, and Credit, without burthening their Relations, or accepting Public Charities. By Andrew Moreton, Esq., Author of 'Everybody's Business is Nobody's Business.' London: printed for W. Meadows, at the Angel, in Cornhill; and other Booksellers. 1727. 8vo. pp. 31.

175 Parochial Tyranny; or, the Housekeeper's Complaint against the insupportable Exactions and partial Assessments of Select Vestries, &c., with a plain Detection of many Abuses committed in the Distribution of Public Charities: together with a practicable Proposal for Amendment of the same, which will not only take off great part of the Parish Taxes now subsisting, but ease Parishioners from serving troublesome Offices, or paying exorbitant Fines. By Andrew Moreton, Esq. London: printed for W. Meadows, at the Angel, in Cornhill; and other Booksellers. 8vo.

176 A New Family Instructor. In Familiar Discourses between a Father and his Children, on the most Essential Points of the Christian Religion. In Two Parts. Part I. Containing a Father's Instructions to his Son upon his going to Travel into Popish Countries; and to the rest of his Children on his Son's turning Papist; confirming them in the Protestant Religion, against the Absurdities of Popery. Part II. Instructions against the Three Grand Errors of the Times; viz. 1. Asserting the Divine Authority of the Scripture against the Deists. 2. Proofs that the Messiah is already come, &c.; against the Atheists and Jews. 3. Asserting the Divinity of Jesus Christ, that He was really the same with the Messiah, and that Messiah was to be really God; against our Modern Heretics. With a Poem on the Divine Nature of Jesus Christ; in Blank Verse. By the Author of 'The Family Instructor.' London: printed for T. Warner, at the Black Boy, in Paternoster row. 1727. 8vo. pp. 384.

A second edition, with a varying title, was published, in 1732, by C. Rivington and T. Warner. It is there called 'A New Family Instructor: containing a Brief and Clear Defence of the Christian Religion in general, against the Errors of the Atheists, Jews, Deists, and Sceptics: and of the Protestant Religion in particular, against the Superstitions of the Church of Rome. In Familiar Discourses between a Father and his Children. In Two Parts, &c.

177 A Treatise concerning the Use and Abuse of the Marriage Bed; showing, 1. The Nature of Matrimony, its Sacred Original, and the true Meaning of its Institution. 2. The gross Abuse of Matrimonial Chastity, from the wrong Notions which have possessed the World, degenerating even to Whoredom. 3. The Diabolical Practice of attempting to prevent Child-bearing by Physical Preparations. 4. The fatal Consequence of clandestine or forced Marriages, through the Persuasion, Interest, or Influence of Parents and Relations, to wed the Person they have no Love for, but often an Aversion to. 5. Of unequal Matches as in the Disproportion of Age; and how such many ways occasion a Matrimonial Whoredom. 6. How married Persons may be guilty of Conjugal Lewdness, and that a Man may, in effect, make a Whore of his own Wife. Also many other Particulars of Family concern. London: printed for T. Warner, at the Black Boy, in Paternoster row. 1727. Price 5s. 8vo. pp. 406.

This work was at first called 'Conjugal Lewdness; or, Matrimonial Whoredom;' but this title being considered offensive to delicacy, the author immediately cancelled it, and substituted the above title.

178 The Complete English Tradesman: in Familiar Letters, directing him in all the several Parts and Professions of Trade; viz. 1. Of acquainting him with Business during his Apprenticeship. 2. Of Writing to Correspondents in a Trading Style. 3. Of Diligence and Application, as the Life of all Business. 4. Cautions against Over-trading. 5. Of the ordinary Occasions of a Tradesman's Ruin; such as expensive Living, too early Marrying, Innocent Diversions, too much Credit, being above Business, Dangerous Partnerships, &c. 6. Directions in several Distresses of a Tradesman, when he comes to fail. 7. Of Tradesmen compounding with other Tradesmen, and why they are so particularly severe upon one another. 8. Of Tradesmen ruining one another by Rumours and Scandal. 9. Of the customary Frauds of Trade, and particularly of Trading Lies. 10. Of Credit, and how it is only to be supported by Honesty. 11. Of Punctual Paying Bills, and thereby Maintaining Credit. 12. Of the Dignity and Honour of Trade in England, more than in other countries. To which is added, a Supplement; containing, 1. A Warning against Tradesmen's borrowing Money upon Interest. 2. A Caution against that destructive Practice of drawing and remitting, as also discounting Promissory Bills, merely for a supply of Cash. 3. Directions for the Tradesman's Accounts, with brief, but plain Examples and Specimens for Book-keeping. 4. Of Keeping a Duplicate or Pocket Ledger, in case of Fire. London: printed for C. Rivington, at the Bible and Crown, St Paul's Church-yard. 1727. 8vo. pp. 474.

179 The Complete English Tradesman, Voll II. In Two Parts. Part I. Directed chiefly to the more Experienced Tradesman; with Cautions and Advices to them after they are thriven, and supposed to be grown Rich, viz. 1. Against running out of their Business into needless Projects and dangerous Adventures, no Tradesman being above Disaster. 2. Against Oppressing one another by Engrossing, Underselling, Combinations in Trade, &c. 3. Advices, that when he leaves off Business, he should part Friends with the World; the great Advantages of it; with a Word of the scandalous Character of a Purse-proud Tradesman. 4. Against being Litigious and Vexatious, and apt to go to Law for Trifles; with some Reasons why Tradesmen's Differences should, if possible, be all ended by Arbitration. Part II. Being useful generals in Trade, describing the Principles and Foundation of the Home Trade of Great Britain; with large Tables of our Manufactures, Calculations of the Product, Shipping, Carriage of Goods by Land, Importation from Abroad, Consumption at Home, &c., by all which the infinite number of our Tradesmen are Employed, and the general Wealth of the Nation raised and increased. The whole calculated for the Use of all our Inland Tradesmen, as well in the City as in the Country. London: Charles Rivington. 1727. 8vo. pp. 474.

- 180 A Plan of the English Commerce. Being a Complete Prospect of the Trade of this Nation, as well the Home Trade as the Foreign. In Three Parts: 1. Containing a View of the present Magnitude of the English Trade as it respects the Exportation of our own Growth and Manufacture. 2. The Importation of Merchant Goods from Abroad. 3. The prodigious Consumption of both at Home. Part II. Containing an Answer to that great and important Question now depending, whether our Trade, and especially our Manufactures, are in a declining Condition, or no? Part III. Containing several Proposals, entirely new, for Extending and Improving our Trade, and Promoting the Consumption of our Manufactures in Countries wherewith we have hitherto had no Commerce. Humbly offered to the Consideration of King and Parliament. London: printed for Charles Rivington. 1728. 8vo. pp. 368.

To the second edition in 1730 were added 'An Appendix, containing a View of the Increase of Commerce, not only of England, but of all the Trading Nations of Europe since the Peace with Spain.' A third edition in 8vo. was printed by Rivington in 1737; in which it is called, by mistake, the second.

- 181 The Military Memoirs of Captain George Carleton; from the Dutch War, 1672, in which he served to the Conclusion of the Peace at Utrecht, 1713. Illustrating some of the most Remarkable Transactions both by Sea and Land during the Reigns of King Charles and King James II, hitherto unobserved by all the Writers of those Times. Together with an exact Series of the War in Spain; and a particular Description of the several Places of the Author's Residence in many Cities, Towns, and Countries; their Customs, Manners, &c. Also Observations on the Genius of the Spaniards (among whom he continued some Years a Prisoner); their Monasteries and Nunneries, especially that fine one at Montserrat; and in their Public Diversions, more particularly their famous Bull Feasts. London: printed for E. Symon, over against the Royal Exchange, Cornhill. 1728. 8vo. pp. 352.

The book was reprinted in London in 1743, and again at Edinburgh in 1808.

- 182 Augusta Triumphans; or, the Way to make London the most Flourishing City in the Universe. 1. By Establishing a University, where Gentlemen may have an Academical Education, under the eye of their Friends. 2. To prevent much, &c., by an Hospital for Foundlings. 3. By Suppressing Pretended Mad-Houses, where many of the Fair Sex are unjustly Confined, while their Husbands keep Mistresses, &c., and many Widows are locked up for the sake of their Jointures. 4. To save our Children from Destruction, by clearing the Streets of Impudent Strumpets, suppressing Gambling-Tables, and Sunday Debauches. 5. To avoid the expensive Importation of Foreign Musicians, by forming an Academy of our own. 6. To save our Lower Class of People from utter Ruin, and render them useful, by preventing the immoderate Use of Geneva; with a frank Exposure of many other common Abuses, and incontestible Rules for Amendment. Concluding with an effectual Method to prevent Street Robberies; and a Letter to Colonel Robinson, on account of the Orphan's Tax. London: printed for J. Roberts and other Booksellers. 1728. 8vo. pp. 63.

- 183 Second Thoughts are Best; or, a further Improvement of a late Scheme to prevent Street Robberies. By which our Streets will be so strongly guarded, and so gloriously illuminated, that any part of London will be as safe and pleasant at Midnight as at Noonday, and Burglary totally impracticable. With some Thoughts for suppressing Robberies in all the Public Roads of England, &c. Humbly offered for the Good of his Country, submitted to the Consideration of Parliament, and dedicated to his Sacred Majesty King George II. By Andrew Moreton, Esq. London: printed for W. Meadows, at the Angel, in Cornhill, and sold by J. Roberts, in Warwick lane. 1729. Price 6d. 8vo. pp. 24.

CHRONOLOGICAL LIST

OF

WORKS WHICH HAVE BEEN ATTRIBUTED TO DE FOE.

A Modest Inquiry into the Causes of the present Disasters in England; and who they are that brought the French Fleet into the English Channel, described. London. 1690. 4to.

This tract was probably by John Dunton, as well as a second pamphlet, with a similar title, which followed it.

2 A Voyage to the World of Cartesius. Written originally in French. Translated into English by T. Taylor, M. A., of Magdalen College, Oxford. London: printed for Thomas Bennet, at the Half Moon, in St Paul's Churchyard. 1692. 8vo. pp. 298. Second Edition, 1694.

The Paris edition of this work, whence this translation was made, appeared in 1691, and common report assigned the authorship to Father Daniel, the Jesuit. There does not seem to be any reason for ascribing the above work to any other than the person whose name it bears, and of whom an account is given in Wood Athenæ II, 1023, who mentions his 'Voyage to the World of Cartesius,' and another of his works—'A Comparison of Thucydides and Livy, 1694.' 8vo. His name is to the English translation of 'Malebranche's Search after Truth, 1694,' folio, which Dunton ascribes to Richard Sault. Mr Taylor also translated 'The History of the Jews,' in continuation of Josephus, from the French of M. Basnage, 1708, folio.

3 The Complete Mendicant; or, the Unhappy Beggar. Being the Life of an Unfortunate Gentleman, &c. London. 1699. 8vo.

4 The Free State of Noland; or the Fame and Constitution of that Happy, Noble, Powerful, and Glorious State, &c. London. 1701.

5 Dialogue between a Dissenter and the Observer. London. 1702.

6 Lex Talionis; or, the Persecution of Protestants in France. London. 1702.

These two tracts were inserted in the spurious collection of De Foe's works, but he himself expressly denies having written them.

7 Advice to the Ladies. By the Author of 'The True-Born Englishman.'

Early in the summer of 1702 a pamphlet so entitled was cried about the streets by the hawkers of news, and eagerly bought up as the work of De Foe; whose name was a passport to popularity, and a constant source of profit to persons of that description. In disavowing the performance, he speaks with becoming indignation against those who practised such a cheat upon the public, and complains that his name was hawked about the street in every ballad; but to publish this abuse to the world as often as it occurred, he tells us, would be to banter himself, and impose upon his friends; "since the similitude between the brats and the fathers will, generally speaking, clear him of the scandal." But, that his friends may be imposed upon as little as possible, he assures them—"That he writes nothing but what he publicly owns, shows his face to, and professes to be his." He says he had never written anything for the hawkers; but whatever of his real works had been cried in the streets was pirated by worthless printers, a sort of pick-pockets, who get money just about as honestly as others do on the highway, and then justify it by law."

8 The Comical History of the Life and Death of Mumper, Generalissimo of King Charles the Second's Dogs. By Heliostrapolis, Secretary to the Emperor of the Moon. London: printed in the year 1704. 8vo.

9 Dictionarium Sacrum seu Religiosum. A Dictionary of all Religions, Ancient and Modern; whether Jewish, Pagan, Christian, or Mahometan. More particularly comprehending—1. The Lives and Doctrines of the Authors and Propagators. 2. The respective Divisions, Sects, and Heresies. 3. Not only the True, but False Objects of Worship, such as Heathen Gods, Tools, &c. 4. The various Ways and Places of Adoration. 5. All Religious Orders and Communities. 6. Sacred Rites, Utensils, and Festivals. 7. Distinct Offices and Functions. 8. Rules, Customs, Ceremonies, &c. London: printed for James Knapton, at the Crown, in St Paul's Churchyard. 1704. 8vo.

This was the first attempt to embody a history of religious opinions in the form of a dictionary. For associating the name of De Foe with this work, there is no other evidence than public report and booksellers' catalogues—both very doubtful authorities.

10 Historical Account of the Principles of the Highflyers. London. 1703.

11 A True State of the Difference between Sir George Rooke, Knt., and William Colepeper, Esq.; together with an Account of the Trial between Mr Nathaniel Denew, Mr Robert Britton, and Mr Merriam, before the Right Honourable Sir John Holt, Knt., Lord Chief Justice of England, on an Indictment for the Designs and Attempts therein mentioned, against the Life of the said William Colepeper, on behalf of the said Sir George Rooke. Sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster. 1704.

This work is ascribed to De Foe by Leslie, in his Rehearsals, but without any apparent reason. It is probable that Mr Colepeper himself was the author.

12 The Lay-Man's Sermon upon the late Storm; held forth at an honest Coffee House Conventicle. Not so much a Jest as it is thought to be. 4to. 1704.

13 Coffee House Preachers; or, High Church Divinity Corrected, &c. By William Smithies, junior. London. 1706.

There is no reason to suppose but that this work, though certainly in the manner of De Foe, was written by the person whose name is attached to it.

14 The Fifteen Comforts of a Scotchman. Written by Daniel De Foe, in Scotland. London: printed in the year 1707. 8vo. pp. 8.

The object of it is to point out the advantages which Scotland would reap from the Union. These are displayed in the true doggrel style, inferior to the worst of De Foe's performances, and it is highly improbable that he had any hand whatever in it. The hawkers, who gained a livelihood by vending such trash, found their account in having the name of a writer who commanded a ready sale for their goods.

- 15 A Discourse concerning Trouble of Mind, arising from sundry Temptations. Exemplified in the Remarkable Life of a Private Gentleman; with Reflections thereon. In Three Parts. Intended to awaken the Presumptuous, convince the Sceptick, and encourage the Despondent. Left under his own Hand, to be communicated to the Publick after his Decease. London: 1708.

A second edition of the work was published, three years afterwards, with the following title, by which it is now generally known: 'An Account of some Remarkable Passages in the Life of a Private Gentleman; with Reflections thereon.' In Three Parts, &c. Whether De Foe had any share whatever in handing these papers to the world, may be questioned very much. There is nothing but common report to warrant the supposition, for there is no internal evidence of it. A copy of the work, in the possession of Mr Wilson, ascribes it to a Dr Woodcock. The late Dr Hamilton announced it to be the experience of Sir William Hamilton, Physician to Queen Anne.

- 16 Vox Dei, Vox Populi. Being True Maxims of Government, &c. London: 1709.

A second edition was published in the early part of the next year, under the title of 'The Judgment of Whole Kingdoms and Nations,' &c., by which it is now generally known. The authorship of this excellent work has been sometimes assigned to De Foe; it is doubtful, but is now generally given to Lord Somers.

- 17 The High Church Address to Dr Henry Sacheverell, for the Great Service he has done the Established Church and Nation. Wherein is shown the Justice of the Proceedings of those Gentlemen who have encouraged the pulling down and destroying those Nurseries of Schism, the Presbyterian Meeting Houses. Submitted to the Consideration of all good Churchmen and Dissenters. London: J. Baker. 1710. Price One Penny.

This work has been given to De Foe, but he expressly denies having written any penny pamphlets.

- 18 Mars stripped of his Armour: or, the Army displayed in all its true Colours. Containing the Character of the Army in general, and the various Descriptions of Persons of which it is composed. By the Author of the 'Wooden World Dissected.' London: 1709. 8vo.

This work is ascribed to De Foe by a late writer of his life, who speaks of it as the best of his satirical performances. But whatever merit may be assigned to it, Ned Ward has the best claim to both works.

- 19 Memoirs of the Life and Adventures of Signor Rozelli, at the Hague. Giving a particular Account of his Birth, Education, Slavery, Monastic State, Imprisonment in the Inquisition at Rome, and the different Figures he has since made, as well in Italy as in France and Holland. Done into English from the second edition of the French. London. 1709.

Rozelli was a famous gout doctor of his time, and is alluded to as such in the 'Tatler.' A second volume was added many years afterwards, under the following title: 'A Continuation of the Life and Adventures of Signor Rozelli, late of the Hague.' A fourth edition of the whole work was published by J. Osborn, in 2 vols. 12mo. 1740.* A cursory glance at these volumes will sufficiently satisfy the reader that they could not have proceeded from the pen of De Foe.

- 20 Faults on both Sides. An Essay upon the original Cause, Progress, and mischievous Consequences of the Factions in the Nation, &c. London: 1710.

This work, which was in answer to Hoodley's 'Thoughts of an Honest Tory,' and in defence of the new ministers, obtained great popularity at the time, and has been ascribed both to Harley and to De Foe; but probably without any just reason in either case.

- 21 Reasons against receiving the Pretender. Together with some Enquiries of the highest Importance to Great Britain. London: 1710.

There seems to be no good reason for ascribing this work to De Foe.

- 22 Character of a Modern Addresser. London. 1710.

A half-sheet, quarto. Advertised in the 'Review,' May 1. Mr Chalmers has inserted it in the List of De Foe's supposed writings. It was reprinted in a small collection of poems, called 'Whig and Tory, or Wit on Both Sides,' 1713, and is rather a satire upon De Foe and his politics; so that unless there were two works at the time with the same title, which is not likely, De Foe can have no claim to it.

Humbly offered to the good People of Grandinsula, who have not yet done wondering why that Princess would change so notable a Ministry. Printed in the year 1710.

De Foe has been made responsible for this publication, but certainly without any just reason.

- 24 The History of Addresses.

This work, so generally attributed to De Foe, of which the first volume appeared in a former year, and the second in 1711, was the work of Oldmixon, who expressly claims it in his 'Memoirs of the Press.'

- 25 Hannibal at our Gates, or the Progress of Jacobitism in the present Danger of the Pretender. J. Baker. 1712.

There does not appear any reason for giving this work to our author.

- 26 A Letter from a Member of the House of Commons to his Friend in the Country, relating to the Bill of Commerce. London. 1713.

The only authority for ascribing this tract to De Foe is that of Oldmixon, who, in reference to our author, is never to be relied upon.

Fisheries of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, to Great Britain, by the Treaty of Peace and Commerce, lately concluded at Utrecht.

The first number appeared upon the 26th of May, 1713, and it continued to be published three times a week, upon Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays. "This paper," says Boyer, "upon its first appearance abroad, was generally fathered upon the chief manager of the Treaty of Commerce, Arthur Moore, supposed to be assisted by the genius of Dr Davenant; but the latter solemnly disowned his having any share in it: and, indeed, it was soon after discovered to be the production of an ambidextrous, mercenary scribbler, Daniel De Foe, employed by the Earl of Oxford, who for this dirty work allowed him a considerable weekly salary, and who laid out all his skill in puzzling the argument by his verbose sophistry*; "all of which is equally false and scurrilous. Boyer's account, however, has been copied by Oldmixon, with increased virulence. This writer observes, "Foe, as well as the Lord-Treasurer, had been a rank Presbyterian, and their genius was so near akin, that Harley could not but take him into his confidence as soon as he got acquainted with him. He was adored and caressed by that mighty statesman, who gave him, as that mercenary said himself, to the value of one thousand pounds in one year. Foe's business," continues Oldmixon, "was only to puzzle the cause by mercantile cant and bold sophistry, which several eminent merchants and others being apprised thereof, they desired Mr Henry Martin, bailiff of Southwark, an ingenious, judicious man, to publish a paper called 'The British Merchant,' which came out twice a week, wherein, with plain reason and uncontested matters of fact, he exposed the fallacies, blunders, inconsistencies, and ignorance of the hireling 'Mercator,' insomuch that at length the thoughts of true Englishmen about commerce, which at first was represented to be the effects of discontent and faction, as was hinted in the Queen's speech, appeared to be the universal sense of all traders."†

Tindal, following the writers above-mentioned, names De Foe at once as the author of 'Mercator.' He says, "The treaty was to be supported at any rate; the persons concerned in making it either could not or would not see their mistake; and the nation was to be convinced that, through their great skill in trade, they had made an excellent treaty of commerce. To these ends, Daniel De Foe was employed; though in a weekly paper, published some years before, called the 'Review,' he had very often condemned the French trade, as detrimental to this kingdom. He undertook, however, the cause now, and published a paper thrice a week, by the title of 'Mercator,' &c. In this paper he undertook to prove that the trade to France, though contrary to all experience, had always been beneficial to this kingdom, and would be so again, upon the foot of the treaty. And, as he had the art of writing very plausibly, and those who employed him and furnished him with materials had the command of all public papers in the Custom-house, he had it in his power to do a great deal of mischief, especially among such as were unskilled in trade, and at the same time very fond of French wines, which it was then a crime to be against.‡

Of the 'British Merchant,' set on foot in opposition to 'Mercator,' Tindal has given the following account: "Several ingenious merchants of long experience, and well skilled in trade, joined together to contradict the impositions of this writer. They knew he had many heads, besides the advantage of public papers to help him, and therefore thought the publication of a joint weekly paper the most feasible way to confute him, and set our trade in a clear light, because they were sensible that it was impossible for any man to be master of so much experience as was required to furnish materials from so many different branches of our trade as would be touched upon in this debate. The paper they published was, in opposition to Daniel De Foe's title, called 'The British Merchant; or Commerce Preserved,' and was published twice a week. The person to whom the public was chiefly obliged for this paper, and who had the greatest hand in it, was Henry Martin, who was afterwards made Inspector-General of the Exports and Imports. He was assisted by Sir Charles Cooke, merchant, afterwards made Commissioner of Trade; Sir Theodore Jansen, Bart., James Milner, Theodore Torriano, Joshua Gee, Christopher Haynes, David Martin, merchants; and Charles King, who afterwards collected and reprinted those papers. Lord Halifax and General Stanhope had likewise a considerable share in the management of this paper, which had so great an effect, that the thoughts of the Whigs about commerce, which at first were represented as the result of discontent and spirit of party, appeared to be the universal sense of all traders."§

Mr Chalmers, whose judgment will be most approved, gives the true history and character of these papers. "The first 'Mercator,'" says he, "was published on the 26th of May, 1713, the last on the 20th of July, 1714; and they were written by William Brown and his assistants, with great knowledge, great strength, and great sweetness, considering how much party then embittered every composition. The 'British Merchant,' which opposed the 'Mercator,' and which was compiled by Henry Martin and his associates, has fewer facts, less argument, and more factiousness. It began on the 1st of August, 1713, and ended the 27th of July, 1714. I have spoken of both from my own convictions, without regarding the declamations which have continued to pervert the public opinion from that epoch to the present times. De Foe was struck at in the third number of the 'British Merchant,' and plainly mentioned in the fourth. "Mr Daniel De Foe may change his name from 'Review' to 'Mercator,' from 'Mercator' to any other title, yet still his singular genius shall be distinguished by his inimitable way of writing." This personal sarcasm was introduced to supply deficiency of facts, or weakness of reasoning. When Charles King re-published the 'British Merchant' in volumes, among various changes he expunged, with other personalities, the name of De Foe.¶ He, however, persisted in attributing 'Mercator' "to a hireling writer of a weekly paper called the 'Review;' and Anderson, copying from him, goes still further in his 'Chronology of Commerce,' and makes De Foe the "hireling writer" of 'Mercator,' and other papers, in favour of the French treaty of trade. But, as Mr Chalmers observes, "we can now judge with the impartiality of arbitrators. On the one hand, there are the living challenge and the death-bed declaration of De Foe; on the other, the mere surmise and unauthorised assertion of King, Anderson, and others, who detract from their own veracity by their own factiousness or foolery. It is surely time to free ourselves from prejudices of every kind, and to disregard the sound of names as much as the falsehoods of party."¶

This work has been attributed to De Foe, but Mr Chalmers is decidedly of opinion that it is not his. Boyer insults our author for it in his 'Political State,' and says that all the arguments against the bill were fully confuted "by the ingenious and judicious Joseph Addison, Esq." Upon this important subject many persons, equally judicious, have thought differently.

Boyer, in his 'Political State,' ascribes this work also to De Foe, and as such it was replied to by Toland, the author of 'The State Anatomy,' in a second part of that work, in which he frequently points to De Foe by name, and handles him with great severity as his supposed antagonist; but in this he was mistaken, as is fully apparent from the rejoinder of his former adversary, who published 'A Further Argument against Ennobling Foreigners,' in which the writer acquaints Toland, that in seeking for an author to fight with, he had dressed up a man of straw; and "finding it greatly to his purpose, that De Foe, author of 'The True-Born Englishman,' should pass for the author of the 'Argument against Ennobling Foreigners,' he has singled him out, and fallen upon him in a most merciless manner. He has recommended him to the revenge of his foreigners, and to the resentment of the government. He has exposed, ridiculed, bantered, and in a word, as far as in him lies, murdered the man; and yet all this while, this man, as I find, was no more author of this book than the man in the moon. Nay, as I hear, for I have no knowledge of the man, he has been sick in his bed all the while. In carrying on this tragi-comedy, he takes care to summon for evidence all that this De Foe has said upon the same subject, in his pamphlets and poems formerly written, and to confront this with what I have said now. Mr Toland hath taken a wrong aim, and charged a man falsely with writing a book who really has no concern in it, or about it." In another place the writer says, "If Mr Baker, the publisher, were not just at the point of death, while this is at the press, a particular account of that part would be given; but it is none of my business to vindicate De Foe, however injuriously he may be treated." Toland had charged De Foe with being a writer in Mercurius Politicus, but without any real foundation.

This account of the behaviour of the rebel prisoners during their confinement appears to have been written by one of their own class, who was chamber-fellow with young Bottair in Newgate; so that De Foe can have no pretensions to the authorship.

41 Minutes of the Negotiations of Monsieur Mesnager, at the Court of England, towards the Close of the last Reign, &c. Written by himself, and done out of French. London. 1717.

A second edition of this work, printed for J. Roberts, was published in 1736. There is nothing but traditional authority for ascribing this work to De Foe, and its internal character affords just reason for believing that it has no solid foundation. Although pretending to be a translation from the French, it was composed in England, but not by the French agent named in the title. It contains a curious narrative of the secret intrigues that brought about the peace of Utrecht, bearing upon the face of it every mark of authenticity; and as such it has been appealed to by most of our historians. Savage, in his satire 'On False Historians,' speaks of it as "a book calculated to vilify the administration in the four last years of Queen Anne's reign;" and pronounces it a forgery.

"Some usurp names—an English garreteer
From minutes forged, is Monsieur Mesnager."

Oldmixon, in his reply to Bishop Atterbury, p. 7, expressly says that Mesnager's negotiation was written by De Foe, and that he composed it, "by direction or encouragement of the quondam treasurer, Harley, who could not but be well acquainted with the subject described." This writer, however, is so often mistaken in his representations of things, that no great reliance is to be placed on his testimony. Boyer's Political State, Vol. XIII, June 1717, p. 631, contains the following passage:—"As for the forger of Monsieur Mesnager's minutes, whom I have promised to point out, I shall acquaint my readers, that in the general opinion, to which I easily subscribe, he is the same I had not long ago (see Political State for February, 1716, and 1717, p. 123) occasion to describe as a scribbler (Trium Literatum) famous for writing upon, for, and against all manner of persons, subjects, and parties, a description which perfectly answers his character. This man has formerly put his name to some of his low productions; but having been stigmatised by an ignominious punishment, he has since concealed it with all possible industry, and at the same time prostituted his pen to the vilest purposes. He was thought a fit tool for the designs in hand by those who had the administration of affairs during the four last years of the last reign; who, among other dirty work, put him upon writing a weekly paper, called 'Mercator,' calculated to procure an easy passage to a bill, by which a great branch of the trade of Great Britain was to have been given up. The beneficence of his masters, and in particular of the E— of O—, enabled him to repair and beautify his habitation at Newington, where he had set up his forge of politics and scandal, from which, for these six years past, he supplies monthly, often weekly, the publishers in and about Paternoster row. To this famous writer we are, among other learned lucubrations, indebted for—1. The Secret History of the White Staff, in three parts. 2. A Secret History of One Year. 3. Advice to the People of Great Britain, with respect to two important Questions—I. What they ought to expect from the King. II. How they ought to behave to him. 4. An Argument against Employing and Ennobling Foreigners. 12. An Account of the Conduct of Lord Viscount Townsend. 13. Mercurius Politicus; or, Monthly Scandal upon the present Government. 14; and lastly, Minutes of the Negotiations of Monsieur Mesnager. That this last doughty piece came from the same forge with the rest, will immediately appear to any one who shall take the pains to consider the loose style and long-winded spinning way of writing, which is the same in all the productions of this celebrated author," &c.

In the following month (July 1717) of 'Boyer's Political State,' at the end is the following passage:—"I shall conclude with acquainting my readers, that whereas, in the last journal for the month of June, 1717, page 631, I had said, that in the general opinion, to which I easily subscribed, the forger of Monsieur Mesnager's minutes was a person I had not long before occasion to describe as a scribbler, Trium Literatum, &c. One De Foe thinking himself the person meant by me, has lately in print denied himself to be the author of the said forgery, which, therefore, must look out for a father. This is all the answer I shall return to the scurrilities plentifully bestowed on me, upon that idle pretence in a long advertisement lately published; for I shall never descend so low as to enter the Billingsgate lists either with branded De Foe, or any other scribbler of that stamp."

Great political warmth of feeling seems to have existed between Boyer and De Foe, which, to the credit of the former, subsided by the following printed account of the death of the latter in the 'Political State' for April, 1731: "About the end of this month died Mr Daniel De Foe, sen., a person well known for his numerous and various writings; by some of which it appears that he had a good natural genius, and he was generally looked on as a man who thoroughly understood the theory of trade, and the true interest of this nation; but he never had the good fortune to be much taken notice of by any minister of state, so that he got but little by his knowledge."

PREFACE.

PREFACES are so customary before books of this nature, to introduce them into the world by a display of their excellences, that it might be thought too presuming to send this performance abroad without some such preliminary. And yet I may venture to say it needs this good office as little as any that has ever gone before it. The pleasant and delightful part speaks for itself; the useful and instructive is so large, and has such a tendency to improve the mind and rectify the manners, that it would employ a volume large as itself to particularize the instructions that may be drawn from it.

Here is room for just and copious observations on the blessings and advantages of a sober and well-governed education, and the ruin of so many thousands of all ranks in this nation for want of it; here, also, we may see how much public schools and charities might be improved, to prevent the destruction of so many unhappy children, as, in this town, are every year bred up for the executioner.

The miserable condition of multitudes of youth, many of whose natural tempers are docible, and would lead them to learn the best things rather than the worst, is truly deplorable, and is abundantly seen in the history of this man's childhood; where, though circumstances formed him by necessity to be a thief, surprising rectitude of principles remained with him, and made him early abhor the worst part of his trade, and at length to forsake the whole of it. Had he come into the world with the advantage of a virtuous education, and been instructed how to improve the generous principles he had in him, what a figure might he not have made, either as a man or a Christian.

The various turns of his fortune, in different scenes of life, make a delightful field for the reader to wander in; a garden where he may gather wholesome and medicinal fruits, none noxious or poisonous; where he will see virtue and the ways of wisdom everywhere applauded, honoured, encouraged, and rewarded; vice and extravagance attended with sorrow, and every kind of infelicity; and at last, sin and shame going together, the offender meeting with reproach and contempt, and the crimes with detestation and punishment.

PREFACE.

Every vicious reader will here be encouraged to a change, and it will appear that the best and only good end of an impious, misspent life is repentance; that in this there is comfort, peace, and oftentimes hope that the penitent shall be received like the prodigal, and his latter end be better than his beginning.

A book founded on so useful a plan, calculated to answer such valuable purposes as have been specified, can require no apology; nor is it of any concern to the reader whether it be an exact historical relation of real facts, or whether the hero of it intended to present us, at least in part, with a moral romance. On either supposition, it is equally serviceable for the discouragement of vice and the recommendation of virtue.

DANIEL DE FOE.

THE LIFE OF COLONEL JACK.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.—I AM DESERTED BY MY PARENTS ALMOST AS SOON AS BORN.—NICKNAMED BY MY NURSE, COLONEL JACK.—CHARACTERS OF THE THREE JACKS—COLONEL JACK, CAPTAIN JACK, AND MAJOR JACK.—NURSE DIES, AND WE ARE TURNED LOOSE UPON THE WORLD.—CAPTAIN JACK FLOGGED FOR ROGUERY.—WE PICK POCKETS.

SEEING my life has been such a chequer work of nature, and that I am able now to look back upon it from a safer distance than is ordinarily the fate of the clan to which I once belonged, I think my history may find a place in the world, as well as some, which I see are every day read with pleasure, though they have in them nothing so diverting, or instructing, as I believe mine will appear to be.

My original may be as high as anybody's for aught I know, for my mother kept very good company, but that part belongs to her story more than to mine; all I know of it is by oral tradition. My nurse told me my mother was a gentlewoman, that my father was a man of quality, and she (my nurse) had a good piece of money given her to take me off his hands, and deliver him and my mother from the importunities that usually attend the misfortune of having a child to keep, that should not be seen or heard of.

My father, it seems, gave my nurse something more than was agreed for, at my mother's request, upon her solemn promise that she would use me well, and let me be put to school; and charged her, that if I lived to come to any bigness, capable to understand the meaning of it, she should always take care to bid me remember that I was a gentleman; and this, he said, was all the education he would desire of her for me; for he did not doubt, he said, but that some time or other, the very hint would inspire me with thoughts suitable to my birth, and that I would certainly act like a gentleman, if I believed myself to be so.

But my disasters were not directed to an end as soon as they began. It is very seldom that the unfortunate are so but for a day; as the great rise by degrees of greatness to the pitch of glory in which they shine, so the miserable sink to the depth of their misery by a continued series of disaster, and are long in the tortures and agonies of their distressed circumstances, before a turn of fortune, if ever such a thing happens to them, gives them a prospect of deliverance.

My nurse was as honest to the engagement she had entered into as could be expected from one of her employment, and particularly as honest as her circumstances would give her leave to be; for she bred me up very carefully with her own son, and with another son of shame like me, who she had taken upon the same terms.

My name was John, as she told me, but neither she or I knew anything of a surname that belonged to me; so I was left to call myself Mr Anything, what I pleased, as fortune and better circumstances should give occasion.

It happened that her own son (for she had a little boy of her own, about one year older than I) was called John too; and about two years after she took another son of shame, as I called it above, to keep as she did me, and his name was John too.

As we were all Johns, we were all Jacks, and soon came to be called so; for at that part of the town where we had our breeding, viz. near Goodman's fields, the Johns are generally called Jack; but my nurse, who may be allowed to distinguish her own son a little from the rest, would have him called captain, because, forsooth, he was the eldest.

I was provoked at having this boy called captain, and I cried, and told my nurse I would be called captain; for she told me I was a gentleman, and I would be a captain, that I would; the good woman, to keep the peace, told me, ay, ay, I was a gentleman, and therefore I should be above a captain, for I should be a colonel, and that was a great deal better than a captain; for, my dear, says she, every tarpawlin, if he gets but to be lieutenant of a press smack, is called captain, but colonels are soldiers, and none but gentlemen are ever made colonels; besides, says she, I have known colonels come to be lords and generals, though they were bastards at first, and therefore you shall be called colonel.

Well, I was hushed indeed with this for the present, but not thoroughly pleased, till a little while after I heard her tell her own boy that I was a gentleman, and therefore he must call me colonel; at which her boy fell a crying, and he would be called colonel. That part pleased me to the life, that he should cry to be called colonel, for then I was satisfied that it was above a captain; so universally is ambition seated in the minds of men, that not a beggar-boy but has his share of it.

So here was Colonel Jack and Captain Jack: as for the third boy, he was only plain Jack for some years after, till he came to preferment by the merit of his birth, as you shall hear in its place.

We were hopeful boys all three of us, and promised very early, by many repeated circumstances of our lives, that we would all be rogues; and yet I cannot say, if what I have heard of my nurse's character be true, but the honest woman did what she could to prevent it.

Before I tell you much more of our story, it would be very proper to give you something of our several characters, as I have gathered them up in my memory as far back as I can recover things, either of myself, or my brother Jacks, and they shall be brief and impartial.

Captain Jack was the eldest of us all, by a whole year. He was a squat, big, strong-made boy, and promised to be stout when grown up to be a man, but not to be tall. His temper was sly, sullen, reserved, malicious, revengeful; and withal, he was brutish, bloody, and cruel in his disposition; he was as to manners a mere boor, or clown, of a carman-like breed: sharp as a street-bred boy must be, but ignorant and unteachable from a child. He had much the nature of a bull dog, bold and desperate, but not generous at all; all the schoolmistresses we went to could never make him learn, no, not so much as to make him know his letters; and, as if he was born a thief, he would steal everything that came near him, even as soon almost as he could speak; and that, not from his mother only, but from anybody else, and from us too that were his brethren and companions. He was an original rogue, for he would do the foulest and most villanous things, even by his own inclination; he had no taste or sense of being honest, no, not, I say, to his brother rogues, which is what other thieves make a point of honour of; I mean that of being honest to one another.

The other, that is to say the youngest of us Johns, was called Major Jack, by the accident following; the lady that had deposited him with our nurse had owned to her that it was a major of the guards that was the father of the child; but that she was obliged to conceal his name, and that was enough. So he was at first called John the Major, and afterwards the Major, and at last, when we came to rove together, Major Jack, according to the rest, for his name was John, as I have observed already.

Major Jack was a merry, facetious, pleasant boy, had a good share of wit, especially off-hand wit, as they call it; was full of jests and good humour, and, as I often said, had something of a gentleman in him. He had a true manly courage, feared nothing, and could look death in the face without any hesitation; and yet, if he had the advantage, was the most generous and most compassionate creature alive. He had native principles of gallantry in him, without anything of the brutal or terrible part that the captain had; and in a word, he wanted nothing but honesty to have made him an excellent man. He had learned to read, as I had done; and as he talked very well, so he wrote good sense, and very handsome language, as you will see in the process of his story.

As for your humble servant, Colonel Jack, he was a poor unhappy tractable dog, willing enough, and capable too, to learn anything, if he had had any but the devil for his schoolmaster; he set out into the world so early, that when he began to do evil, he understood nothing of the wickedness of it, nor what he had to expect for it. I remember very well that when I was once carried before a justice for a theft which indeed I was not guilty of, and defended myself by argument, proving the mistakes of my accusers, and how they contradicted themselves, the justice told me it was a pity I had not been better employed, for I was certainly better taught; in which, however, his worship was mistaken, for I had never been taught anything but to be a thief; except, as I said, to read and write, and that was all, before I was ten years old; but I had a natural talent of talking, and could say as much to the purpose as most people that had been taught much more than I.

I passed among my comrades for a bold, resolute boy, and one that durst fight anything; but I had a different opinion of myself, and therefore shunned fighting as much as I could, though sometimes I ventured, too, and came off well, being very strong made, and nimble withal. However, I many times brought myself off with my tongue, where my hands would not be sufficient; and this, as well after I was a man as while I was a boy.

I was wary and dexterous at my trade, and was not so often caught as my fellow rogues, I mean while I was a boy, and never, after I came to be a man, no, not once for twenty-six years, being so old in the trade, and still unchanged, as you shall hear.

As for my person, while I was a dirty glass-bottle-house boy, sleeping in the ashes, and dealing always in the street dirt, it cannot be expected but that I looked like what I was, and so we did all; that is to say, like a black your shoes your honour, a beggar boy, a blackguard boy, or what you please, despicable, and miserable to the last degree; and yet I remember, the people would say of me that boy has a good face, if he was washed and well dressed he would be a good, pretty boy; do but look what eyes he has, what a pleasant smiling countenance; it is a pity! I wonder what the rogue's father and mother were? and the like; then they would call me and ask me my name, and I would tell them my name was Jack. But what's your sirname, sirrah? says they; I don't know, says I. Who is your father and mother? I have none, said I. What, and never had you any? said they; No, says I, not that I know of. Then they would shake their heads, and cry—Poor boy! and 'tis a pity, and the like; and so let me go. But I laid up all these things in my heart.

I was almost ten years old, the captain eleven, and the major about eight, when the good woman, my nurse, died. Her husband was a seaman, and had been drowned a little before in the Gloucester frigate, one of the king's ships which was cast away going to Scotland with the Duke of York, in the time of King Charles II; and the honest woman dying very poor, the parish was obliged to bury her; when the three young Jacks attended her corpse, and I, the colonel (for we all passed for her own children) was chief mourner, the captain, who was the eldest son, going back very sick.

The good woman being dead, we, the three Jacks, were turned loose to the world. As to the parish providing for us, we did not trouble ourselves much about that; we rambled about all three together, and the people in Rosemary lane and Ratcliff, and that way, knowing us pretty well, we got victuals easily enough, and without much begging.

For my particular part, I got some reputation for a mighty civil, honest boy; for if I was sent of an errand I always did it punctually and carefully, and made haste back again; and if I was trusted with anything I never touched it to diminish it, but made it a point of honour to be punctual to whatever was committed to me, though I was as arrant a thief as any of them in all other cases.

In like case, some of the poorer shop-keepers would often leave me at their door to look after their shops while they went up to dinner, or they went over the way to an ale-house, and the like, and I always did it freely and cheerfully, and with the utmost honesty.

Captain Jack, on the contrary, a surly, ill-looking rough boy, had not a word in his mouth that savoured either of good manners or good humour; he would say Yes, and No, just as he was asked a question, and that was all; but nobody got anything from him that was obliging in the least. If he was sent of an errand he would forget half of it, and it may be, go to play, if he met any boys, and never go at all; or, if he went, never come back with an answer; which was such a regardless, disobliging way, that nobody had a good word for him, and everybody said he had the very look of a rogue, and would come to be hanged. In a word, he got nothing of anybody for good will, but was as it were obliged to turn thief, for the mere necessity of bread to eat; for if he begged he did it with so ill a tone, rather like bidding folks give him victuals than entreating them, that one man, of whom he had something given, and knew him, told him one day, Captain Jack, says he, thou art but an awkward, ugly sort of a beggar now thou art a boy; I doubt thou wilt be fitter to ask a man for his purse, than for a penny, when thou comest to be a man.

The major was a merry, thoughtless fellow, always cheerful; whether he had any victuals or no, he never complained; and he recommended himself so well by his good carriage, that the neighbours loved him, and he got victuals enough one where or other. Thus we all made shift, though we were so little, to keep from starving; and as for lodging, we lay in the summer-time about the watch-houses, and on bulk-heads, and shop-doors, where we were known; as for a bed, we knew nothing what belonged to it for many years after my nurse died; and in winter we got into the ash-holes, and nealing arches in the glass-house, called Dallow's Glass-house, in Rosemary lane, or at another glass-house in Ratcliff highway.

In this manner we lived for some years; and here we failed not to fall among a gang of naked, ragged rogues like ourselves, wicked as the devil could desire to have them be at so early an age, and ripe for all the other parts of mischief that suited them as they advanced in years.

I remember that one cold winter night we were disturbed in our rest with a constable and his watch, crying out for one Wry-neck, who it seems had done some roguery, and required a hue and cry of that kind; and the watch were informed he was to be found among the beggar boys under the nealing-arches in the glass-house.

The alarm being given, we were awakened in the dead of the night with—Come out here, ye crew of young devils, come out and show yourselves; so we were all produced, some came out rubbing their eyes and scratching their heads, and others were dragged out; and I think there was about seventeen of us in all, but Wry-neck, as they called him, was not among them. It seems this was a good big boy that used to be among the inhabitants of that place, and had been concerned in a robbery the night before, in which his comrade, who was taken, in hopes of escaping punishment, had discovered him, and informed where he usually harboured; but he was aware, it seems, and had secured himself, at least for that time. So we were allowed to return to our warm apartment among the coal-ashes, where I slept many a cold winter night; nay, I may say, many a winter—as sound, and as comfortably as ever I did since, though in better lodgings.

In this manner of living we went on a good while, I believe two years, and neither did, or meant, any harm. We generally went all three together, for, in short, the captain, for want of address, and for something disagreeable in him, would have starved if we had not kept him with us. As we were always together we were generally known by the name of the three Jacks; but Colonel Jack had always the preference, upon many accounts. The major, as I have said, was merry and pleasant, but the colonel always held talk with the better sort,—I mean the better sort of those that would converse with a beggar boy. In this way of talk I was always upon the inquiry, asking questions of things done in public as well as in private; particularly, I loved to talk with seamen and soldiers about the war, and about the great sea-fights, or battles on shore, that any of them had been in; and, as I never forgot anything they told me, I could soon, that is to say in a few years, give almost as good an account of the Dutch war, and of the fights at sea, the battles in Flanders, the taking of Maestricht, and the like, as any of those that had been there; and this made those old soldiers and tars love to talk with me too, and to tell me all the stories they could think of, and that not only of the wars then going on, but also of the wars in Oliver's time, the death of King Charles I and the like.

By this means, young as I was, I was a kind of an historian; and though I had read no books, and never had any books to read, yet I could give a tolerable account of what had been done, and of what was then a doing in the world, especially in those things that our own people were concerned in. I knew the names of every ship in the navy, and who commanded them too, and all this before I was 14 years old, or but very soon after.

Captain Jack in this time fell into bad company, and went away from us, and it was a good while before we ever heard tale or tidings of him, till about half a year I think, or thereabouts, I understood he was got among a gang of kidnappers, as they were then called, being a sort of wicked fellows that used to spirit people's children away; that is, snatch them up in the dark, and, stopping their mouths, carry them to houses where they had rogues ready to receive them, and so carry them on board of ships bound to Virginia, and sell them.

This was a trade that horrid Jack, for so I called him when we were grown up, was very fit for, especially the violent part; for if a little child got into his clutches he would stop the breath of it, instead of stopping its mouth, and never troubled his head with the child's being almost strangled, so he did but keep it from making a noise. There was, it seems, some villanous thing done by this gang about that time, whether a child was murdered among them, or a child otherwise abused; but it seems it was a child of an eminent citizen, and the parent somehow or other got a scent of the thing, so that they recovered their child, though in a sad condition, and almost killed. I was too young, and it was too long ago for me to remember the whole story, but they were all taken up and sent to Newgate, and Captain Jack among the rest, though he was but young, for he was not then much above thirteen years old.

What punishment was inflicted upon the rogues of that gang I cannot tell now, but the captain, being but a lad, was ordered to be three times soundly whipt at Bridewell; my lord mayor, or the recorder, telling him it was done in pity to him, to keep him from the gallows, not forgetting to tell him that he had a hanging look, and bid him have a care on that very account; so remarkable was the captain's countenance, even so young, and which he heard of afterwards on many occasions. When he was in Bridewell I heard of his misfortune, and the major and I went to see him, for this was the first news we heard of what became of him.

The very day that we went he was called out to be corrected, as they called it, according to his sentence; and it was ordered to be done soundly, so indeed they were true to the sentence; for the alderman, who was the president of Bridewell, and who, I think, they called Sir William Turner, held preaching to him about how young he was, and what pity it was such a youth should come to be hanged, and a great deal more, how he should take warning by it, and how wicked a thing it was that they should steal away poor innocent children, and the like; and all this while the man, with a blue badge on, lashed him most unmercifully, for he was not to leave off till Sir William knocked with a little hammer on the table.

The poor captain stamped and danced, and roared out like a mad boy; and I must confess I was frightened almost to death; for though I could not come near enough, being but a poor boy, to see how he was handled, yet I saw him afterwards, with his back all wealed with the lashes, and in several places bloody, and thought I should have died with the sight of it; but I grew better acquainted with those things afterwards.

I did what I could to comfort the poor captain when I got leave to come to him. But the worst was not over with him, for he was to have two more such whippings before they had done with him; and indeed they scourged him so severely, that they made him sick of the kidnapping trade for a great while; but he fell in among them again, and kept among them as long as that trade lasted, for it ceased in a few years afterwards.

The major and I, though very young, had sensible impressions made upon us for some time by the severe usage of the captain, and it might be very well said, we were corrected as well as he, though not concerned in the crime; but it was within the year that the major, a good conditioned, easy boy, was wheedled away by a couple of young rogues that frequented the glass-house apartments, to take a walk with them, as they were pleased to call it; the gentlemen were very well matched, the major was about twelve years old, and the oldest of the two that led him out was not above fourteen; the business was to go to Bartholomew fair—was, in short, to pick pockets.

The major knew nothing of the trade, and therefore was to do nothing; but they promised him a share for all that, as if he had been as expert as themselves; so away they went. The two dexterous young rogues managed it so well, that about eight o'clock at night they came back to our dusty quarters at the glass-house, and sitting them down in a corner, they began to share their spoil by the light of the glass-house fire; the major lugged out the goods, for as fast as they made any purchase they unloaded themselves and gave all to him, that if they had been taken, nothing might be found about them.

It was a devilish lucky day to them, the devil certainly assisting them to find their prey, that he might draw in a young gamester, and encourage him to the undertaking, who had been made backward before by the misfortune of the captain. The list of their purchase the first night was as follows:—

1. A white handkerchief from a country wench, as she was staring up at a jack-pudding; there was 3s. 6d. and a row of pins tied up in one end of it.

2. A coloured handkerchief, out of a young country fellow's pocket as he was buying a China orange.

3. A ribbon purse with 11s. 3d. and a silver thimble in it, out of a young woman's pocket, just as a fellow offered to pick her up.

N.B. She missed her purse presently, but not seeing the thief, charged the man with it that would have picked her up, and cried out—"A pick-pocket!" and he fell into the hands of the mob, but being known in the street he got off with great difficulty.

4. A knife and fork that a couple of boys had just bought, and were going home with; the young rogue that took it got it within the minute after the boy had put it in his pocket.

5. A little silver box with 7s. in it, all in small silver, 1d. 2d. 3d. 4d. pieces.

N.B. This it seems a maid pulled out of her pocket to pay at her going into the booth to see a show, and the little rogue got his hand in and fetched it off just as she put it up again.

6. Another silk handkerchief out a gentleman's pocket.

7. Another.

8. A jointed baby and a little looking-glass, stolen off a toy-seller's stall in the fair.

All this cargo to be brought home clear in one afternoon, or evening rather, and by only two little rogues so young, was, it must be confessed, extraordinary; and the major was elevated the next day to a strange degree.

He came very early to me, who lay not far from him, and said to me, "Colonel Jack, I want to speak with you." "Well," said I, "what do you say?" "Nay," said he, "it is business of consequence, I cannot talk here;" so we walked out; as soon as we were come out into a narrow lane by the glass-house, look here, says he, and pulls out his little hand almost full of money.

I was surprised at the sight, when he puts it up again, and bringing his hand out, "Here," says he, "you shall have some of it," and gives me a sixpence, and a shilling's-worth of the small silver pieces. This was very welcome to me, who, as much as I was of a gentleman, and as much as I thought of myself upon that account, never had a shilling of money together before in all my life, not that I could call my own.

I was very earnest then to know how he came by this wealth, for he had for his share 7s. 6d. in money, the silver thimble, and a silk handkerchief, which was, in short, an estate to him that never had, as I said of myself, a shilling together in his life.

"And what will you do with it now, Jack?" said I. "I do?" says he; "the first thing I do, I'll go into Rag fair and buy me a pair of shoes and stockings." "That's right," says I, "and so will I too;" so away we went together, and we bought each of us a pair of Rag fair stockings in the first place for 5d.; not 5d. a pair, but 5d. together, and good stockings they were, too, much above our wear, I assure you.

We found it more difficult to fit ourselves with shoes; but at last, having looked a great while before we could find any good enough for us, we found a shop very well stored, and of these we bought two pairs for sixteen-pence.

We put them on immediately to our great comfort, for we had neither of us had any stockings to our legs that had any feet to them for a long time: I found myself so refreshed with having a pair of warm stockings on, and a pair of dry shoes; things, I say, which I had not been acquainted with a great while, that I began to call to my mind my being a gentleman, and now I thought it began to come to pass: when we had thus fitted ourselves, I said, "Hark ye, Major Jack, you and I never had any money in our lives before, and we never had a good dinner in all our lives; what if we should go somewhere and get some victuals? I am very hungry."

"So we will then," says the major, "I am hungry too:" so we went to a boiling cook's in Rosemary lane, where we treated ourselves nobly, and, as I thought with myself, we began to live like gentlemen, for we had three-pennyworth of boiled beef, two pennyworth of pudding, a penny brick (as they call it, or loaf), and a whole pint of strong beer, which was 7d. in all.

N.B. We had each of us a good mess of charming beef-broth into the bargain; and, which cheered my heart wonderfully, all the while we were at dinner the maid and the boy in the house, every time they passed by the open box where we sat at our dinner, would look in, and cry, "Gentleman, do you call?" and "Do ye call, gentlemen?" I say this was as good to me as all my dinner.

Not the best housekeeper in Stepney parish, not my lord mayor of London, no, not the greatest man on earth could be more happy in their own imagination, and with less mixture of grief or reflection, than I was at this new piece of felicity; though mine was but a small part of it, for Major Jack had an estate compared to me, as I had an estate compared to what I had before: in a word, nothing but an utter ignorance of greater felicity, which was my case, could make anybody think himself so exalted as I did, though I had no share of this booty but 18d.

That night the major and I triumphed in our new enjoyment, and slept with an undisturbed repose in the usual place, surrounded with the warmth of the glass-house fires above, which was a full amends for all the ashes and cinders which we rolled in below.

Those who know the position of the glass-houses, and the arches where they Neal the bottles after they are made, know that those places where the ashes are cast, and where the poor boys lie, are cavities in the brick-work, perfectly close, except at the entrance, and consequently warm as the dressing-room of a bagnio, that it is impossible they can feel any cold there, were it in Greenland, or Nova Zembla, and that therefore the boys lie not only safe, but very comfortably, the ashes excepted, which are no grievance at all to them.

The next day the major and his comrades went abroad again, and were still successful; nor did any disaster attend them for I know not how many months; and, by frequent imitation and direction, Major Jack became as dexterous a pick-pocket as any of them, and went on through a long variety of fortunes, too long to enter upon now, because I am hastening to my own story, which at present is the main thing I have to set down.

The major failed not to let me see every day the effects of his new prosperity, and was so bountiful as frequently to throw me a tester, sometimes a shilling; and I might perceive that he began to have clothes on his back, to leave the ash-hole, having gotten a society lodging (of which I may give an explanation by itself on another occasion) and which was more, he took upon him to wear a shirt, which was what neither he nor I had ventured to do for three years before and upward.

But I observed all this while, that though Major Jack was so prosperous, and had thriven so well, and notwithstanding he was very kind, and even generous to me, in giving me money upon many occasions, yet he never invited me to enter myself into the society, or to embark with him, whereby I might have been made as happy as he; no, nor did he recommend the employment to me at all.

I was not very well pleased with his being thus reserved to me; I had learned from him in general, that the business was picking of pockets, and I fancied, that though the ingenuity of the trade consisted very much in sleight-of-hand, a good address, and being very nimble, yet that it was not at all difficult to learn; and especially I thought the opportunities were so many, the country people that come to London so foolish, so gaping, and so engaged in looking about them, that it was a trade with no great hazard annexed to it, and might be easily learned, if I did but know in general the manner of it, and how they went about it.

CHAPTER II.

I GET ACQUAINTED WITH ONE OF THE MOST NOTED PICKPOCKETS IN TOWN—WE STEAL A LETTER CASE FULL OF BILLS—DREADFULLY DISTRESSED HOW TO DISPOSE OF MY SHARE OF THE BOOTY—MY COMRADE PROPOSES I SHALL RETURN THE BILLS AND GET THE REWARD PROMISED—PROCEEDINGS THEREUPON.

THE subtle devil, never absent from his business, but ready at all occasions to encourage his servants, removed all these difficulties, and brought me into an intimacy with one of the most exquisite divers, or pick-pockets, in the town; and this our intimacy was of no less a kind than that, as I had an inclination to be as wicked as any of them, he was for taking care that I should not be disappointed.

He was above the little fellows who went about stealing trifles and baubles in Bartholomew fair, and ran the risque of being mobbed for 3s. or 4s. His aim was at higher things, even at no less than considerable sums of money, and bills for more.

He solicited me earnestly to go and take a walk with him as above, adding, that after he had shown me my trade a little, he would let me be as wicked as I would; that is, as he expressed it, that after he had made me capable, I should set up for myself, if I pleased, and he would only wish me good luck.

Accordingly, as Major Jack went with his gentleman, only to see the manner, and receive the purchase, and yet come in for a share; so he told me, if he had success, I should have my share as much as if I had been principal; and this he assured me was a custom of the trade, in order to encourage young beginners, and bring them into the trade with courage, for that nothing was to be done if a man had not the heart of the lion.

I hesitated at the matter a great while, objecting the hazard, and telling the story of Captain Jack my elder brother, as I might call him: "Well, colonel," says he, "I find you are faint-hearted, and to be faint-hearted is indeed to be unfit for our trade, for nothing but a bold heart can go through stitch with this work; but, however, as there is nothing for you to do, so there is no risque for you to run in these things the first time. If I am taken," says he, "you having nothing to do in it, they will let you go free; for it shall easily be made appear, that whatever I have done, you had no hand in it."

Upon those persuasions I ventured out with him; but I soon found that my new friend was a thief of quality, and a pick-pocket above the ordinary rank, and that aimed higher abundantly than my brother Jack. He was a bigger boy than I a great deal; for though I was now near fifteen years old, I was not big of my age, and as to the nature of the thing, I was perfectly a stranger to it; I knew indeed what at first I did not, for it was a good while before I understood the thing as an offence: I looked on picking pockets as a trade, and thought I was to go apprentice to it; it is true, this was when I was young in the society, as well as younger in years, but even now I understood it to be only a thing for which, if we were caught, we ran the risque of being ducked or pumped, which we call soaking, and then all was over; and we made nothing of having our rags wetted a little; but I never understood, till a great while after, that the crime was capital, and that we might be sent to Newgate for it, till a great fellow, almost a man, one of our society, was hanged for it; and then I was terribly frightened, as you shall hear by and by.

Well, upon the persuasions of this lad, I walked out with him; a poor innocent boy, and (as I remember my very thoughts perfectly well) I had no evil in my intentions; I had never stolen any thing in my life; and if a goldsmith had left me in his shop, with heaps of money strewed all round me, and bade me look after it, I should not have touched it, I was so honest; but the subtle tempter baited his hook for me, as I was a child, in a manner suitable to my childishness, for I never took this picking of pockets to be dishonesty, but, as I have said above, I looked on it as a kind of trade that I was to be bred up to, and so I entered upon it, till I became hardened in it beyond the power of retreating; and thus I was made a thief involuntarily, and went on a length that few boys do, without coming to the common period of that kind of life, I mean to the transport-ship, or to the gallows.

The first day I went abroad with my new instructor, he carried me directly into the city, and as we went first to the water-side, he led me into the long-room at the Custom-house; we were but a couple of ragged boys at best, but I was much the worse: my leader had a hat on, a shirt, and a neckcloth; as for me, I had neither of the three, nor had I spoiled my manners so much as to have a hat on my head since my nurse died, which was now some years. His orders to me were to keep always in sight, and near him, but not close to him, nor to take any notice of him at any time till he came to me; and if any hurly burly happened, I should by no means know him, or pretend to have anything to do with him.

I observed my orders to a tittle. While he peered into every corner, and had his eye upon everybody, I kept my eye directly upon him, but went always at a distance, and on the other side of the long-room, looking as it were for pins, and picking them up out of the dust as I could find them, and then sticking them on my sleeve, where I had at last got forty or fifty good pins; but still my eye was upon my comrade, who, I observed, was very busy among the crowds of people that stood at the board, doing business with the officers, who pass the entries, and make the cocquets, &c.

At length he comes over to me, and stooping as if he would take up a pin close to me, he put something into my hand, and said, "Put that up, and follow me down stairs quickly." He did not run, but shuffled along apace through the crowd, and went down, not the great stairs which we came in at, but a little narrow stair-case at the other end of the long-room; I followed, and he found I did, and so went on, not stopping below as I expected, nor speaking one word to me, till through innumerable narrow passages, alleys, and dark ways, we were got up into Fenchurch street, and through Billiter lane into Leadenhall street, and from thence into Leadenhall market.

It was not a meat-market day, so we had room to sit down upon one of the butchers' stalls, and he bid me lug out. What he had given me was a little leather letter-case, with a French almanack stuck in the inside of it, and a great many papers in it of several kinds.

We looked them over, and found there were several valuable bills in it, such as bills of exchange, and other notes, things I did not understand; but among the rest was a goldsmith's note, as he called it, of one Sir Stephen Evans, for 300*l.*, payable to the bearer, and at demand; besides this, there was another note for 12*l.* 10*s.*, being a goldsmith's bill too, but I forget the name; there was a bill or two also written in French, which neither of us understood, but which it seems were things of value, being called foreign bills accepted.

The rogue, my master, knew what belonged to the goldsmith's bills well enough, and I observed, when he read the bill of Sir Stephen, he said, "This is too big for me to meddle with;" but when he came to the bill 12*l.* 10*s.*, he said to me, "This will do, come hither, Jack;" so away he runs to Lombard street, and I after him, huddling the other papers into the letter-case. As he went along, he inquired the name out immediately, and went directly to the shop, put on a good grave countenance, and had the money paid him without any stop or question asked; I stood on the other side the way looking about the street, as not at all concerned with anybody that way, but observed, that when he presented the bill, he pulled out the letter-case, as if he had been a merchant's boy, acquainted with business, and had other bills about him.

They paid him the money in gold, and he made haste enough in telling it over, and came away, passing by me, and going into Three-King court, on the other side of the way; when we crossed back into Clement's lane, made the best of our way to Cole-harbour at the water-side, and got a sculler for a penny to carry us over the water to St Mary-Over's stairs, where we landed, and were safe enough.

Here he turns to me; "Colonel Jack," says he, "I believe you are a lucky boy; this is a good job; we'll go away to St George's fields and share our booty." Away we went to the fields, and sitting down in the grass, far enough out of the path, he pulled out the money—"Look here, Jack," says he; "did you ever see the like before in your life?"—"No, never," says I; and added very innocently, "must we have it all?"—"We have it!" says he; "who should have it?"—"Why," says I, "must the man have none of it again that lost it?"—"He have it again!" says he; "what d'ye mean by that?"—"Nay, I don't know," says I; "why, you said just now you would let him have the t'other bill again, that you said was too big for you."

He laughed at me. "You are but a little boy," says he, "that's true; but I thought you had not been such a child neither;" so he mighty gravely explained the thing to me thus:—"that the bill of Sir Stephen Evans was a great bill for 300*l.*, and if I," says he, "that am but a poor lad, should venture to go for the money, they will presently say, how should I come by such a bill, and that I certainly found it or stole it; so they will stop me," says he; "and take it away from me, and it may bring me into trouble for it, too: so," says he, "I did say it was too big for me to meddle with, and that I would let the man have it again, if I could tell how; but for the money, Jack, the money that we have got, I warrant you he should have none of that; besides," says he, "who ever he be that has lost this letter-case—to be sure, as soon as he missed it, he would run to a goldsmith and give notice—that if anybody came for the money they would be stopped, but I am too old for him there," says he.

"Why," says I, "and what will you do with the bill, will you throw it away? If you do, somebody else will find it," says I; "and they will go and take the money."—"No, no," says he; "then they will be stopped and examined, as I tell you I should be." I did not know well what all this meant, so I talked no more about that; but we fell to handling the money. As for me, I had never seen so much together in all my life, nor did I know what in the world to do with it, and once or twice I was going to bid him keep it for me, which would have been done like a child indeed, for, to be sure, I had never heard a word more of it, though nothing had befallen him.

However, as I happened to hold my tongue as to that part, he shared the money very honestly with me; only at the end he told me that though it was true he promised me half, yet as it was the first time, and I had done nothing but look on, so he thought it was very well if I took a little less than he did; so he divided the money, which was 12*l.* 10*s.* into two exact parts, viz.—6*l.* 5*s.* in each part; then he took 1*l.* 5*s.* from my part, and told me I should give him that for hansel. "Well," says I, "take it then, for I think you deserve it all;" so, however, I took up the rest; "and what shall I do with this now," says I, "for I have nowhere to put it?"—"Why, have you no pockets?" says he.—"Yes," says I, "but they are full of holes." I have often thought since that, and with some mirth too, how I had really more wealth than I knew what to do with, for lodging I had none, nor any box or drawer to hide my money in, nor had I any pocket, but such as I say was full of holes; I knew nobody in the world that I could go and desire them to lay it up for me; for being a poor, naked, ragged boy, they would presently say I had robbed somebody, and perhaps lay hold of me, and my money would be my crime, as they say it often is in foreign countries; and now, as I was full of wealth, behold I was full of care, for what to do to secure my money I could not tell; and this held me so long, and was so vexatious to me the next day, that I truly sat down and cried.

Nothing could be more perplexing than this money was to me all that night. I carried it in my hand a good while, for it was in gold all but 14*s.*, and that is to say, it was four guineas, and that 14*s.* was more difficult to carry than the four guineas. At last I sat down and pulled off one of my shoes, and put the four guineas into that; but after I had gone awhile, my shoe hurt me so I could not go, so I was fain to sit down again, and take it out of my shoe, and carry it in my hand ; then I found a dirty linen rag in the street, and I took that up, and wrapt it all together, and carried it in that a good way. I have often since heard people say, when they have been talking of money that they could not get in, I wish I had it in a foul clout : in truth, I had mine in a foul clout ; for it was foul, according to the letter of that saying, but it served me till I came to a convenient place, and then I sat down and washed the cloth in the kennel, and so then put my money in again.

Well, I carried it home with me to my lodging in the glass-house, and when I went to go to sleep, I knew not what to do with it ; if I had let any of the black crew I was with know of it, I should have been smothered in the ashes for it, or robbed of it, or some trick or other put upon me for it ; so I knew not what to do, but lay with it in my hand, and my hand in my bosom, but then sleep went from my eyes. Oh, the weight of human care ! I, a poor beggar boy, could not sleep, so soon as I had but a little money to keep, who, before that, could have slept upon a heap of brick-bats, stones, or cinders, or anywhere, as sound as a rich man does on his down bed, and sounder too.

Every now and then dropping asleep, I should dream that my money was lost, and start like one frightened ; then, finding it fast in my hand, try to go to sleep again, but could not for a long while, then drop and start again. At last a fancy came into my head, that if I fell asleep, I should dream of the money, and talk of it in my sleep, and tell that I had money ; which if I should do, and one of the rogues should hear me, they would pick it out of my bosom, and of my hand too, without waking me ; and after that thought I could not sleep a wink more ; so I passed that night over in care and anxiety enough, and this, I may safely say, was the first night's rest that I lost by the cares of this life, and the deceitfulness of riches.

As soon as it was day I got out of the hole we lay in, and rambled abroad in the fields towards Stepney, and there I mused and considered what I should do with this money, and many a time I wished that I had not had it ; for, after all my ruminating upon it, and what course I should take with it, or where I should put it, I could not hit upon any one thing, or any possible method to secure it, and it perplexed me so, that at last, as I said just now, I sat down and cried heartily.

When my crying was over, the case was the same ; I had the money still, and what to do with it I could not tell : at last it came into my head that I would look out for some hole in a tree, and see to hide it there till I should have occasion for it. Big with this discovery, as I then thought it, I began to look about me for a tree ; but there were no trees in the fields about Stepney or Mile end that looked fit for my purpose ; and if there were any that I began to look narrowly at, the fields were so full of people, that they would see if I went to hide anything there, and I thought the people eyed me, as it were, and that two men in particular followed me to see what I intended to do.

This drove me further off, and I crossed the road at Mile end, and in the middle of the town went down a lane that goes away to the Blind

Beggar's at Bethnal green. When I came a little way in the lane I found a foot-path over the fields, and in those fields several trees for my turn, as I thought ; at last, one tree had a little hole in it, pretty high out of my reach, and I climbed up the tree to get it, and when I came there, I put my hand in, and found, as I thought, a place very fit ; so I placed my treasure there, and was mighty well satisfied with it ; but, behold, putting my hand in again, to lay it more commodiously, as I thought, of a sudden it slipped away from me, and I found the tree was hollow, and my little parcel was fallen in quite out of my reach, and how far it might go in I knew not ; so that, in a word, my money was quite gone, irrecoverably lost ; there could be no room so much as to hope ever to see it again, for 'twas a vast great tree.

As young as I was, I was now sensible what a fool I was before, that I could not think of ways to keep my money, but I must come thus far to throw it into a hole where I could not reach it : well, I thrust my hand quite up to my elbow, but no bottom was to be found, or any end of the hole or cavity ; I got a stick of the tree, and thrust it in a great way, but all was one ; then I cried, nay, roared out, I was in such a passion ; then I got down the tree again, then up again, and thrust in my hand again till I scratched my arm and made it bleed, and cried all the while most violently ; then I began to think I had not so much as a halfpenny of it left for a halfpenny roll, and I was hungry, and then I cried again : then I came away in despair, crying and roaring like a little boy that had been whipped ; then I went back again to the tree, and up the tree again, and thus I did several times.

The last time I had gotten up the tree I happened to come down not on the same side that I went up and came down before, but on the other side of the tree, and on the other side of the bank also ; and, behold, the tree had a great open place in the side of it close to the ground, as old hollow trees often have ; and looking into the open place, to my inexpressible joy there lay my money and my linen rag, all wrapped up just as I had put it into the hole : for the tree being hollow all the way up, there had been some moss or light stuff, which I had not judgment enough to know was not firm, that had given way when it came to drop out of my hand, and so it had slipped quite down at once.

I was but a child, and I rejoiced like a child, for I hollo'd quite out aloud when I saw it ; then I ran to it and snatched it up, hugged and kissed the dirty rag a hundred times ; then danced and jumped about, ran from one end of the field to the other, and, in short, I knew not what, much less do I know now what I did, though I shall never forget the thing, either what a sinking grief it was to my heart when I thought I had lost it, or what a flood of joy overwhelmed me when I had got it again.

While I was in the first transport of my joy, as I have said, I ran about, and knew not what I did ; but when that was over I sat down, opened the foul clout the money was in, looked at it, told it, found it was all there, and then I fell a crying as violently as I did before, when I thought I had lost it.

It would tire the reader should I dwell on all the little boyish tricks that I played, in the ecstasy of my joy and satisfaction, when I had found my money, so I break off here: joy is as extravagant as grief; and since I have been a man, I have often thought, that had such a thing befallen a man, so to have lost all he had, and not have a bit of bread to eat, and then so strangely to find it again, after having given it so effectually over, —I say, had it been so with a man, it might have hazarded his using some violence upon himself.

Well, I came away with my money, and having taken sixpence out of it, before I made it up again, I went to a chandler's shop in Mile end, and bought a halfpenny roll and a halfpenny-worth of cheese, and sat down at the door after I bought it, and ate it very heartily, and begged some beer to drink with it, which the good woman gave me very freely.

Away I went then for the town, to see if I could find any of my companions, and resolved I would try no more hollow trees for my treasure. As I came along Whitechapel I came by a broker's shop, over against the church, where they sold old clothes, for I had nothing on but the worst of rags; so I stopped at the shop, and stood looking at the clothes which hung at the door.

"Well, young gentleman," says a man that stood at the door, "you look wishfully, do you see anything you like, and will your pocket compass a good coat now, for you look as if you belonged to the ragged regiment?" I was affronted at the fellow. "What's that to you," says I, "how ragged I am? if I had seen anything I liked, I have money to pay for it; but I can go where I shan't be huffed at for looking."

While I said this pretty boldly to the fellow, comes a woman out, "What ails you," says she to the man, "to bully away our customers so? a poor boy's money is as good as my lord mayor's; if poor people did not buy old clothes, what would become of our business?" and then turning to me, "Come hither, child," says she, "if thou hast a mind to anything I have, you shan't be hector'd by him; the boy is a pretty boy, I assure you," says she, to another woman that was by this time come to her. "Ay," says the other, "so he is, a very-well looking child, if he was clean and well dressed, and may be as good a gentleman's son, for anything we know, as any of those that are well dressed: come, my dear," says she, "tell me what is it you would have?" she pleased me mightily to hear her talk of my being a gentleman's son, and it brought former things to mind; but when she talk'd of my being not clean, and in rags, then I cried.

She pressed me to tell her if I saw anything that I wanted; I told her no, all the clothes I saw there were too big for me. "Come, child," says she, "I have two things here that will fit you, and I am sure you want them both; that is, first, a little hat, and there," says she (tossing it to me), "I'll give you that for nothing; and here is a good warm pair of breeches; I dare say," says she, "they will fit you, and they are very tight and good; and," says she, "if you should ever come to have so much money that you don't know what to do with it, here are excellent good pockets," says she, "and a little fob to put your gold in, or your watch in, when you get it."

It struck me with a strange kind of joy, that I should have a place to put my money in, and need not go to hide it again in a hollow tree, that I was ready to snatch the breeches out of her hands, and wondered that I should be such a fool never to think of buying me a pair of breeches before, that I might have a pocket to put my money in, and not carry it about two days together in my hand, and in my shoe, and I knew not how; so, in a word, I gave her 2s. for the breeches, and went over into the church-yard and put them on, put my money into my new pockets, and was as pleased as a prince is with his coach and six horses. I thanked the good woman too for the hat, and told her I would come again when I got more money, and buy some other things I wanted, and so I came away.

I was but a boy 'tis true, but I thought myself a man now I had got a pocket to put my money in, and I went directly to find out my companion, by whose means I got it; but I was frighted out of my wits when I heard that he was carried to Bridewell; I made no question but it was for the letter-case, and that I should be carried there too; and then my poor brother Captain Jack's case came into my head, and that I should be whipped there as cruelly as he was, and I was in such a fright that I knew not what to do.

But in the afternoon I met him; he had been carried to Bridewell, it seems, upon that very affair, but was got out again; the case was thus: having had such good luck at the Custom-house the day before, he takes his walk thither again, and as he was in the long-room, gaping and staring about him, a fellow lays hold of him, and calls to one of the clerks that sat behind, "Here," says he, "is the same young rogue that I told you I saw loitering about t'other day, when the gentleman lost his letter-case and his goldsmith's bills; I dare say it was he that stole them." Immediately the whole crowd of people gathered about the boy, and charged him point blank; but he was too well used to such things to be frighted into a confession of what he knew they could not prove, for he had nothing about him belonging to it, nor had any money, but sixpence and a few dirty farthings.

They threatened him, and pulled, and hauled him, till they almost pulled the clothes off his back, and the commissioners examined him; but all was one, he would own nothing, but said he walked up through the room only to see the place, both then and the time before, for he had owned he was there before; so as there was no proof against him of any fact, no, nor of any circumstances relating to the letter-case, they were forced at last to let him go; however, they made a show of carrying him to Bridewell, and they did carry him to the gate to see if they could make him confess anything; but he would confess nothing, and they had no mittimus; so they durst not carry him into the house, nor would the people have received him, I suppose, if they had, they having no warrant for putting him in prison.

Well, when they could get nothing out of him, they carried him into an alehouse, and there they told him that the letter-case had bills in it of a very great value, that they would be of no use to the rogue that had them, but they would be of infinite damage to the gentleman that had lost them; and that he had left word with the clerk, whom the man that stopped this boy had called to, and who was there with him, that he would give 30*l.* to any one that would bring them again, and give all the security that could be desired, that he would give them no trouble, whoever it was.

He was just come from out of their hands when I met with him, and so he told me all the story; "But," says he, "I would confess nothing, and so I got off, and am come away clear." "Well," says I, "and what will you do with the letter-case and the bills, will not you let the poor man have his bills again?" "No, not I," says he, "I won't trust them; what care I for their bills?" It came into my head, as young as I was, that it was a sad thing indeed to take a man's bills away for so much money, and not have any advantage by it either; for I concluded that the gentleman who owned the bills must lose all the money, and it was strange he should keep the bills and make a gentleman lose so much money for nothing. I remember that I ruminated very much about it, and, though I did not understand it very well, yet it lay upon my mind, and I said every now and then to him, "Do let the gentleman have his bills again, do, pray do;" and so I teased him with do, and pray do, till at last I cried about them; he said, "What, would you have me be found out and sent to Bridewell, and be whipped, as your brother Captain Jack was?" I said, "No, I would not have you whipped, but I would have the man have his bills, for they will do you no good, but the gentleman will be undone it may be; and then," I added again, "Do let him have them;" he snapped me short, "Why," says he, "how shall I get them to him? Who dare carry them? I dare not, to be sure, for they will stop me, and bring the goldsmith to see if he does not know me, and that I received the money, and so they will prove the robbery, and I shall be hanged; would you have me be hanged, Jack?"

I was silenced a good while with that, for when he said, "would you have me be hanged, Jack?" I had no more to say; but one day after this, he called to me, "Colonel Jack," says he, "I have thought of a way how the gentleman shall have his bills again; and you and I shall get a good deal of money by it, if you will be honest to me, as I was to you."—"Indeed," says I, "Robin," that was his name, "I will be very honest; let me know how it is, for I would fain have him have his bills."

"Why," says he, "they told me, that he had left word at the clerk's place in the long-room, that he would give 30*l.* to any one that had the bills, and would restore them, and would ask no questions. Now, if you will go, like a poor innocent boy, as you are, into the long-room, and speak to the clerk, it may do: tell him, if the gentleman will do as he promised, you believe you can tell him who has it; and if they are civil to you, and willing to be as good as their words, you shall have the letter-case, and give it them."

I told him, "Ay, I would go with all my heart."—"But, Colonel Jack," says he, "what if they should take hold of you, and threaten to have you whipped, won't you discover me to them?"—"No," says I, "if they would whip me to death I won't."—"Well, then," says he, "there's the letter-case, do you go." So he gave me directions how to act, and what to say; but I would not take the letter-case with me, least they should prove false, and take hold of me, thinking to find it upon me, and so charge me with the fact; so I left it with him, and the next morning I went to the Custom-house, as was agreed; what my directions were, will, to avoid repetition, appear in what happened; it was an errand of too much consequence indeed to be entrusted to a boy, not only so young as I was, but so little of a rogue as I was yet arrived to the degree of.

Two things I was particularly armed with, which I resolved upon:—1. That the man should have his bills again; for it seemed a horrible thing to me that he should be made to lose his money, which I supposed he must, purely because we would not carry the letter-case home.—2. That whatever happened to me I was never to tell the name of my comrade, Robin, who had been the principal; with these two pieces of honesty, for such they were both in themselves, and with a manly heart, though a boy's head, I went up into the long-room in the Custom-house the next day.

As soon as I came to the place where the thing was done, I saw the man sit just where he had sat before, and it run in my head that he had sat there ever since; but I knew no better; so I went up and stood just at that side of the writing board that goes upon that side of the room, and which I was but just tall enough to lay my arms upon.

While I stood there one thrust me this way, and another thrust me that way, and the man that sat behind began to look at me; at last he called out to me—"What does that boy do there? get you gone, sirrah; are you one of the rogues that stole the gentleman's letter-case on Monday last?" Then he turns his tale to a gentleman that was doing business with him, and goes on thus:—"Here was Mr — had a very unlucky chance on Monday last, did not you hear of it?"—"No, not I," says the gentleman.—"Why, standing just there, where you do," says he, "making his entries, he pulled out his letter-case, and laid it down, as he says, but just at his hand, while he reached over to the standish there for a penful of ink, and somebody stole away his letter-case."

"His letter-case!" says t'other; "what—and was there any bills in it?"

"Ay," says he; "there was Sir Stephen Evans's note in it for 300*l.*, and another goldsmith's bill for about 12*l.*; and, which is still worse for the gentleman, he had two foreign accepted bills in it for a great sum, I know not how much, I think one was a French bill for 1,200 crowns."

"And who could it be?" says the gentleman.

"Nobody knows," says he; "but one of our room-keepers says he saw a couple of young rogues like that," pointing at me, "hanging about here, and that on a sudden they were both gone."

"Villains!" says he again; "why, what can they do with them, they will be of no use to them? I suppose he went immediately and gave notice to prevent the payment."

"Yes," says the clerk, "he did; but the rogues were too nimble for him with the little bill of 12*l*. odd money; they went and got the money for that, but all the rest are stopped; however, 'tis an unspeakable damage to him for want of his money."

"Why, he should publish a reward for the encouragement of those that have them to bring them again; they would be glad to bring them, I warrant you."

"He has posted it up at the door that he will give 30*l*. for them."

"Ay, but he should add that he will promise not to stop, or give any trouble to the person that brings them."

"He has done that too," says he; "but I fear they won't trust themselves to be honest, for fear he should break his word."

"Why, it is true, he may break his word in that case, but no man should do so; for then no rogue will venture to bring home anything that is stolen, and so he would do an injury to others after him."

"I durst pawn my life for him he would scorn it."

CHAPTER III.

I AM EXAMINED BY THE GENTLEMAN TOUCHING THE BILLS AND LETTER-CASE, AND OBTAIN THE REWARD OF 30*l*.—ONE OF THEM KINDLY TAKES CHARGE OF THE MONEY FOR ME—WE COMMIT MORE THEFTS—MY COMRADE PURCHASES BETTER CLOTHES FOR ME—I ROB A JEW OF HIS POCKET-BOOK FULL OF BILLS AND DIAMONDS—WILL AGREES FOR A REWARD TO GIVE UP THE PROPERTY.

Thus far they discoursed of it, and then went off to something else; I heard it all, but did not know what to do a great while; but at last, watching the gentleman that went away, when he was gone, I run after him to have spoken to him, intending to have broke it to him, but he went hastily into a room or two, full of people, at the other end of the long room, and when I went to follow, the door-keepers turned me back, and told me I must not go in there; so I went back and loitered about near the man that sat behind the board, and hung about there till I found the clock struck twelve, and the room began to be thin of people; and at last he sat there writing, but nobody stood at the board before him, as there had all the rest of the morning; then I came a little nearer and stood close to the board as I did before; when, looking up from his paper, and seeing me, says he to me—"You have been up and down there all this morning, sirrah, what do you want? you have some business that is not very good, I doubt."

"No, I han't," said I.

"No? it is well if you han't," says he; "pray what business can you have in the long-room, sir; you are no merchant?"

"I would speak with you," said I.

"With me," says he, "what have you to say to me?"

"I have something to say," said I, "if you will do me no harm for it."

"I do thee harm, child; what harm should I do thee?" and spoke very kindly.

"Won't you indeed, sir?" said I.

"No, not I, child; I'll do thee no harm; what is it? do you know anything of the gentleman's letter-case?"

I answered, but spoke softly, that he could not hear me; so he gets over presently into the seat next him, and opens a place that was made to come out, and bade me come in to him; and I did.

Then he asked me again, if I knew anything of the letter-case.

I spoke softly again, and said, folks would hear him.

Then he whispered softly, and asked me again.

I told him, I believed I did; but that, indeed, I had it not, nor had no hand in stealing it, but it was gotten into the hands of a boy that would have burnt it, if it had not been for me; and that I heard him say, that the gentleman would be glad to have them again, and give a good deal of money for them.

"I did say so, child," said he, "and if you can get them for him, he shall give you a good reward, no less than 30*l*. as he has promised."

"But you said too, sir, to the gentleman just now," said I, "that you was sure he would not bring them into any harm that should bring them."

"No, you shall come to no harm; I will pass my word for it."

BOY.—"Nor shan't they make me bring other people into trouble?"

GENT.—"No, you shall not be asked the name of anybody, nor to tell who they are."

BOY.—"I am but a poor boy, and I would fain have the gentleman have his bills, and indeed I did not take them away, nor I han't got them."

GENT.—"But can you tell how the gentleman shall have them?"

BOY.—"If I can get them, I will bring them to you to-morrow morning."

GENT.—"Can you not do it to-night?"

BOY.—"I believe I may, if I knew where to come."

GENT.—"Come to my house, child."

BOY.—"I don't know where you live."

GENT.—"Go along with me now, and you shall see." So he carried me up into Tower street, and showed me his house, and ordered me to come there at five o'clock at night; which accordingly I did, and carried the letter-case with me.

When I came the gentleman asked me, if I had brought the book, as he called it.

"It is not a book," said I.

"No, the letter-case, that's all one," says he.

"You promised me," said I, "you would not hurt me," and cried.

"Don't be afraid, child," says he, "I will not hurt thee, poor boy; nobody shall hurt thee."

"Here it is," said I, and pulled it out.

He then brought in another gentleman, who it seems owned the letter-case, and asked him, "If that was it?" and he said, "Yes."

Then he asked me if all the bills were in it?

I told him I heard him say there was one gone, but I believed there was all the rest.

"Why do you believe so?" says he.

"Because I heard the boy, that I believe stole them, say they were too big for him to meddle with."

The gentleman then, that owned them, said, "Where is the boy?"

Then the other gentleman put in, and said, "No, you must not ask him that; I passed my word that you should not, and that he should not be obliged to tell it to anybody."

"Well, child," says he, "you will let us see the letter-case opened, and whether the bills are in it?"

"Yes," says I.

Then the first gentleman said, "How many bills were there in it?"

"Only three," says he, "besides the bill of 12*l.* 10*s.*; there was Sir Stephen Evans's note for 300*l.* and two foreign bills."

"Well, then, if they are in the letter-case, the boy shall have 30*l.* shall he not?"—"Yes," says the gentleman, "he shall have it freely."

"Come, then, child," says he, "let me open it."

So I gave it him, and he opened it, and there were all three bills, and several other papers, fair and safe, nothing defaced or diminished, and the gentleman said, "All is right."

Then said the first man, "Then I am security to the poor boy for the money:"—"Well, but," says the gentleman, "the rogues have got the 12*l.* 10*s.*; they ought to reckon that as part of the 30*l.*" Had he asked me I should have consented to it at first word; but the first man stood my friend. "Nay," says he, "it was since you knew that the 12*l.* 10*s.* was received that you offered 30*l.* for the other bills, and published it by the crier, and posted it up at the Custom-house door, and I promised him the 30*l.* this morning." They argued long, and I thought would have quarrelled about it.

However, at last they both yielded a little, and the gentleman gave me 25*l.* in good guineas. When he gave it me he bade me hold out my hand, and he told the money into my hand; and when he had done, he asked me if it was right? I said I did not know, but I believed it was: "Why," says he, "can't you tell it?" I told him "no; I never saw so much money in my life, nor I did not know how to tell money."—"Why," says he, "don't you know that they are guineas?" "No," I told him, "I did not know how much a guinea was."

"Why, then," says he, "did you tell me you believed it was right?"—I told him, "Because I believed he would not give it me wrong."

"Poor child," says he, "thou knowest little of the world, indeed; what art thou?"

"I am a poor boy," says I, and cried.

"What is your name," says he,—"but hold, I forgot," said he; "I promised I would not ask your name, so you need not tell me."

"My name is Jack," said I.

"Why, have you no surname?" said he.

"What is that?" said I.

"You have some other name besides Jack," says he, "han't you?"

"Yes," says I, "they call me Colonel Jack."

"But have you no other name?"

"No," said I.

"How came you to be called Colonel Jack, pray?"

"They say," said I, "my father's name was Colonel."

"Is your father or mother alive?" said he.

"No," said I, "my father is dead."

"Where is your mother then?" said he.

"I never had e'er a mother," said I.

This made him laugh. "What," said he, "had you never a mother, what then?"

"I had a nurse," said I, "but she was not my mother."

"Well," says he to the gentleman, "I dare say this boy was not the thief that stole your bills."

"Indeed, sir, I did not steal them," said I, and cried again.

"No, no, child," said he; "we don't believe you did. This is a very clever boy," says he, to the other gentleman, "and yet very ignorant and honest; 'tis pity some care should not be taken of him, and something done for him; let us talk a little more with him." So they sat down and drank wine, and gave me some, and then the first gentleman talked to me again.

"Well," says he; "what wilt thou do with this money now thou hast it?"

"I don't know," said I.

"Where will you put it?" said he.

"In my pocket," said I.

"In your pocket," said he; "is your pocket whole? shan't you lose it?"

"Yes," said I, "my pocket is whole."

"And where will you put it when you get home?"

"I have no home," said I; and cried again.

"Poor child!" said he; "then what dost thou do for thy living?"

"I go of errands," said I, "for the folks in Rosemary lane."

"And what dost thou do for a lodging at night?"

"I lie at the glass-house," said I, "at night."

"How, lie at the glass-house! have they any beds there?" says he.

"I never lay in a bed in my life," said I, "as I remember."

"Why," says he; "what do you lie on at the glass-house?"

"The ground," says I; "and sometimes a little straw, or upon the warm ashes."

Here the gentleman that lost the bills said, "This poor child is enough to make a man weep for the miseries of human nature, and be thankful for himself—he puts tears into my eyes;" "and into mine too," says the other.

"Well, but hark ye, Jack," says the first gentleman; "do they give you no money when they send you of errands?"

"They give me victuals," said I; "and that's better."

"But what," says he, "do you do for clothes?"

"They give me sometimes old things," said I; "such as they have to spare."

"Why, you have never a shirt on, I believe," said he; "have you?"

"No, I never had a shirt," said I, "since my nurse died."

"How long ago is that?" said he.

"Six winters, when this is out," said I.

"Why, how old are you?" said he.

"I can't tell," said I.

"Well," says the gentleman; "now you have this money, won't you buy some clothes, and a shirt with some of it?"

"Yes," said I; "I would buy some clothes."

"And what will you do with the rest?"

"I can't tell," said I; and cried.

"What do'st cry for, Jack?" said he.

"I am afraid," said I; and cried still.

"What art afraid of?"

"They will know I have money."

"Well, and what then?"

"Then I must sleep no more in the warm glass-house, and I shall be starved with cold. They will take away my money."

"But why must you sleep there no more?"

Here the gentlemen observed to one another, how naturally anxiety and perplexity attend those that have money. "I warrant you," says the clerk, "when this poor boy had no money, he slept all night in the straw, or on the warm ashes in the glass-house as soundly and as void of care as it would be possible for any creature to do; but now, as soon as he has gotten money, the care of preserving it brings tears into his eyes, and fear into his heart."

They asked me a great many questions more; to which I answered in my childish way as well as I could, but so as pleased them well enough; at last I was going away with a heavy pocket, and I assure you not a light heart, for I was so frightened with having so much money, that I knew not what in the earth to do with myself; I went away, however, and walked a little way, but I could not tell what to do; so, after rambling two hours or thereabout, I went back again, and sat down at the gentleman's door, and there I cried as long as I had any moisture in my head to make tears of, but never knocked at the door.

I had not sat long, I suppose, but somebody belonging to the family got knowledge of it, and a maid came and talked to me, but I said little to her, only cried still; at length it came to the gentleman's ears. As for the merchant he was gone. When the gentleman heard of me, he called me in, and began to talk with me again, and asked me what I staid for?

I told him I had not staid there all that while, for I had been gone a great while, and was come again.

"Well," says he, "but what did you come again for?"

"I can't tell," says I.

"And what do you cry so for," said he; "I hope you have not lost your money, have you?"

"No," I told him, "I had not lost it yet, but I was afraid I should."

"And does that make you cry?" says he.

I told him Yes, for I knew I should not be able to keep it, but they would cheat me of it, or they would kill me, and take it away from me too.

"They," says he, "who? what sort of gangs of people art thou with?"

I told him they were all boys, but very wicked boys; "thieves and pick pockets," said I, "such as stole this letter-case, a sad pack, I can't abide them."

"Well, Jack," said he, "what shall be done for thee? Will you leave it with me, shall I keep it for you?"

"Yes," said I, "with all my heart, if you please."

"Come then," says he, "give it me; and that you may be sure that I have it, and you shall have it honestly again, I'll give you a bill for it, and for the interest of it, and that you may keep safe enough. Nay," added he, "and if you lose it, or anybody takes it from you, none shall receive the money but yourself, or any part of it."

I presently pulled out all the money, and gave it to him, only keeping about 15s. for myself to buy some clothes; and thus ended the conference between us on the first occasion, at least for the first time. Having thus secured my money to my full satisfaction, I was then perfectly easy, and accordingly the sad thoughts that afflicted my mind before began to vanish away.

This was enough to let any one see how all the sorrows and anxieties of men's lives come about; how they rise from their restless pushing at getting of money, and the restless cares of keeping it when they have got it. I that had nothing, and had not known what it was to have had any thing, knew nothing of the care, either of getting or of keeping it; I wanted nothing, who wanted everything; I had no care, no concern about where I should get my victuals, or how I should lodge; I knew not what money was, or what to do with it; and never knew what it was not to sleep till I had money to keep, and was afraid of losing it.

I had, without doubt, an opportunity at this time, if I had not been too foolish, and too much a child to speak for myself; I had an opportunity, I say, to have got into his service, or perhaps to be under some of the care and concern of these gentlemen; for they seemed to be very fond of doing something for me, and were surprised at the innocence of my talk to them, as well as at the misery (as they thought it) of my condition.

But I acted, indeed, like a child, and leaving my money, as I have said, I never went near them for several years after. What course I took, and what befel me in that interval, has so much variety in it, and carries so much instruction in it, that it requires an account of it by itself.

The first happy chance that offered itself to me in the world was now over; I had got money, but I neither knew the value of it, nor the use of it; the way of living I had begun was so natural to me, I had no notion of bettering it; I had not so much as any desire of buying me any clothes, no, not so much as a shirt, and much less had I any thought of getting any other lodging than that in the glass-house, and loitering about the streets, as I had done: for I knew no good, and had tasted no evil: that is to say, the life I had led being not evil in my account.

In this state of innocence I returned to my really miserable life, so it was in itself, and was only not so to me, because I did not understand how to judge of it, and had known no better.

My comrade that gave me back the bills, and who, if I had not pressed him, designed never to have restored them, never asked me what I had given me, but told me if they gave me anything it should be my own; for, as he said, he would not run the venture of being seen in the restoring them, I deserved the reward if there was any; neither did he trouble his head with inquiring what I had, or whether I had anything or no; so my title to what I had got was clear.

I went now up and down just as I did before; I had money indeed in my pocket, but I let nobody know it; I went of errands cheerfully as before, and accepted of what anybody gave me, with as much thankfulness as ever; the only difference that I made with myself was, that if I was hungry, and nobody employed me or gave me anything to eat, I did not beg from door to door, as I did at first, but went to a boiling house, as I said once before, and got a mess of broth and a piece of bread, price a halfpenny; very seldom any meat, or if I treated myself, it was a halfpenny-worth of cheese; all which expense did not amount to above 2d. or 3d. a-week; for, contrary to the usage of the rest of the tribe, I was extremely frugal, and I had not disposed of any of the guineas which I had at first, neither, as I said to the Custom-house gentleman, could I tell what a guinea was made of, or what it was worth.

After I had been a month thus, and had done nothing, my comrade, as I called him, came to me one morning, "Colonel Jack," says he, "when shall you and I take a walk again?" "When you will," said I. "Have you got no business yet?" says he. "No," says I;—and so one thing bringing in another, he told me I was a fortunate wretch, and he believed I would be so again; but that he must make a new bargain with me now; for, says he, "Colonel, the first time we always let a raw brother come in for full share to encourage him, but afterwards, except it be when he puts himself forward well, and runs equal hazard, he stands to courtesy; but as we are gentlemen, we always do very honourable by one another; and if you are willing to trust it, or leave it to me, I shall do handsomely by you, that you may depend upon." I told him I was not able to do anything, that was certain, for I did not understand it, and therefore I could not expect to get anything, but I would do as he bade me; so we walked abroad together.

We went no more to the Custom-house, it was too bold a venture; besides I did not care to show myself again, especially with him in company; but we went directly to the Exchange, and we hankered about in Castle alley, and in Swithin's alley, and at the coffee-house doors. It was a very unlucky day, for we got nothing all day but two or three handkerchiefs, and came home to the old lodgings at the glass-house; nor had I anything to eat or drink all day but a piece of bread which he gave me, and some water at the conduit at the Exchange gate. So when he was gone from me, for he did not lie in the glass-house as I did, I went to my old broth-house for my usual bait, and refreshed myself, and the next day early went to meet him again, as he appointed me.

Being early in the morning, he took his walk to Billingsgate, where it seems two sorts of people make a great crowd as soon as it is light, and at that time a-year rather before day-light; that is to say, crimps and the masters of coal ships, who they call collier-masters; and secondly, fishmongers, fish-sellers, and buyers of fish.

It was the first of these people that he had his eye upon. So he gives me my orders, which was thus: "Go you," says he, "into all the ale-houses, as we go along, and observe where any people are telling of money; and when you find any, come and tell me. So he stood at the door, and

I went into the houses. As the collier-masters generally sell their coals at the gate, as they call it, so they generally receive their money in those ale-houses; and it was not long before I brought him word of several. Upon this he went in, and made his observations, but found nothing to his purpose; at length I brought him word that there was a man in such a house who had received a great deal of money of somebody, I believed of several people, and that it lay all upon the table in heaps, and he was very busy writing down the sums, and putting it up in several bags.

"Is he?" says he, "I'll warrant him I will have some of it;" and in he goes. He walks up and down the house, which had several open tables and boxes in it, and he listened to hear, if he could, what the man's name was, and he heard somebody call him Cullum, or some such name. Then he watches his opportunity, and steps up to him, and tells him a long story that there were two gentlemen at the Gun-tavern, sent him to inquire for him, and to tell him they desired to speak with him.

The collier-master had his money lying before him, just as I had told him, and had two or three small payments of money, which he had put up in little black dirty bags, and lay by themselves; and as it was hardly broad day, he found means, in delivering his message, to lay his hand upon one of those bags, and carry it off perfectly undiscovered.

When he had got it, he came out to me, who stood but at the door, and pulling me by the sleeve, "Run, Jack," says he, "for our lives:" and away he scours and I after him, never resting, or scarce looking about me, till we got quite up into Fenchurch street, through Lime street, into Leadenhall street, down St Mary axe, to London wall, then through Bishopsgate street, and down Old Bedlam into Moorfields. By this time we were neither of us able to run very fast, nor need we have gone so far, for I never found that anybody pursued us. When we got into Moorfields, and began to take breath, I asked him, what it was frightened him so? "Fright me, you fool," says he, "I have got a devilish great bag of money." "A bag!" said I, "Ay, ay," said he, "let us get out into the fields where nobody can see us, and I'll show it you." So away he had me through Long alley, and cross Hog lane, and Holloway lane, into the middle of the great field, which, since that, has been called the Farthing Pye-house fields. There we would have sat down, but it was all full of water; so we went on, crossed the road at Anniseed Cleer, and went into the field where now the great hospital stands; and finding a bye place, we sat down, and he pulls out the bag. "Thou art a lucky boy, Jack," says he, "thou deservedst a good share of this job truly, for it is all along of thy lucky news." So he pours it all out into my hat, for, as I told you, I now wore a hat.

How he did to whip away such a bag of money from any man that was awake and in his senses, I cannot tell; but there was a great deal in it, and among it a paper full by itself. When the paper dropt out of the bag, "Hold," says he, "that is gold!" and began to crow and hollow like a mad boy. But there he was baulked, for it was a paper of old thirteenpence halfpenny pieces, half and quarter pieces, with ninepences, and fourpence halfpennies, all old crooked money, Scotch and Irish coin; so he was disappointed in that: but, as it was, there was about 17*l.* or 18*l.* in the bag, as I understood by him; for I could not tell money, not I.

Well, he parted this money into three; that is to say, into three shares, two for himself, and one for me, and asked if I was content? I told him yes, I had reason to be contented; besides, it was so much money added to that I had left of his former adventure, that I knew not what to do with it, or with myself, while I had so much about me.

This was a most exquisite fellow for a thief; for he had the greatest dexterity at conveying anything away, that he scarce ever pitched upon anything in his eye, but he carried it off with his hands, and never, that I know of, missed his aim, or was caught in the fact.

He was an eminent pick-pocket, and very dexterous at ladies' gold watches; but he generally pushed higher, at such desperate things as these; and he came off the cleanest, and with the greatest success imaginable; and it was in these kinds of the wicked art of thieving that I became his scholar.

As we were now so rich, he would not let me lie any longer in the glass-house, or go naked and ragged, as I had done; but obliged me to buy two shirts, a waistcoat, and a great coat; for a great coat was more for our purpose in the business we were upon than any other. So I clothed myself as he directed, and he took me a lodging in the same house with him, and we lodged together in a little garret fit for our quality.

Soon after this we walked out again, and then we tried our fortune in the places by the Exchange a second time. Here we began to act separately, and I undertook to walk by myself; and the first thing I did accurately, was a trick I played that required some skill for a new beginner, for I had never seen any business of that kind done before. I saw two gentlemen mighty eager in talk, and one pulled out a pocket-book two or three times, and then slipt it into his coat-pocket again, and then out it came again, and papers were taken out, and others were put in; and then in it went again, and so several times; the man being still warmly engaged with another man, and two or three others standing hard by them. The last time he put his pocket-book into his pocket, he might be said to throw it in, rather than put it in with his hand, and the book lay end-way, resting upon some other book, or something else in his pocket; so that it did not go quite down, but one corner of it was seen above his pocket.

This careless way of men putting their pocket-books into a coat-pocket, which is so easily dived into by the least boy that has been used to the trade, can never be too much blamed; the gentlemen are in great hurries, their heads and thoughts entirely taken up, and it is impossible they should be guarded enough against such little hawk's-eyed creatures as we were; and, therefore, they ought either never to put their pocket-books up at all, or to put them up more secure, or to put nothing of value into them. I happened to be just opposite to this gentleman in that they call Swithin's alley; or that alley rather which is between Swithin's alley and the Exchange, just by a passage that goes out of the alley into the Exchange; when seeing the book pass and repass into the pocket, and out of the pocket as above, it came immediately into my head, certainly I might get that pocket-book out if I were nimble, and I warrant Will would have it, if he saw it go and come to and again as I did; but when I saw it hang by the way, as I have said; now it is mine, said I to myself, and crossing the alley, I brushed smoothly, but closely by the man, with my hand down flat to my own side, and taking hold of it by the corner that appeared, the book came so light into my hand, it was impossible the gentleman should feel the least motion, or anybody else see me take it away. I went directly forward into the broad place on the north side of the Exchange, then scoured down Bartholomew lane, so into Tokenhouse yard, into the alleys which pass through from thence to London wall, so through Moorgate, and sat down on the grass in the second of the quarters of Moorfields, towards the middle field; which was the place that Will and I had appointed to meet at if either of us got any booty. When I came thither, Will was not come, but I saw him a-coming in about half an hour.

As soon as Will came to me, I asked him what booty he had gotten? He looked pale, and, as I thought, frightened; but he returned, "I have got nothing, not I; but you lucky young dog," says he, "what have you got? Have not you got the gentleman's pocket-book in Swithin's alley?" "Yes," says I, and laughed at him; "why, how did you know it?" "Know it!" says he, "why, the gentleman is raving and half distracted; he stamps and cries, and tears his very clothes; he says he is utterly undone and ruined, and the folks in the alley say there is I know not how many thousand pounds in it; what can be in it?" says Will; "come, let us see."

Well, we lay close in the grass in the middle of the quarter, so that nobody minded us; and so we opened the pocket-book, and there was a great many bills and notes under men's hands; some goldsmiths', and some belonging to insurance offices, as they call them, and the like; but that which was, it seems, worth all the rest, was, that in one of the folds of the cover of the book, where there was a case with several partitions, there was a paper full of loose diamonds. The man, as we understood afterward, was a Jew, who dealt in such goods, and who indeed ought to have taken more care of the keeping of them.

Now was this booty too great even for Will himself to manage; for though by this time I was come to understand things better than I did formerly, when I knew not what belonged to money, yet Will was better skilled by far in those things than I. But this puzzled him too, as well as me. Now were we something like the cock in the fable; for all these bills, and I think there was one bill of Sir Henry Furness's for 1200*l.*, and all these diamonds, which were worth about 150*l.* as they said; I say, all these things were of no value to us, one little purse of gold would have been better to us than all of it. "But come," says Will, "let us look over the bills for a little one."

We looked over all the bills, and, among them, we found a bill under a man's hand for 32*l.*; "Come," says Will, "let us go and inquire where this man lives." So we went into the city again, and Will went to the post-house, and asked there; they told him he lived at Temple bar: "Well," says Will, "I will venture; I'll go and receive the money; it may be he has not remembered to send to stop the payment there."

But it came into his thoughts to take another course; "Come," says Will, "I'll go back to the alley, and see if I can hear anything of what has happened, for I believe the hurry is not over yet." It seems the man who lost the book was carried into the King's Head tavern, at the end of that alley, and a great crowd was about the door.

Away goes Will, and watches and waits about the place; and then, seeing several people together, for they were not all dispersed, he asks one or two what was the matter; they tell him a long story of a gentleman who had lost his pocket-book, with a great bag of diamonds in it, and bills for a great many thousand pounds, and I know not what; and that they had been just crying it, and had offered 100*l.* reward to any one who would discover and restore it.

"I wish," said he, to one of them that parleyed with him, "I did but know who has it, I don't doubt but I could help him to it again; does he remember nothing of anybody, boy, or fellow, that was near him? if he could but describe him, it might do." Somebody that overheard him was so forward to assist the poor gentleman, that they went up and let him know what a young fellow, meaning Will, had been talking at the door; and down comes another gentleman from him, and, taking Will aside, asked him what he had said about it? Will was a grave sort of a young man, that, though he was an old soldier at the trade, had yet nothing of it in his countenance; and he answered, that he was concerned in business where a great many of the gangs of little pick-pockets haunted, and if he had but the least description of the person they suspected, he durst say he could find him out, and might perhaps get the things again for him. Upon this, he desired him to go up with him to the gentleman, which he did accordingly; and there, he said, he sat leaning his head back to the chair, pale as a cloth; disconsolate to a strange degree, and, as Will described him, just like one under a sentence.

When they came to ask him whether he had seen no boy, or shabby fellow, lurking near where he stood, or passing, or repassing, and the like, he answered, "No, not any; neither could he remember that anybody had come near him." "Then," said Will, "it will be very hard, if not impossible, to find them out. However," said Will, "if you think it worth while, I will put myself among those rogues, though," says he, "I care not for being seen among them; but I will put in among them, and if it be in any of those gangs, it is ten to one but I shall hear something of it."

They asked him then, if he had heard what terms the gentleman had offered to have it restored; he answered, "No," (though he had been told at the door); they answered, he had offered 100*l.* "That is too much," says Will, "but if you please to leave it to me, I shall either get it for you for less than that, or not be able to get it for you at all." Then the losing gentleman said to one of the other, "Tell him, that if he can get it lower, the overplus shall be to himself." William said he would be very glad to do the gentleman such a service, and would leave the reward to himself. "Well, young man," says one of the gentlemen, "whatever you appoint to the young artist that has done this roguery, (for I warrant he is an artist, let it be who it will), he shall be paid, if it be within the 100*l.*, and the gentleman is willing to give you 50*l.* besides for your pains."

"Truly, sir," says Will, very gravely, "it was by mere chance, that coming by the door and seeing the crowd, I asked what the matter was; but if I should be instrumental to get the unfortunate gentleman his pocket-book, and the things in it again, I shall be very glad; nor am I so rich neither, sir, but 50*l.* is very well worth my while too." Then he took directions who to come to, and who to give his account to, if he learned anything, and the like.

CHAPTER IV.

WILL RETURNS THE POCKET-BOOK AND OBTAINS THE REWARD—WE ROB AN OLD KNIGHT IN SMITH-FIELD OF A BAG OF MONEY—OTHER ADVENTURES, IN ALL OF WHICH WE ARE SUCCESSFUL—THE NOTION OF MY BEING A GENTLEMAN, WHICH I ALWAYS ENTERTAIN, KEEPS ME FROM SWEARING, DRINKING, AND SUCH LIKE VICES—WILL SEDUCES ME TO BECOME HIGHWAYMAN—ADVENTURES ON THE ROAD.

WILL stayed so long, that, as he and I agreed, I went home, and he did not come to me till night; for we had considered before, that it would not be proper to come from them directly to me, lest they should follow him and apprehend me. If he had made no advances towards a treaty, he would have come back in half an hour, as we agreed; but staying late, we met at our night rendezvous, which was in Rosemary lane.

When he came, he gave an account of all the discourse, and particularly what a consternation the gentleman was in who lost the pocket-book, and that he did not doubt but we should get a good round sum for the recovery of it.

We consulted all the evening about it, and concluded he should let them hear nothing of them the next day at all, and that the third day he should go, but should make no discovery, only that he had got a scent of it, and that he believed he should have it, and make it appear as difficult as possible, and to start as many objections as he could. Accordingly, the third day after he met with the gentleman, who he found had been uneasy at his long stay, and told him, they were afraid that he only flattered them to get free from them, and that they had been too easy in letting him go without a further examination.

He took upon him to be very grave with them, and told them, that if that was what he was like to have for being so free, as to tell them he thought he might serve them, they might see that they had wronged him, and were mistaken by his coming again to them; that if they thought they could do any thing by examining him, they might go about it, if they pleased, now; that all he had to say to them was, that he knew where some of the young rogues haunted, who were famous for such things, and that by some inquiries, offering them money, and the like, he believed they would be brought to betray one another, and that so he might pick it out for them; and this he would say before a justice of peace, if they thought fit: and then all that he had to say farther to them was, to tell them, he had lost a day or two in their service, and had got nothing, but to be suspected for his pains; and that after that he had done, and they might seek their goods where they could find them.

They began to listen a little upon that, and asked him if he could give them any hopes of recovering their loss; he told them that he was not afraid to tell them that he believed he had heard some news of them, and that what he had done, had prevented all the bills being burnt, book and all; but that now he ought not to be asked any more questions till they should be pleased to answer him a question or two. They told him they would give him any satisfaction they could, and bid him tell what he desired.

"Why, sir," says he, "how can you expect any thief that had robbed you to such a considerable value as this, would come and put himself into your hands, confess he had your goods, and restore them to you, if you did not give them assurance that you will not only give them the reward you agreed to, but also give assurance that they shall not be stopped, questioned, or called to account before a magistrate?"

They said they would give all possible assurance of it; "Nay," says he, "I do not know what assurance you are able to give; for when a poor fellow is in your clutches, and has shown you your goods, you may seize upon him for a thief, and it is plain he must be so; then you go, take away your goods, send him to prison, and what amends can he have of you afterward?"

They were entirely confounded with the difficulty; they asked him to try if he could get the things into his hands, and they would pay him the money before he let them go out of his hand, and he should go away half an hour before they went out of the room.

"No, gentlemen," says he, "that won't do now. If you had talked so before you had talked of apprehending me for nothing, I should have taken your words; but now it is plain you have had such a thought in your heads, and how can I, or any one else, be assured of safety?"

Well, they thought of a great many particulars, but nothing would do; at length the other people who were present put in, that they should give security to him, by a bond of 1000*l.*, that they would not give the person any trouble whatsoever. He pretended they could not be bound, nor could their obligation be of any value, and that their own goods being once seen, they might seize them; and what would it signify, said he, to put a poor pickpocket to sue for his reward? They could not tell what to say; but told him, that he should take the things of the boy, if it was a boy; and they would be bound to pay him the money promised. He laughed at them, and said, "No, gentlemen, as I am not the thief, so I shall be very loth to put myself in the thief's stead, and lie at your mercy."

They told him they knew not what to do then, and that it would be very hard he would not trust them at all. He said, he was very willing to trust them, and to serve them; but that it would be very hard to be ruined and charged with the theft, for endeavouring to serve them.

They then offered to give it him under their hands, that they did not in the least suspect him; that they would never charge him with anything about it; that they acknowledged he went about to inquire after the goods at their request; and that if he produced them, they would pay him so much money, at or before the delivery of them, without obliging him to name or produce that person he had them from.

Upon this writing, signed by three gentlemen who were present, and by the person in particular who lost the things, the young gentleman told them, he would go and do his utmost to get the pocket-book, and all that was in it.

Then he desired that they would in writing, beforehand, give him a particular of all the several things that were in the book; that he might not have it said, when he produced it, that there was not all; and he would have the said writing sealed up, and he would make the book be sealed up when it was given to him. This they agreed to; and the gentleman accordingly drew up a particular of all the bills that he remembered, as he said, was in the book; and also of the diamonds, as follows:

One bill of one Stewart, that kept a wager-office and insurance, 350*l.*

A paper containing thirty-seven loose diamonds, value about 250*l.*

For all these things they promised, first, to give him whatever he agreed with the thief to give him, not exceeding 50*l.*, and to give him 50*l.* more for himself for procuring them.

Now he had his cue, and now he came to me, and told me honestly the whole story as above: so I delivered him the book, and he told me that he thought it was reasonable we should take the full sum; because he would seem to have done them some service, and so make them the easier. All this I agreed to; so he went the next day to the place, and the gentlemen met him very punctually.

He told them at the first word, he had done their work, and, as he hoped, to their minds; and told them if it had not been for the diamonds, he could have got all for 10*l.*, but that the diamonds had shone so bright in the boy's imagination, that he talked of running away to France or Holland, and living there all his days like a gentleman; at which they laughed. "However, gentlemen," said he, "here is the book;" and so pulled it out, wrapt up in a dirty piece of a coloured handkerchief, as black as the street could make it, and sealed with a piece of sorry wax, and the impression of a farthing for a seal.

Upon this the note being also unsealed, at the same time he pulled open the dirty rag, and showed the gentleman his pocket-book ; at which he was so over-surprised with joy, notwithstanding all the preparatory discourse, that he was fain to call for a glass of wine or brandy to drink, to keep him from fainting.

The book being opened, the paper of diamonds was first taken out, and there they were every one, only the little paper was by itself, and the rough diamonds that were in it were loose among the rest ; but he owned they were all there safe.

Then the bills were called over, one by one, and they found one bill for 80*l.* more than the account mentioned ; besides several papers which were not for money, though of consequence to the gentleman, and he acknowledged that all was very honestly returned : " And now, young man," said they, " you shall see we will deal as honestly by you ;" and so, in the first place, they gave him 50*l.* for himself, and then they told out the 50*l.* for me.

He took the 50*l.* for himself and put it up in his pocket, wrapping it in paper, it being all in gold : then he began to tell over the other 50*l.* ; but when he told out 30*l.*, " Hold, gentlemen," says he, " as I have acted fairly for you, so you shall have no reason to say I do not do so to the end. I have taken 30*l.*, and for so much I agreed with the boy ; and so there is 20*l.* of your money again."

They stood looking one at another a good while, as surprised at the honesty of it ; for till that time they were not quite without a secret suspicion that he was the thief, but that piece of policy cleared up his reputation to them. The gentleman that had got his bills, said softly to one of them, " Give it him all ;" but the other said, (softly too,) " No, no ; as long as he has got it abated, and is satisfied with the 50*l.* you have given him, 'tis very well ; let it go as it is." This was not spoke so softly but he heard it, and said, " No," too ; " I am very well satisfied ; I am glad I have got them for you ;" and so they began to part.

But just before they were going away, one of the gentlemen said to him, " Young man, come, you see we are just to you, and have done fairly, as you have also, and we will not desire you to tell us who this cunning fellow is that got such a prize from this gentleman ; but as you have talked with him, pr'ythee, can you tell us nothing of how he did it, that we may beware of such sparks again ?"

" Sir," says Will, " when I shall tell you what they say, and how the particular case stood, the gentleman would blame himself more than anybody else, or as much at least. The young rogue that caught this prize was out, it seems, with a comrade, who is a nimble experienced pickpocket as most in London, but at that time the artist was somewhere at a distance, and this boy never had picked a pocket in his life before ; but, he says, he stood over against the passage into the Exchange, on the east side, and the gentleman stood just by the passage ; that he was very earnest in talking with some other gentlemen, and often pulled out this book and opened it, and took papers out, and put others in, and returned it into his coat-pocket ; that the last time it hitched at the pocket-hole, or stopt at something that was in the pocket, and hung a little out, which the boy, who had watched it a good while, perceiving, he passes by close to the gentleman, and carried it smoothly off, without the gentleman's perceiving it at all."

He went on, and said, "'Tis very strange gentlemen should put pocket-books which have such things in them into those loose pockets, and in so careless a manner." " That's very true," says the gentleman ; and so, with some other discourse of no great signification, he came away to me.

We were now so rich that we scarce knew what to do with our money ; at least I did not, for I had no relations, no friend, nowhere to put any thing I had but in my pocket ; as for Will, he had a poor mother, but wicked as himself, and he made her rich, and glad with his good success.

We divided this booty equally ; for, though the gaining it was mine, yet the improving of it was his, and his management brought the money ; for neither he nor I could have made anything proportionable of the thing any other way. As for the bills, there was no room to doubt, but unless they had been carried that minute to the goldsmith's for the money, he would have come with notice to stop the payment, and perhaps have come while the money was receiving, and have taken hold of the person. And then as to the diamonds, there had been no offering them to sale by us poor boys to anybody, but those who were our known receivers, and they would have given us nothing for them compared to what they were worth ; for, as I understood afterwards, those who made a trade of buying stolen goods, took care to have false weights, and cheat the poor devil that stole them, at least one ounce in three.

Upon the whole, we made the best of it many ways besides. I had a strange kind of uninstructed conscience at that time ; for, though I made no scruple of getting anything in this manner from anybody, yet I could not bear destroying their bills and papers, which were things that would do them a great deal of hurt, and do me no good ; and I was so tormented about it that I could not rest night or day till I made the people easy from whom the things were taken.

I was now rich, so that I knew not what to do with my money, or with myself. I had lived so near and so close, that although, as I said, I did now and then lay out 2*d.* or 3*d.* for mere hunger, yet I had so many people, who, as I said, employed me, and who gave me victuals, and sometimes clothes, that in a whole year I had not quite spent the 15*s.* which I had saved of the custom-house gentleman's money ; and I had the four guineas, which was of the first booty before that, still in my pocket—I mean the money that I let fall into the tree.

But now I began to look higher ; and though Will and I went abroad several times together, yet, when small things offered, as handkerchiefs and such trifles, we would not meddle with them, not caring to run the risk for small matters. It fell out one day that, as we were strolling about in West Smithfield on a Friday, there happened to be an ancient country gentleman in the market selling some very large bullocks ; it seems they came out of Sussex. His worship, for so they called him, had received the money for these bullocks at a tavern, whose sign I forget now, and having some of it in a bag, and the bag in his hand, he was taken with a sudden fit of coughing, and stands to cough, resting his hand with the bag of money in it upon the bulk-head of a shop just by the Cloyster gate in Smithfield, that is to say, within three or four doors of it; we were both just behind him. Says Will to me, "Stand ready;" upon this he makes an artificial stumble, and falls with his head just against the old gentleman in the very moment when he was coughing, ready to be strangled, and quite spent for want of breath.

The violence of the blow beat the old gentleman quite down; the bag of money did not immediately fly out of his hand, but I ran to get hold of it, and gave it a quick snatch, pulled it clean away, and ran like the wind down the Cloysters with it; turned on the left hand, as soon as I was through, and cut into Little Britain, so into Bartholomew close, then cross Aldersgate street, through Paul's alley into Red cross street, and so cross all the streets, through innumerable alleys, and never stopped till I got into the second quarter of Moor fields, our old agreed rendezvous.

Will, in the meantime, fell down with the old gentleman, but soon got up; the old knight, for such it seems he was, was frightened with the fall, and his breath so stopped with his cough, that he could not recover himself to speak till some time; during which nimble Will was got up again, and walked off; nor could he call out, stop thief, or tell anybody he had lost anything for a good while; but, coughing vehemently, and looking red, till he was almost black in the face, he cried, "The ro——Heh, heh, heh, the rogues—heh—have got—heh, heh, heh, heh, heh, heh,"—then he would get a little breath, and at it again: "the rogues—heh, heh;" and, after a great many hehs and rogues, he brought it out,—"have got away my bag of money!"

All this while the people understood nothing of the matter; and as for the rogues indeed, they had time enough to get clear away, and in about an hour Will came to the rendezvous; there we sat down in the grass again, and turned out the money, which proved to be eight guineas, and 5*l.* 12*s.* in silver, so that it made just 14*l.* together. This we shared upon the spot, and went to work the same day for more; but whether it was, that, being flushed with our success, we were not so vigilant, or that no other opportunity offered, I know not, but we got nothing more that night, nor so much as anything offered itself for an attempt.

We took many walks of this kind, sometimes together, at a little distance from one another, and several small hits we made; but we were so flushed with our success, that truly we were above meddling with trifles, as I said before, no, not such things that others would have been glad of; nothing but pocket-books, letter-cases, or sums of money would move us.

The next adventure was in the dusk of the evening, in a court, which goes out of Gracechurch street into Lombard street, where the Quakers' meeting-house is; there was a young fellow, who, as we learned afterward, was a woollen draper's apprentice in Gracechurch street; it seems he had been receiving a sum of money, which was very considerable, and he comes to a goldsmith's shop in Lombard street with it; paid in the most of it there; insomuch that it grew dark, and the goldsmith began to be shutting in shop, and candles to be lighted; we watched him in there, and stood on the other side of the way to see what he did. When he had paid in all the money he intended, he stayed still some time longer to take notes, as I supposed, for what he had paid, and by this time it was still darker than before; at last he comes out of the shop with still a pretty large bag under his arm, and walks over into the court, which was then very dark; in the middle of the court is a boarded entry, and farther, at the end of it, a threshold; and as soon as he had set his foot over the threshold, he was to turn on his left hand into Gracechurch street.

"Keep up," says Will to me, "be nimble;" and as soon as he had said so, he flies at the young man, and gives him such a violent thrust, that pushed him forward with too great a force for him to stand; and, as he strove to recover, the threshold took his feet, and he fell forward into the other part of the court, as if he had flown in the air, with his head lying towards the Quakers' meeting-house. I stood ready, and presently felt out the bag of money, which I heard fall, for it flew out of his hand, he having his life to save, not his money. I went forward with the money, and Will, that threw him down, finding I had it, ran backward, and as I made along Fenchurch street, Will overtook me, and we scoured home together. The poor young man was hurt a little with the fall, and reported to his master, as we heard afterward, that he was knocked down, which was not true, for neither Will nor I had any stick in our hands; but the master of the youth was, it seems, so very thankful that his young man was not knocked down before he paid the rest of the money (which was above 100*l.* more) to the goldsmith, who was Sir John Sweetapple, that he made no great noise at the loss he had; and, as we heard afterward, only warned his 'prentice to be more careful, and come no more through such places in the dark; whereas the man had really no such deliverance as he imagined, for we saw him before, when he had all the money about him; but it was no time of day for such work as we had to do, so that he was in no danger before.

This booty amounted to 29*l.* 16*s.*, which was 14*l.* 18*s.* a-piece, and added exceedingly to my store, which began now to be very much too big for my management; and indeed I began to be now full of care for the preservation of what I had got: I wanted a trusty friend to commit it to, but where was such a one to be found by a poor boy, bred up among thieves? If I should have let any honest body know that I had so much money, they would have asked me how I came by it, and would have been afraid to take it into their hands, lest, I being some time or other caught in my rogueries, they should be counted the receivers of stolen goods, and the encouragers of a thief.

We had, however, in the meantime, a great many other successful enterprizes, some of one kind, some of another, and were never so much as in danger of being apprehended; but my companion Will, who was now grown a man, and encouraged by these advantages, fell into quite another vein of wickedness, getting acquainted with a wretched gang of fellows that turned their hands to everything that was vile.

Will was a lusty strong fellow, and withal very bold and daring, would fight anybody, and venture upon anything, and I found he began to be above the mean rank of a poor pick-pocket, so I saw him but seldom: however, once coming to me, in a very friendly manner, and asking me how I went on, I told him that I used the old trade still, that I had had two or three good jobs; one with a young woman, whose pocket I had picked of eleven guineas; and another, a country-woman, just come out of a stage-coach, seeing her pull out her bag to pay the coachman; and that I followed her till I got an opportunity, and slipped it out so neatly, that though there was 8*l.* 17*s.* in it, yet she never felt it go. And several other jobs I told him of, by which I made a pretty good purchase. "I always said you were a lucky boy, Colonel Jack," says he; "but, come, you are grown almost a man now, and you shall not be always at play at push-pin; I am got into better business, I assure you, and you shall come into it too. I'll bring you into a brave gang, Jack," says he, "where you shall see we shall be all gentlemen."

Then he told me the trade itself, in short, which was with a desperate set of fellows, that had two of the most desperate works upon their hands that belonged to the whole art of thieving; that is to say, in the evening they were foot-pads, and in the night they were house-breakers. Will told me so many plausible stories, and talked of such great things, that, in short, I, who had been always used to do anything he bid me do, went with him without any hesitation.

Nothing is more certain than that hitherto, being partly from the gross ignorance of my untaught childhood, as I observed before, partly from the hardness and wickedness of the company I kept, and add to these, that it was the business I might be said to be brought up to; I had, I say, all the way hitherto, no manner of thoughts about the good or evil of what I was embarked in; consequently, I had no sense of conscience, no reproaches upon my mind for having done amiss.

Yet I had something in me, by what secret influence I knew not, kept me from the other degrees of raking and vice, and, in short, from the general wickedness of the rest of my companions: for example, I never used any ill words, nobody ever heard me swear, nor was I given to drink, or to love strong drink; and I cannot omit a circumstance that very much served to prevent it. I had a strange original notion, as I have mentioned in its place, of my being a gentleman; and several things had casually happened in my way to increase this fancy of mine. It happened one day, that being in the glass-house yard, between Rosemary lane and Ratcliffe highway, there came a man dressed very well, and with a coach attending him, and he came (as I suppose) to buy glass-bottles, or some other goods, as they sold; and in bargaining for his goods, he swore most horrible oaths at every two or three words. At length the master of the glass-house, an ancient grave gentleman, took the liberty to reprove him, which at first made him swear the worse; after a while, the gentleman was a little calmer, but still he swore very much, though not so bad as at first. After some time, the master of the glass-house turned from him.—"Really, sir," says the good old gentleman, "you swear so, and take God's name in vain so, that I cannot bear to stay with you; I would rather you would let my goods alone, and go somewhere else; I hope you won't take it ill, but I don't desire to deal with anybody that does so; I am afraid my glass-house should fall on your head while you stay in it."

The gentleman grew good-humoured at the reproof, and said, "Well, come, don't go away, I won't swear any more," says he, "if I can help it; for I own," says he, "I should not do it."

With that the old gentleman looked up at him, and returning, "Really, sir," says he, "'tis a pity you, that seem to be a fine gentleman, well bred and good-humoured, should accustom yourself to such an hateful practice; why, 'tis not like a gentleman to swear, 'tis enough for my black wretches that work there at the furnace, or for these ragged, naked, blackguard boys," pointing at me and some others of the dirty crew that lay in the ashes; "'tis bad enough for them," says he, "and they ought to be corrected for it too; but for a man of breeding, sir," says he, "a gentleman, it ought to be looked upon as below them; gentlemen know better, and are taught better, and it is plain you know better; I beseech you, sir, when you are tempted to swear, always ask yourself, is this like a gentleman? does this become me as a gentleman? Do but ask yourself that question, and your reason will prevail, you will soon leave it off."

I heard all this, and it made the blood run chill in my veins, when he said swearing was only fit for such as we were. In short, it made as great an impression upon me as it did upon the gentleman; and yet he took it very kindly too, and thanked the old gentleman for his advice. But from that time forward I never had the least inclination to swearing or ill words, and abhorred it when I heard the other boys do it. As to drinking, I had no opportunity, for I had nothing to drink but water, or small beer that anybody gave me in charity, for they seldom gave away strong beer; and after I had money, I neither desired strong beer, or cared to part with my money to buy it.

Then as to principle, 'tis true I had no foundation laid in me by education; and being early led by my fate into evil, I had the less sense of its being evil left upon my mind: but when I began to grow to an age of understanding, and to know that I was a thief, growing up in all manner of villainy, and ripening apace for the gallows, it came often into my thoughts that I was going wrong; that I was in the high road to Old Nick, and several times I would stop short, and ask myself, if this was the life of a gentleman?

But these little things wore off again as often as they came on, and I followed the old trade again; especially when Will came to prompt me, as I have observed, for he was a kind of a guide to me in all these things; and I had, by custom and application, together with seeing his way, learned to be as acute a workman as my master.

But, to go back where I left off. Will came to me, as I have said, and telling me how much better business he was fallen into, would have me go along with him, and I should be a gentleman. Will, it seems, understood that word in a quite different manner from me; for his gentleman was nothing more or less than a gentleman thief, a villain of a higher degree than a pick-pocket, and one that might do something more wicked, and better entitling him to the gallows, than could be done in our way: but my gentleman that I had my eye upon, was another thing quite, though I could not really tell how to describe it neither.

However, the word took with me, and I went with him. We were neither of us old; Will was about twenty-four and as for me I was now about eighteen, and pretty tall of my age.

The first time I went with him, he brought me into the company only of two more young fellows. We met at the lower part of Grays Inn lane, about an hour before sunset, and went out into the fields towards a place called Pindar of Wakefield, where are abundance of brick-kilns; here it was agreed to spread from the field-path to the roadway, all the way towards Pancras church, to observe any chance game, as they called it, which they might shoot flying. Upon the path, within the bank, on the one side of the road, going towards Kentish Town, two of our gang, Will, and one of the other, met a single gentleman, walking apace towards the town; being almost dark, Will cried, "Mark, ho!" which, it seems, was the word at which we were all to stand still at a distance, come in, if he wanted help, and give a signal if anything appeared that was dangerous.

Will steps up to the gentleman, stops him, and put the question, that is, "Sir, your money?" The gentleman, seeing he was alone, struck at him with his cane, but Will, a nimble strong fellow, flew in upon him, and, with struggling, got him down; then he begged for his life, Will having told him with an oath that he would cut his throat. In that moment, while this was doing, comes a hackney-coach along the road, and the fourth man, who was that way, cries, "Mark, ho!" which was to intimate that it was a prize, not a surprise; and accordingly the next man went up to assist him, where they stopped the coach, which had a doctor of physic and a surgeon in it, who had been to visit some considerable patient, and, I suppose, had considerable fees; for here they got two good purses, one with eleven or twelve guineas, the other six, with some pocket money, two watches, one diamond ring, and the surgeon's plaister-box, which was most of it full of silver instruments.

While they were at this work, Will kept the man down who was under him; and though he promised not to kill him unless he offered to make a noise, yet he would not let him stir till he heard the noise of the coach going on again, by which he knew the job was over on that side. Then he carried him a little out of the way, tied his hands behind him, and bid him lie still and make no noise, and he would come back in half an hour and untie him upon his word; but if he cried out, he would come back and kill him.

The poor man promised to lie still and make no noise, and did so; and had not above 11s. 6d. in his pocket, which Will took, and came back to the rest; but while they were together, I, who was on the side of the Pindar of Wakefield, cried, "Mark, ho!" too.

What I saw was a couple of poor women, one a kind of a nurse, and the other a maid-servant, going for Kentish Town. As Will knew that I was but young at the work, he came flying to me, and seeing how easy a bargain it was, he said, "Go, Colonel, fall to work." I went up to them, and speaking to the elderly woman, "Nurse," said I, "don't be in such haste, I want to speak with you;" at which they both stopped, and looked a little frightened; "Don't be frightened, sweetheart," said I to the maid; "a little of that money in the bottom of your pocket will make all easy, and I will do you no harm." By this time Will came up to us, for they did not see him before; then they began to scream out. "Hold," says I, "make no noise, unless you have a mind to force us to murder you whether we will or no; give me your money presently, and make no words, and we shan't hurt you. Upon this, the poor maid pulled out 5s. 6d., and the old woman a guinea and a shilling, crying heartily for her money, and said, it was all she had left in the world. Well, we took it for all that, though it made my very heart bleed to see what agony the poor woman was in at parting with it, and I asked her where she lived; she said her name was Smith, and she lived at Kentish Town: I said nothing to her, but bid them go on about their business, and I gave Will the money; so in a few minutes we were all together again. Says one of the other rogues, "Come, this is well enough for one road; it's time to be gone." So we jogged away, crossing the fields, out of the path towards Tottenham court; "But hold," says Will, "I must go and untie the man." "D—n him," says one of them, "let him lie." "No," says Will, "I won't be worse than my word, I will untie him." So he went to the place, but the man was gone; either he had untied himself, or somebody had passed by, and he had called for help, and so was untied, for he could not find him, nor make him hear, though he ventured to call twice for him aloud.

This made us hasten away the faster, and getting into Tottenham court road, they thought it was a little too near, so they made into the town at St Giles's, and crossing to Piccadilly, went to Hyde-park gate; here they ventured to rob another coach, that is to say, one of the two other rogues and Will did it between the park gate and Knightsbridge; there was in it only a gentleman and a punk that he had picked up, it seems, at the Spring garden a little farther. They took the gentleman's money, his watch, and his silver-hilted sword; but when they came to the slut, she damned and cursed them for robbing the gentleman of his money, and leaving none for her; as for herself, she had not one sixpenny piece about her, though she was indeed well enough dressed too.

Having made this adventure, we left that road too, and went over the fields to Chelsea. In the way from Westminster to Chelsea, we met three gentlemen, but they were too strong for us to meddle with; they had been afraid to come over the fields so late, (for by this time it was eight o'clock, and though the moon gave some light, yet it was too late and too dark to be safe,) so they hired three men at Chelsea, two with Pitchforks, and the third, a waterman, with a boat-hook staff, to guard them. We would have steered clear of them, and cared not to have them see us, if we could help it; but they did see us, and cried, "Who comes there?" and we answered, "Friends;" and so they went on, to our great satisfaction.

CHAPTER V.

MY NEW PROFESSION VERY HATEFUL TO ME—WILL IS IN GREAT DANGER OF BEING TAKEN FOR A HOUSEBREAKING AT HOUNSLOW—HE LEAVES HIS PLUNDER UNDER MY BED—I MEET WITH HIM BY ACCIDENT, AND RECEIVE HIS DIRECTIONS HOW TO DISPOSE OF THE STOLEN GOODS—I MEET CAPTAIN JACK, WHO INFORMS ME WILL IS COMMITTED TO NEWGATE—I PAY A VISIT TO MY OLD FRIEND MENTIONED IN THE THIRD CHAPTER—CONVERSATION WITH HIM—I AM APPREHENDED—CONSEQUENCES THEREOF.

WHEN we came to Chelsea, it seems we had other work to do, which I had not been made privy to; and this was a house to be robbed. They had some intelligence, it seems, with a servant in the house, who was of their gang; this rogue was a waiting-man, or footman, and he had a watch-word to let them in by; but this fellow, not for want of being a villain, but by getting drunk, and not minding his part of the work, disappointed us; for he had promised to rise at two o'clock in the morning and let us all in, but, being very drunk, and not come in at eleven o'clock, his master ordered him to be shut out, and the doors locked up, and charged the other servants not to let him in upon any terms whatsoever.

We came about the house at one o'clock to make our observations, intending to go and lie under Beaufort House wall till the clock struck two, and then to come again; but, behold, when we came to the house, there lay the fellow at the door fast asleep, and very drunk. Will, who I found was the leader in all these things, waked the fellow, who, as he had had about two hours' sleep, was a little come to himself, and told them the misfortune, as he called it, and that he could not get in. They had some instruments about them by which they could have broken in by force, but Will considered that as it was but waiting till another time, and they should be let in quietly, they resolved to give it over for that time.

But this was a happy drunken bout for the family, for the fellow having let fall some words in his drink (for he was a saucy one as well as a drunken one), and talked oddly, as that it had been better they had let him in, and he would make them pay dear for it, or some such thing, the master, hearing of it, turned him away in the morning, and never let him come into his house again; so, I say, it was a happy drunkenness to the family, for it saved them from being robbed, and perhaps murdered, for they were a cursed bloody crew, and, as I found, were about thirteen of them in all, whereof three of them made it their business to get into gentlemen's services, and so to open doors in the night, and let the other rogues in upon them to rob and destroy them.

I rambled this whole night with them. They went from Chelsea, being disappointed there as above, to Kensington; there they broke into a brewhouse and washhouse, and by that means into an out-kitchen of a gentleman's house, where they unhanged a small copper and brought it off, and stole about a hundred weight of pewter, and went clear off with that too; and, every one going their own byeways, they found means to get safe to their several receptacles where they used to dispose of such things.

We lay still the next day and shared the effects stolen that night, of which my share came to 8*l.* 19*s.* The copper and pewter being weighed and cast up, a person was at hand to take it as money at about half value, and in the afternoon Will and I came away together. Will was mighty full of the success we had had, and how we might be sure of the like this way every day. But he observed that I did not seem so elevated at the success of that night's ramble as I used to be, and also that I did not take any great notice of the expectations he was in of what was to come, yet I had said little to him at that time.

But my heart was full of the poor woman's case at Kentish Town, and I resolved, if possible, to find her out and give her her money. With the abhorrence that filled my mind at the cruelty of that act there necessarily followed a little distaste for the thing itself; and now it came into my head with a double force that this was the high road to the devil, and that certainly this was not the life of a gentleman.

Will and I parted for that time, but next morning we met again, and Will was mighty brisk and merry. "And now, Colonel Jack," says he, "we shall be rich very quickly." "Well," says I, "and what shall we do when we are rich?" "Do," says he, "we will buy a couple of good horses, and go further afield." "What do you mean by further afield?" says I. "Why," says he, "we will take the highway like gentlemen, and then we shall get a great deal of money indeed." "Well," says I, "what then?" "Why, then," says he, "we shall live like gentlemen."

"But, Will," says I, "if we get a great deal of money, shan't we leave this trade off, and sit down and be safe and quiet?"

"Ay," says Will, "when we have got a great estate we shall be willing to lay it down." "But where," says I, "shall we be before that time comes if we should drive on this cursed kind of trade?"

"Prithee never think of that," says Will; "if you think of those things you will never be fit to be a gentleman." He touched me there, indeed, for it ran much in my mind still that I was to be a gentleman, and it made me dumb for awhile; but I came to myself after a little while, and I said to him, pretty tartly, "Why, Will, do you call this way of living the life of a gentleman?"

"Why," says Will, "why not?"

"Why," says I, "was it like a gentleman for me to take that 22*s.* from a poor ancient woman, when she begged of me upon her knees not to take it, and told me it was all she had in the world to buy her bread for herself and a sick child which she had at home? Do you think I could be so cruel if you had not stood by and made me do it; why, I cried at doing it as much as the poor woman did, though I did not let you see me."

"You fool you," says Will, "you will never be fit for our business, indeed, if you mind such things as those; I shall bring you off those things quickly. Why, if you will be fit for business, you must learn to fight when they resist, and cut their throats when they submit; you must learn to stop their breath, that they may beg and pray no more. What signifies pity? Prithee who will pity us when we come to the Old Bailey? I warrant you that whining old woman that begged so heartily for her 22s. would let you and I beg upon our knees, and would not save our lives by not coming in for an evidence against us; did you ever see any of them cry when they see gentlemen go to the gallows?"

"Well, Will," says I, "you had better let us keep to the business we were in before; there were no such cruel doings in that, and yet we got more money by it than I believe we shall get at this."

"No, no," says Will, "you are a fool; you don't know what fine things we shall do in a little while."

Upon this discourse we parted for that time; but I resolved with myself that I would never be concerned with him that way any more. The truth is, they were such a dreadful gang, such horrid, barbarous villains, that even that little while that I was among them my very blood ran cold in my veins at what I heard, particularly the continued raving and damning one another and themselves at every word they spoke; and then the horrid resolutions of murder and cutting throats which I perceived was in their minds upon any occasion that should present. This appeared first in their discourse upon the disappointment they met with at Chelsea, where the two rogues that were with us, ay, and Will too, damned and raged that they could not get into the house, and swore they would have cut the gentleman's throat if they had got in, and shook hands, damning and cursing themselves if they did not murder the whole family as soon as Tom (that was the manservant) could get an opportunity to let them in.

Two days after this Will came to my lodging; for I had now got a room by myself, had bought me tolerable good clothes and some shirts, and began to look like other folks; but, as it happened, I was abroad upon the scout in another way, for, though I was not hardened enough for so black a villain as Will would have had me be, yet I had not arrived to any principle sufficient to keep me from a life, in its degree wicked enough, which tended to the same destruction, though not in so violent and precipitant degrees. I had his message delivered to me, which was to meet him the next evening at such a place, and, as I came in time enough to go, I went to the place, but resolved beforehand that I would not go any more with him among the gang.

However, to my great satisfaction, I missed him, for he did not come at all to the place, but met with the gang at another place, they having sent for him in haste upon the notice of some booty; and so they went all away together. This was a summons, it seems, from one of the creatures which they had abroad in a family where an opportunity offered them to commit a notorious robbery down almost as far as Hounslow, and where they wounded a gentleman's gardener so that I think he died, and robbed the house of a very considerable sum of money and plate.

This, however, was not so clean carried, nor did they get in so easy, but by the resistance they met with, the neighbours were all alarmed, and the gentlemen rogues were pursued, and being at London with the booty, one of them was taken; Will, a dexterous fellow, and head of the gang, made his escape, and though in his clothes, with a great weight about him, of both money and plate, plunged into the Thames, and swam over where there was no path or road leading to the river, so that nobody suspected any one's going that way. Being got over, he made his way, wet as he was, into some woods adjacent, and, as he told me afterwards, not far from Chertsey, and stayed lurking about in the woods or fields thereabout, till his clothes were dry; then, in the night, got down to Kingston, and so to Mortlake, where he got a boat to London.

He knew not that one of his comrades was taken; only he knew that they were all so closely pursued that they were obliged to disperse, and every one to shift for himself. He happened to come home in the evening, as good luck then directed him, just after search had been made for him by the constables; his companion, who was taken, having, upon promise of favour, and of saving him from the gallows, discovered his companions, and Will, among the rest, as the principal party in the whole undertaking.

Will got notice of this just time enough to run for it, and not to be taken; and away he came to look for me; but, as my good fate still directed, I was not at home neither. However, he left all his booty at my lodging, and hid it in an old coat that lay under my bedding, and left word that my brother Will had been there, and had left his coat, that he borrowed of me, and that it was under my bed.

I knew not what to make of it, but went up to go to bed; and, finding the parcel, was perfectly frightened to see, wrapped up in it, above one hundred pounds in plate and money, and yet knew nothing of brother Will, as he called himself, nor did I hear of him for three or four days.

At the end of four days I heard, by great accident, that Will, who used to be seen with me, and who called me brother, was taken, and would be hanged. Next day a poor man, a shoemaker, that used formerly to have a kindness for me, and to send me of errands, and gave me sometimes some victuals, seeing me accidentally in Rosemary lane, going by him, clasped me fast hold by the arm: "Hark ye, young man," says he, "have I caught you?" and he hauled me along as if I had been a thief apprehended, and he the constable. "Hark ye, Colonel Jack," says he again, "come along with me, I must speak with you. What, are you got into this gang too? What, are you turned housebreaker? Come, I'll have you hanged, to be sure."

These were dreadful words to me, who, though not guilty of the particular thing in question, yet was frightened heartily before, and did not know what I might be charged with by Will, if he was taken, as I had heard that very morning he was. With these words the shoemaker began to haul and drag me along as he used to do when I was a boy.

However, recovering my spirits, and provoked to the highest degree, I said to him, "What do you mean, Mr —? Let me alone, or you will oblige me to make you do it;" and with that I stopped short, and soon let him see I was a little too big to be hauled about as I used to be when I ran of his errands, and made a motion with my other hand as if I would strike him in the face.

"How, Jack!" says he, "will you strike me? Will you strike your old friend?" and then he let go my arm, and laughed. "Well, but hark ye, Colonel," says he, "I am in earnest, I hear bad news of you; they say you are gotten into bad company, and that this Will calls you brother; he is a great villain, and I hear he is charged with a bloody robbery, and will be hanged if he is taken. I hope you are not concerned with him; if you are, I would advise you to shift for yourself, for the constable and the headborough are after him to-day, and if he can lay anything to you, he will do it, you may be sure; he will certainly hang you to save himself."

This was kind, and I thanked him; but told him this was a thing too serious, and that had too much weight in it to be jested with, as he had done before; and that some ignorant stranger might have seized upon me as a person guilty, who had no farther concern in it than just knowing the man, and so I might have been brought into trouble for nothing; at least people might have thought I was among them, whether I was or no, and it would have rendered me suspected, though I was innocent.

He acknowledged that; told me he was but in jest, and that he talked to me just as he used to do. "However, Colonel," says he, "I won't jest any more with you in a thing of such a dangerous consequence; I only advise you to keep the fellow company no more."

I thanked him, and went away, but in the greatest perplexity imaginable; and now, not knowing what to do with myself, or with the little ill-gotten wealth which I had, I went musing and alone into the fields towards Stepney, my usual walk, and there began to consider what to do; and as this creature had left his prize in my garret, I began to think, that if he should be taken, and should confess, and send the officers to search there for the goods, and they should find them, I should be undone, and should be taken up for a confederate: whereas I knew nothing of the matter, and had no hand in it.

While I was thus musing, and in great perplexity, I heard somebody hollo to me; and, looking about, I saw Will running after me. I knew not what to think at first; but seeing him alone, was the more encouraged, and I stood still for him. When he came up to me, I said to him, "What is the matter, Will?"—"Matter!" says Will, "matter enough; I am undone. When was you at home?"

"I saw what you left there," says I; "what is the meaning of it, and where got you all that? Is that your being undone?"

"Ay," says Will, "I am undone for all that, for the officers are after me, and I am a dead dog if I am taken, for George is in custody, and he has peached me and all the others to save his life."

"Life!" says I, "why, should you lose your life if they should take you? Pray what would they do to you?"

"Do to me!" says he, "they would hang me if the king had ne'er another soldier in his guards; I shall certainly be hanged as I am now alive."

This frightened me terribly, and I said, "And what will you do then?"—"Nay," says he, "I know not; I would get out of the nation, if I knew how; but I am a stranger to all those things, and I know not what to do, not I. Advise me, Jack," says he, "prithee tell me whither shall I go; I have a good mind to go to sea."

"You talk of going away," says I; "what will you do with all you have hid in my garret; it must not lie there," said I; "for if I should be taken up for it, and it be found to be the money you stole, I shall be ruined."

"I care not what becomes of it, not I," says Will; "I'll be gone; do you take it, if you will, and do what you will with it; I must fly, and I cannot take it with me."—"I won't have it, not I," says I to him; "I'll go and fetch it to you if you will take it," says I, "but I won't meddle with it; besides, there is plate; what shall I do with plate?" said I; "if I should offer to sell it anywhere," said I, "they will stop me."

"As for that," says Will, "I could sell it well enough if I had it, but I must not be seen anywhere among my old acquaintance, for I am blown, and they will all betray me; but I will tell you where you shall go and sell it if you will, and they will ask you no questions, if you give them the word that I will give you." So he gave me the word, and directions to a pawnbroker, near Cloth fair; the word was 'Good tower standard.' Having these instructions, he said to me, "Colonel Jack, I am sure you won't betray me; and I promise you, if I am taken, and should be hanged, I won't name you; I will go to such a house (naming a house at Bromley, by Bow, where he and I had often been,) and there," says he, "I'll stay till it is dark; at night I will come near the streets, and I will lie under such a haystack all night (a place we both knew also very well); and if you cannot finish to come to me there, I will go back to Bow."

I went back and took the cargo, went to the place by Cloth fair, and gave the word, 'Good tower standard;' and, without any words, they took the plate, weighed it, and paid me after the rate of 2s. per ounce for it; so I came away, and went to meet him; but it was too late to meet him at the first place; but I went to the haystack, and there I found him fast asleep.

I delivered him his cargo; what it really amounted to I knew not, for I never told it; but I went home to my quarters very late and tired; I went to sleep at first, but, notwithstanding I was so weary, I slept little or none for several hours; at last, being overcome with sleep, I dropped, but was immediately roused with noise of people knocking at the door, as if they would beat it down, and crying and calling out to the people of the house, "Rise and let in the constable here, we come for your lodger in the garret."

I was frightened to the last degree, and started up in my bed; but when I was awake, I heard no noise at all, but of two watchmen thumping at the doors with their staves, and giving the hour past three o'clock, and a rainy wet morning, for such it was. I was very glad when I found it was but a dream, and went to bed again, but was soon roused a second time with the same, very same noise and words: then, being sooner awaked than I was before, I jumped out of bed, and ran to the window, and found it was just an hour more, and the watchmen were come about past four o'clock, and they went away again very quietly; so I lay me down again, and slept the rest of the night quietly enough.

I laid no stress upon the thing called a dream, neither till now did I understand that dreams were of any importance; but getting up the next day, and going out with a resolution to meet brother Will, who should I meet but my former brother, Captain Jack: when he saw me, he came close to me in his blunt way, and says, "Do you hear the news?" "No, not I," said I; "what news?" "Your old comrade and teacher is taken this morning and carried to Newgate." "How," says I, "this morning?" "Yes," says he, "this morning at four o'clock. He is charged with a robbery and murder somewhere beyond Brentford; and that which is worse, is, that he is impeached by one of the gang, who, to save his own life, has turned evidence; and therefore you had best consider," says the Captain, "what you have to do." "What I have to do?" says I; "and what do you mean by that?" "Nay, Colonel," says he, "don't be angry; you know best if you are not in danger; I am glad of it, but I doubt not but you were with them." "No, not I," said I, again; "I assure you I was not." "Well," says he, "but if you were not with them this bout, you have been with them at other times; and 'twill be all one." "Not I," says I, "you are quite mistaken; I am none of their gang; they are above my quality." With such, and a little more talk of that kind, we parted, and Captain Jack went away; but, as he went, I observed he shook his head, seemed to have more concern upon him than he could be supposed to have merely on my account, of which we shall hear more very quickly.

I was extremely alarmed when I heard Will was in Newgate, and, had I known where to have gone, would certainly have fled as far as legs would have carried me; my very joints trembled, and I was ready to sink into the ground; and all that evening and that night following, I was in the uttermost consternation; my head ran upon nothing but Newgate and the gallows, and being hanged; which, I said, I deserved, if it were for nothing but taking that two-and-twenty shillings from the poor old nurse.

The first thing my perplexed thoughts allowed me to take care of was my money. This indeed lay in a little compass, and I carried it generally all about me. I had got together, as you will perceive by the past account, above sixty pounds, for I spent nothing, and what to do with it I knew not; at last it came into my head that I would go to my benefactor, the clerk at the custom-house, if he was to be found, and see if I could get him to take the rest of my money: the only business was to make a plausible story to him, that he might not wonder how I came by so much money.

But my invention quickly supplied that want; there was a suit of clothes at one of our houses of rendezvous, which was left there for any of the gang to put on, upon particular occasions, as a disguise: this was a green livery, laced with pink-coloured galloon, and lined with the same; an edged hat, a pair of boots, and a whip. I went and dressed myself up in this livery, and went to my gentleman, to his house in Tower street, and there I found him in health, and well, just the same honest gentleman as ever.

He stared at me when first I came to him, for I met him just at his door; I say he stared at me, and seeing me bow and bow to him several times, with my laced hat under my arm; at last, not knowing me in the least, says he to me, "Dost thou want to speak with me, young man?" and I said, "Yes, sir; I believe your worship (I had learnt some manner now) does not know me; I am the poor boy Jack." He looked hard at me, and then recollecting me presently, says he, "Who, Colonel Jack! why, where hast thou been all this while? why, 'tis five or six years since I saw you." "'Tis above six years, and please your worship," says I.

"Well, and where hast thou been all this while?" says he.

"I have been in the country, sir," says I, "at service."

"Well, Colonel Jack, says he, "you give long credit; what's the reason you han't fetched your money all this while, nor the interest? Why, you will grow so rich in time by the interest of your money, you won't know what to do with it."

To that I said nothing, but bowed and scraped a great many times. "Well, come, Colonel Jack," said he, "come in, and I will give you your money, and the interest of it too."

I cringed, and bowed, and told him I did not come to him for my money; for I had had a good place or two, and I did not want my money.

"Well, Colonel Jack," said he, "and who do you live with?"

"Sir Jonathan Loxham," said I, "sir, in Somersetshire, and please your worship." This was a name I had heard of, but knew nothing of any such gentleman, or of the county.

"Well," says he, "but won't you have your money, Jack?"

"No, sir," said I, "if your worship would please, for I have had a good place."

"If I would please to do what, prithee? Your money is ready, I tell thee."

"No, sir," said I, "but I have had a good place."

"Well, and what dost thou mean, Jack? I do not understand thee."

"Why, and please your worship, my old master, Sir Jonathan's father, left me 30*l*. when he died, and a suit of mourning, and—"

"And what, prithee, Jack, what, hast thou brought me more money?" For then he began to understand what I meant.

"Yes, sir," said I, "and your worship would be so good to take it, and put it all together; I have saved some too out of my wages."

"I told you, Jack," says he, "you would be rich; and how much hast thou saved? come, let me see it."

To shorten the story, I pulled it out, and he was content to take it, giving me his note, with interest, for the whole sum, which amounted to ninety-four pounds; that is to say, 25*l*. The first money.

9*l*. For six years' interest.

I came away exceeding joyful, made him abundance of bows and scrapes, and went immediately to shift my clothes again, with a resolution to run away from London, and see it no more for a great while; but I was surprised the very next morning, when, going cross Rosemary lane, by the end of the place which is called Rag fair, I heard one call Jack, he had said something before, which I did not hear, but upon hearing the name Jack, I looked about me, immediately saw three men, and after them a constable coming towards me with great fury. I was in a great surprise, and started to run, but one of them clapped in upon me, and got hold of me, and in a moment the rest surrounded me, and I was taken. I asked them what they wanted, and what I had done? They told me it was no place to talk of that there; but showed me their warrant, and bade me read it, and I should know the rest when I came before the justice; so they hurried me away.

I took the warrant, but, to my great affliction, I could know nothing by that, for I could not read; so I desired them to read it, and they read it, that they were to apprehend a known thief, that went by the name of one of the three Jacks of Rag fair; for that he was charged upon oath with having been a party in a notorious robbery, burglary, and murder, committed so and so, in such a place, and on such a day.

It was to no purpose for me to deny it, or to say I knew nothing of it, that was none of their business they said; that must be disputed, they told me, before the justice, where I would find that it was sworn positively against me, and then, perhaps, I might be better satisfied.

I had no remedy but patience; and, as my heart was full of terror and guilt, so I was ready to die with the weight of it as they carried me along; for as I very well knew that I was guilty of the first day's work, though I was not of the last; so I did not doubt but I should be sent to Newgate, and then I took it for granted I must be hanged; for to go to Newgate, and to be hanged, were to me as things which necessarily followed one another.

But I had a sharp conflict to go through before it came to that part; and that was before the justice; where, when I was come, and the constable brought me in, the justice asked me my name; "but hold," says he, "young man, before I ask you your name, let me do you justice; you are not bound to answer till your accusers come;" so, turning to the constable, he asked for his warrant.

"Well," says the justice, "you have brought this young man here by virtue of this warrant; is this young man the person for whom this warrant is granted?"

Con. "I believe so, and please your worship."

Just. "Believe so! Why, are you not sure of it?"

Con. "An't please your worship, the people said so where I took him."

Just. "It is a very particular kind of warrant; it is to apprehend a young man who goes by the name of Jack, but no surname, only that it is said he is called Captain Jack, or some other such name. Now, young man, pray is your name Captain Jack, or are you usually called so?"

I presently found that the men who took me knew nothing of me, and the constable had taken me up by hearsay; so I took heart and told the justice that I thought, with submission, that it was not the present question what my name was, but what these men, or any one else, had to lay to my charge; whether I was the person whom the warrant empowered them to apprehend or no?

He smiled; "'Tis very true, young man," says he, "it is very true; and on my word, if they have taken you up, and do not know you, and there is nobody to charge you, they will be mistaken to their own damage."

Then I told his worship, I hoped I should not be obliged to tell my name till my accuser was brought to charge me, and then I should not conceal my name.

"It is but reason," said his worship. "Mr Constable," turning to the officers, "are you sure this is the person that is intended in your warrant? If you are not, you must fetch the person that accuses him, and on whose oath the warrant was granted." They used many words to insinuate that I was the person, and that I knew it well enough, and that I should be obliged to tell my name.

I insisted on the unreasonableness of it, and that I should not be obliged to accuse myself; and the justice told them in so many words that he could not force me to it; that I might do it if I would, indeed; "but you see," says the justice, "he understood too well to be imposed upon in that case:" so that, in short, after an hour's debating before his worship, in which time I pleaded against four of them, the justice told them they must produce the accuser, or he must discharge me.

I was greatly encouraged at this, and argued with the more vigour for myself; at length the accuser was brought, fettered as he was, from the gaol, and glad I was when I saw him, and found that I knew him not; that is to say, that it was not one of the two rogues that I went out with that night that we robbed the poor old woman.

When the prisoner was brought into the room, he was set right against me.

"Do you know this young man?" says the justice.

"No, sir," says the prisoner, "I never saw him in my life."

"Hum!" says the justice, "did not you charge one that goes by the name of Jack, or Captain Jack, as concerned in the robbery and murder which you are in custody for?"

Pris. "Yes, an't please your worship," says the prisoner.

Just. "And is this the man, or is he not?"

Pris. "This is not the man, sir; I never saw this man before."

"Very good, Mr Constable," says the justice; "what must we do now?"

"I am surprised," says the constable; "I was at such a house," naming the house, "and this young man went by; the people cried out, 'There's Jack, that's your man,' and these people ran after him, and apprehended him."

"Well," says the justice, "and have these people anything to say to him; can they prove that he is the person?"

One said "No," and the other said "No;" and, in short, they all said "No."—"Why, then," said the justice, "what can be done? The young man must be discharged; and I must tell you, Mr Constable, and you gentlemen that have brought him hither, he may give you trouble, if he thinks fit, for your being so rash; but look you, young man," says the justice, "you have no great damage done you, and the constable, though he has been mistaken, had no ill design but to be faithful to his office; I think you may pass it by."

I told his worship, I would readily pass it by at his direction; but I thought the constable and the rest could do no less than to go back to the place where they had insulted me, and declare publicly there that I was honourably acquitted, and that I was not the man. This his worship said was very reasonable, and the constable and his assistants promised to do it, and so we came all away good friends, and I was cleared with triumph.

NOTE.—This was the time that, as I mentioned above, the justice talked to me, and told me I was born to better things, and that, by my well managing of my own defence, he did not question but I had been well educated; and that he was sorry I should fall into such a misfortune as this, which he hoped, however, would be no dishonour to me, since I was so handsomely acquitted.

CHAPTER VI.

I VISIT WILL, MY TUTOR IN WICKEDNESS, IN NEWGATE—HE IS EXECUTED—CAPTAIN JACK PROPOSES TO ME TO FLY INTO SCOTLAND—I RETURN THE POOR OLD WOMAN THE MONEY I HAD FORMERLY ROBBED HER OF—CAPTAIN JACK AND I SET OUT ON OUR JOURNEY NORTH—THE CAPTAIN'S ROGUERIES, AND VARIOUS ADVENTURES ON THE ROAD.

THOUGH his worship was mistaken in the matter of my education, yet it had this good effect upon me, that I resolved, if possible, I would learn to read and write, that I would not be such an incapable creature that I should not be able to read a warrant, and see whether I was the person to be apprehended or not.

But there was something more in all this than what I have taken notice of; for, in a word, it appeared plainly that my brother, Capt. Jack, who had the forwardness to put it to me, "Whether I was among them or no?" when in truth he was there himself, had the only reason to be afraid and to fly, at the same time that he advised me to shift for myself.

As this presently occurred to my thoughts, so I made it my business to inquire and find him out, and give him notice of it.

In the meantime, being now confident of my own safety, I had no more concern upon my mind about myself; but now I began to be anxious for poor Will, my master and tutor in wickedness, who was now fast by the heels in Newgate, while I was happily at liberty, and I wanted very much to go and see him, and accordingly did so.

I found him in a sad condition, laden with heavy irons, and having himself no prospect or hope of escaping. He told me he should die, but bid me be easy, for, as it would do him no good to accuse me, who never was out with any of them but that once, so I might depend upon it he would not bring me into the trouble; as for the rogue who had betrayed them all, he was not able to hurt me, for I might be satisfied he had never seen me in his life. "But, Colonel Jack," says he, "I will tell you who was with us, and that is your brother the captain, and the villain has certainly named him; and, therefore," says he, "if you can give him timely notice of it, do, that he may make his escape."

He said a great many things to warn me of following the steps he had led me. "I was far out, Jack," said he, "when I told you to be a notorious thief was to live like a gentleman." He chiefly discovered his concern that they had, as he feared, killed the gentleman's gardener, and that he in particular had given him a wound in the neck of which he was afraid he would die.

He had a great sum of money in gold about him, being the same that I had carried back to him at the haystack, and he had concealed it so well that those that took him had not found it, and he gave me the greatest part of it to carry to his mother, which I very honestly delivered, and came away with a heavy heart; nor did I ever see him since, for he was executed in about three weeks' time after, being condemned that very next sessions.

I had nothing to do now but to find the captain, who, though not without some trouble, I at last got news of, and told him the whole story, and how I had been taken up for him by mistake, and was come off, but that the warrant was still out for him, and very strict search after him. I say, telling him all this, he presently discovered by his surprise that he was guilty, and, after a few words more, told me plainly it was all true, that he was in the robbery, and that he had the greatest part of the booty in keeping, but what to do with it or himself he did not know, and wanted me to tell him, which I was very unfit to do, for I knew nothing of the world. Then he told me he had a mind to fly into Scotland, which was easy to be done, and asked me if I would go with him. I told him I would with all my heart if I had money enough to bear the charge. He had the trade still in his eyes by his answer. "I warrant you," says he, "we will make the journey pay our charge." "I dare not think of going any more upon the adventure," says I; "besides, if we meet with any misfortune out of our knowledge we shall never get out of it, we shall be undone." "Nay," says he, "we shall find no mercy here if they can catch us, and they can do no worse abroad; I am for venturing at all events."

"Well, but captain," says I, "have you husbanded your time so ill that you have no money to supply you in such a time as this?" "I have very little, indeed," said he, "for I have had bad luck lately." But he lied, for he had a great share of the booty they had got at their last adventure, as above; and, as the rest complained, he and Will had got almost all of it, and kept the rest out of their shares, which made them the willinger to discover them.

However as it was, he owned he had about 22*l.* in money, and something that would yield money; I suppose it was plate; but he would not tell me what it was or where it was, but he said he durst not go to fetch it, for he should be betrayed and seized, so he would venture without it. "Sure," says he, "we shall come back again some time or other."

I honestly produced all the money I had, which was 16*l.* and some odd shillings. "Now," says I, "if we are good husbands, and travel frugally, this will carry us quite out of danger;" for we had both been assured that when we went out of England we should be both safe, and nobody could hurt us though they had known us; but we neither of us thought it was so many weary steps to Scotland as we found it.

I speak of myself as in the same circumstances of danger with brother Jack; but it was only thus, I was in as much fear as he, but not in quite as much danger.

I cannot omit, that, in the interval of these things, and a few days before I carried my money to the gentleman in Tower street, I took a walk all alone into the fields in order to go to Kentish Town and do justice to the poor old nurse; it happened that before I was aware I crossed a field that came to the very spot where I robbed the poor old woman and the maid, or where, I should say, Will made me rob them. My heart had reproached me many a time with that cruel action, and many a time I had promised to myself that I would find a way to make her satisfaction and restore her money, and that day I had set apart for the work, but was a little surprised that I came so suddenly upon the unhappy spot.

The place brought to my mind the villany I had committed there, and something struck me with a kind of wish, I cannot say prayer, for I knew not what that meant, that I might leave off that cursed trade; and I said to myself, "O, that I had some trade to live by; I would never rob no more, for sure 'tis a wicked, abominable thing."

Here, indeed, I felt the loss of what just parents do, and ought to do, by all their children; I mean being bred to some trade or employment; and I wept many times that I knew not what to do, or what to turn my hand to, though I resolved to leave off the wicked course I was in.

But to return to my journey. I asked my way to Kentish Town, and it happened to be of a poor woman that said she lived there; upon which intelligence I asked her if she knew a woman that lived there, whose name was Smith. She answered, yes, very well; that she was not a settled inhabitant, only a lodger in the town, but that she was an honest, poor, industrious woman, and, by her labour and pains, maintained a diseased husband that had been unable to help himself some years.

"What a villain have I been," said I to myself, "that I should rob such a poor woman as this, and add grief and tears to her misery, and to the sorrows of her house!" This quickened my resolution to restore her money, and not only so, but I resolved I would give her something over and above her loss; so I went forward, and, by the direction I had received, found her lodging with very little trouble; then, asking for the woman, she came to the door immediately, for she heard me ask for her by her name of a little girl that came first to the door. I presently spoke to her. "Dame," said I, "was not you robbed about a year ago, as you was coming home from London, about the Pindar of Wakefield?" "Yes, indeed I was," says she, "and sadly frightened into the bargain." "And how much did you lose?" said I. "Indeed," says she, "I lost all the money I had in the world; I am sure I worked hard for it, it was money for keeping a nurse child that I had then, and I had been at London to receive it." "But how much was it, dame?" said I. "Why," says she, "it was 22*s.* and 6½*d.*; 21*s.* I had been to fetch, and the odd money was my own before."

"Well, look you, good woman, what will you say if I should put you in a way to get your money again? for I believe the fellow that took it is fast enough now, and perhaps I may do you a kindness in it, and for that I came to see you." "O dear!" says the old woman, "I understand you, but indeed I cannot swear to the man's face again, for it was dark; and, besides, I would not hang the poor wretch for my money; let him live and repent." "That is very kind," says I, "more than he deserves from you; but you need not be concerned about that, for he will be hanged whether you appear against him or not: but are you willing to have your money again that you lost?" "Yes, indeed," said the woman, "I should be glad of that, for I have not been so hard put to it for money a great while as I am now; I have much ado to find us bread to eat, though I work hard early and late." And with that she cried.

I thought it would have broke my very heart, to think how this poor creature worked, and was a slave at near threescore, and that I, a young fellow of hardly twenty, should rob her of her bread to support my idleness and wicked life; and the tears came into my eyes in spite of all my struggling to prevent it, and the woman perceived it too. "Poor woman," said I, "'tis a sad thing such creatures as these should plunder and strip such a poor object as thou art! Well, he is at leisure now to repent it, I assure you." "I perceive, sir," says she, "you are very compassionate indeed; I wish he may improve the time God has spared him, and that he may repent, and I pray God give him repentance; whoever he is, I forgive him, whether he can make me recompence or not, and I pray God forgive him; I won't do him any prejudice, not I;" and with that, she went on praying for me. "Well, dame, come hither to me," says I; and with that I put my hand into my pocket, and she came to me. "Hold up your hand," said I, which she did, and I told her nine half-crowns into her hand; "there, dame," said I, "is your 22*s.* 6*d.* you lost; I assure you, dame," said I, "I have been the chief instrument to get it of him for you; for, ever since he told me the story of it among the rest of his wicked exploits, I never gave him any rest till I made him promise to make restitution." All the while I held her hand and put the money into it, I looked in her face, and I perceived her colour come and go, and that she was under the greatest surprise of joy imaginable.

"Well, God bless him," says she, "and spare him from the disaster he is afraid of, if it be his will; for sure, this is an act of so much justice, and so honest, that I never expected the like." She ran on a great while so, and wept for him, when I told her I doubted there was no room to expect his life. "Well," says she, "then pray God give him repentance, and bring him to heaven, for sure he must have something that is good at the bottom; he has a principle of honesty at the bottom to be sure, however he may have been brought into bad courses by bad company, or evil example, or other temptations: but I dare say he will be brought to repentance one time or other before he dies."

All this touched me nearer than she imagined; for I was the man that she prayed for all this while, though she did not know it, and in my heart I said Amen to it; for I was sensible that I had done one of the vilest actions in the world, in attacking a poor creature in such a condition, and not listening to her entreaties, when she begged so heartily for that little money we took from her.

In a word, the good woman so moved me with her charitable prayers, that I put my hand in my pocket again for her; "Dame," said I, "you are so charitable in your petitions for this miserable creature, that it puts me in mind of one thing more which I will do for him, whether he ordered me or not; and that is, to ask you forgiveness for the thief in robbing you; for it was an offence, and a trespass against you, as well as an injury to you; and therefore I ask your pardon for him: will you sincerely and heartily forgive him, dame? I do desire it of you;" and with that I stood up, and, with my hat off, asked her pardon. "O! sir," says she, "do not stand up, and with your hat off to me! I am a poor woman; I forgive him, and all that were with him; for there was one or more with him; I forgive them with all my heart, and I pray God to forgive them."

"Well, dame, then," said I, "to make you some recompence for your charity, there is something for you more than your loss," and with that I gave her a crown more.

Then I asked her who that was who was robbed with her? She said it was a servant maid that lived then in the town, but she was gone from her place, and she did not know where she lived now. "Well, dame," says I, "if ever you do hear of her, let her leave word where she may be found; and if I live to come and see you again, I will get the money of him for her too: I think that was but little, was it?" "No," says she, "it was but 5s. 6d."—which I knew as well as she. "Well," says I, "dame, inquire her out if you have an opportunity;" so she promised me she would, and away I came.

The satisfaction this gave me was very much; but then a natural consequence attended it, which filled me with reflection afterwards; and this was, that, by the same rule, I ought to make restitution to all that I had wronged, in the like manner; and what could I do as to that? To this I knew not what to say, and so the thought in time wore off; for, in short, it was impossible to be done: I had not ability, neither did I know any of the people whom I had so injured; and that satisfying me for the present, I let it drop.

I come now to my journey with Captain Jack, my supposed brother. We set out from London on foot, and travelled the first day to Ware, for we had learnt so much of our road that the way lay through that town; we were weary enough the first day, having not been used at all to travelling; but we made shift to walk once up and down the town after we came into it.

I soon found that his walking out to see the town was not to satisfy his curiosity in viewing the place, for he had no notion of anything of that kind; but to see if he could light of any purchase, for he was so natural a thief, that he could see nothing on the road, but it occurred to him how easily that might be taken, and how cleverly this might be carried off, and the like.

Nothing offered in Ware to his mind, it not being market day; and as for me, though I made no great scruple of eating and drinking at the cost of his roguery, yet I resolved not to enter upon anything, as they called it, nor to take the least thing from anybody.

When the captain found me resolved upon the negative, he asked me how I thought to travel? I asked him what he thought of himself, that was sure to be hanged if he was taken, how small soever the crime was that he should be taken for. "How can that be?" says he; "they don't know me in the country." "Ay," says I, "but do you think they do not send up word to Newgate as soon as any thief is taken in the country, and so inquire who is escaped from them, or who is fled, so that they may be stopped? Assure yourself," says I, "the jailors correspond with one another with the greatest exactness imaginable; and if you were taken here but for stealing a basket of eggs, you shall have your accuser sent down to see if he knows you."

This terrified him a little for a while, and kept him honest for three or four days; but it was but for a few days indeed, for he played a great many rogue's tricks without me, till at last he came to his end without me too, though it was not till many years after, as you shall hear in its order: but as these exploits are no part of my story, but of his, whose life and exploits are sufficient to make a volume larger than this by itself, so I shall omit everything but what I was particularly concerned in during this tedious journey.

From Ware we travelled to Cambridge, though that was not our direct road; the occasion was this: in our way, going through a village called Puckeridge, we baited at an inn, at the sign of the Falcon, and while we were there, a countryman comes to the inn, and hangs his horse at the door, while he goes in to drink; we sat in the gate-way, having called for a mug of beer, and drank it up: we had been talking with the ostler about the way to Scotland, and he had bid us ask the road to Royston; "but," says he, "there is a turning just here a little farther, you must not go that way, for that goes to Cambridge."

We had paid for our beer, and sat at the door only to rest us, when on the sudden comes a gentleman's coach to the door, and three or four horsemen; the horsemen rode into the yard, and the ostler was obliged to go in with them; says he to the captain, "Young man, pray take hold of the horse (meaning the countryman's horse I mentioned above), and take him out of the way, that the coach may come up." He did so, and beckoned me to follow him; we walked together to the turning: says he to me, "Do you step before and turn up the lane, I'll overtake you;" so I went on up the lane, and in a few minutes he was got up upon the horse and at my heels. "Come, get up," says he; "we will have a lift, if we don't get the horse by the bargain."

I made no difficulty to get up behind him, and away we went at a good round rate, it being a good strong horse. We lost no time for an hour's riding and more, by which time we thought we were out of the reach of being pursued; and as the countryman, when he should miss his horse, would hear that we inquired the way to Royston, he would certainly pursue us that way, and not towards Cambridge. We went easier after the first hour's riding, and, coming through a town or two, we alighted by turns, and did not ride double through the villages.

Now, as it was impossible for the captain to pass by anything that he could lay his hand on, and not take it, so now, having a horse to carry it off too, the temptation was the stronger. Going through a village where a good housewife of the house had been washing, and hung her clothes out upon a hedge near the road, he could not help it, but got hold of a couple of good shirts, that were about half dry, and overtook me upon the spur, for I walked on before; I immediately got up behind, and away we galloped together as fast as the horse could well go. In this part of our expedition, his good luck, or mine, carried us quite out of the road; and having seen none to ask the way of, we lost ourselves, and wandered I know not how many miles to the right hand, till, partly by that means, and partly by the occasion following, we came quite into the coach road to Cambridge, from London, by Bishop-Stratford. The particular occasion that made me wander on was thus; the country was all open corn-fields, no enclosures; when, being upon a little rising ground, I bade him stop the horse, for I would get down, and walk a little to ease my legs, being tired with riding so long behind without stirrups; when I was down, and looked a little about me, I saw plainly the great white road, which we should have gone, at near two miles from us.

On a sudden, looking a little back to my left upon that road, I saw four or five horsemen riding full speed, some a good way before the other, and hurrying on, as people in a full pursuit.

It immediately struck me. "Ha! brother Jack," says I, "get off the horse this moment, and ask why afterwards;" so he jumps off. "What is the matter?" says he. "The matter!" says I; "look yonder; it is well we have lost our way; do you see how they ride? they are pursuing us, you may depend upon it; either," says I, "you are pursued from the last village for the two shirts, or from Puckeridge for the horse." He had so much presence of mind, that, without my mentioning it to him, he puts back the horse behind a great white thorn-bush, which grew just by him; so they could by no means see the horse, which, we being just at the top of the hill, they might otherwise have done, and so have pursued that way at a venture.

But as it was impossible for them to see the horse, so was it as impossible for them to see us at that distance, who sat down on the ground to look at them the more securely.

The road winding about, we saw them a great way, and they rode as fast as they could make their horses go. When we found they were gone quite out of sight, we mounted, and made the best of our way also; and indeed, though we were two upon one horse, yet we abated no speed where the way would admit of it, not inquiring of anybody the way to anywhere, till, after about two hours' riding, we came to a town, which, upon inquiry, they called Chesterford; and here we stopped, and asked not our way to any place, but whither that road went, and were told it was the coach road to Cambridge; also that it was the way to Newmarket, to St Edmund's-bury, to Norwich and Yarmouth, to Lynn and to Ely, and the like.

We stayed here a good while, believing ourselves secure; and afterwards, towards evening, went forward to a place called Bourn-bridge, where the road to Cambridge turns away out of the road to Newmarket, and where there are but two houses only, both of them being inns. Here the captain says to me, "Hark ye, you see we are pursued towards Cambridge, and shall be stopped if we go thither; now Newmarket is but ten miles off, and there we may be safe, and perhaps get an opportunity to do some business."

"Look ye, Jack," said I, "talk no more of doing business, for I will not join with you in anything of that kind; I would fain get you to Scotland before you get a halter about your neck; I will not have you hanged in England, if I can help it, and therefore I won't go to Newmarket, unless you promise me to take no false steps there." "Well," says he, "if I must not, then I won't; but I hope you will let us get another horse, won't you, that we may travel faster?" "No," says I, "I won't agree to that; but if you will let me send this horse back fairly, I will tell you how we shall hire horses afterwards for one stage or two, and then take them as far as we please; it is only sending a letter to the owner to send for him, and then, if we are stopped, it can do us but little hurt."

"You are a wary, politic gentleman," says the captain, "but, I say, we are better as we are; for we are out of all danger of being stopped on the way, after we are gone from this place."

We had not parleyed thus long, but, though in the dead of the night, came a man to the other inn door—for, as I said above, there are two inns at that place,—and called for a pot of beer, but the people were all in bed, and would not rise; he asked them if they had seen two fellows come that way upon one horse: the man said he had, that they went by in the afternoon, and asked the way to Cambridge, but did not stop only to drink one mug. "O!" says he, "are they gone to Cambridge? Then I'll be with them quickly." I was awake in a little garret of the next inn, where we lodged; and hearing the fellow call at the door, got up, and went to the window, having some uneasiness at every noise I heard; and by that means heard the whole story. Now, the case is plain, our hour was not come, our fate had determined other things for us, and we were to be reserved for it; the matter was thus: when we first came to Bourn bridge, we called at the first house, and asked the way to Cambridge, drank a mug of beer, and went on, and they might see us turn off to go the way they directed; but, night coming on, and we being very weary, we thought we should not find the way; and we came back in the dusk of the evening, and went into the other house, being the first as we came back, as that, where we called before, was the first as we went forward.

You may be assured I was alarmed now, as indeed I had reason to be: the captain was in bed, and fast asleep, but I waked him, and roused him with a noise that frightened him enough. "Rise, Jack," said I; "we are both ruined; they are come after us hither." Indeed, I was wrong to terrify him at that rate; for he started, and jumped out of bed, and ran directly to the window, not knowing where he was, and, not quite awake, was just going to jump out of the window, but I laid hold of him. "What are you going to do?" says I. "I won't be taken," says he; "let me alone: where are they?"

This was all confusion; and he was so out of himself with the fright, and being overcome with sleep, that I had much to do to prevent his jumping out of the window: however, I held him fast, and thoroughly wakened him, and then all was well again, and he was presently composed.

Then I told him the story, and we sat together upon the bed-side, considering what we should do: upon the whole, as the fellow that called was apparently gone to Cambridge, we had nothing to fear, but to be quiet till day-break, and then to mount and be gone.

Accordingly, as soon as day peeped we were up; and having happily informed ourselves of the road the other house, and being told that the road to Cambridge turned off on the left hand, and that the road to Newmarket lay straight forward; I say, having learnt this, the captain told me he would walk away on foot towards Newmarket; and so, when I came to go out, I should appear as a single traveller; and accordingly he went out immediately, and away he walked, and he travelled so hard that, when I came to follow, I thought once that he had dropped me, for though I rode hard, I got no sight of him for an hour; at length, having passed the great bank called the devil's-ditch, I found him, and took him up behind me, and we rode double till we came almost to the end of Newmarket town. Just at the hither house in the town, stood a horse at a door, just as it was at Puckeridge. "Now," says Jack, "if the horse was at the other end of the town, I would have him, as sure as we had the other at Puckeridge;" but it would not do, so he got down, and walked through the town on the right hand side of the way.

He had not got half through the town, but the horse, having somehow or other got loose, came trotting gently on by himself, and nobody following him; the captain, an old soldier at such work, as soon as the horse was got a pretty way before him, and that he saw nobody followed, sets up a run after the horse; and the horse hearing him follow, ran the faster; then the captain calls out, "Stop the horse!" and by this time the horse was got almost to the farther end of the town; the people of the house where he stood not missing him all the while.

Upon his calling out, "Stop the horse!" the poor people of the town, such as were next at hand, ran from both sides the way, and stopped the horse for him as readily as could be, and held him for him till he came up; he very gravely comes up to the horse, hits him a blow or two, and calls him dog for running away; gives the man 2d. that caught him for him, mounts, and away he comes after me.

This was the oddest adventure that could have happened, for the horse stole the captain, the captain did not steal the horse. When he came up to me, "Now, Colonel Jack," says he, "what say you to good luck? would you have had me refuse the horse, when he came so civilly to ask me to ride?"

"No, no," said I; "you have got this horse by your wit, not by design; and you may go now, I think; you are in a safer condition than I am, if we are taken."

The next question was, what road we should take? here were four ways before us, and we were alike strangers to them all; first on the right hand, and at a little mile from the town, a great road went off to St Edmund's-bury; straight on, but inclining afterwards to the right, lay the great road to Barton-mills and Thetford, and so to Norwich; and full before us lay a great road also to Brandon and Lynn; and on the left lay a less road to the city of Ely, and into the Fens.

In short, as we knew not which road to take, nor which way to get into the great north road, which we had left, so we, by mere unguided chance, took the way to Brandon, and so to Lynn: at Brand, or Brandon, we were told, that passing over at a place called Downham-bridge, we might cross the fen country to Wisbeach; and from thence go along the bank of the river Nyne to Peterborough, and from thence to Stamford, where we were in the northern road again: and likewise, that at Lynn we might go by the washes into Lincolnshire, and so might travel north. But, upon the whole, this was my rule, that, when we inquired the way to any particular place, to be sure we never took the road, but some other, which the accidental discourse we might have should bring in; and thus we did here; for, having chiefly asked our way into the northern road, we resolved to go directly for Lynn.

CHAPTER VII.

FURTHER ADVENTURES—THERE IS NO PREVENTING MY COMRADE FROM EXERCISING HIS TRADE OF A THIEF—WE WITNESS A WHIPPING IN EDINBURGH—THE CAPTAIN TAKES FRENCH LEAVE—I RETURN MY HORSE TO THE PERSON FROM WHOM IT WAS STOLEN—LEARN TO READ AND WRITE—I AM HIRED AND CHEATED BY A SCOTTISH MASTER—MEET WITH THE CAPTAIN AGAIN—I ENLIST FOR A SOLDIER—WE DESERT—ADVENTURES THEREUPON.

We arrived here very easy and safe; and, while we were considering of what way we should travel next, we found we were got to a point, and that there was no way now left but that by the washes into Lincolnshire, and that was represented as very dangerous; so an opportunity offering of a man that was travelling over the fens, we took him for our guide, and went with him to Spalding, and from thence to a town called Deeping, and so to Stamford in Lincolnshire.

This is a large populous town, and it was market-day when we came to it; so we put in at a little house at the hither end of the town, and walked into the town.

Here it was not possible to restrain my captain from playing his feats of art, and my heart ached for him; I told him I would not go with him, for he would not promise to leave off, and I was so terribly concerned at the apprehension of his venturous humour, that I would not so much as stir out of my lodging; but it was in vain to persuade him. He went into the market, and found a mountebank there, which was what he wanted. How he picked two pockets there in one quarter of an hour, and brought to our quarters a piece of new holland of eight or nine ells, a piece of stuff, and played three or four pranks more in less than two hours; and how afterwards he robbed a doctor of physic, and yet came off clear; all this I say, as above, belongs to his story, not mine.

I scolded heartily at him when he came back, and told him he would certainly ruin himself, and me too, before he left off, and threatened in so many words that I would leave him and go back, and carry the horse to Puckeridge, where we borrowed it, and so go to London by myself.

He promised amendment; but as we resolved (now we were in the great road) to travel by night, so it being not yet night, he gives me the slip again, and was not gone half an hour but he comes back with a gold watch in his hand: "Come," says he, "why an't you ready? I am ready to go as soon as you will;" and with that he pulls out the gold watch. I was amazed at such a thing as that in a country town; but it seems there were prayers at one of the churches in the evening, and he, placing himself as the occasion directed, found the way to be so near a lady as to get it from her side, and walked off with it unperceived.

The same night we went away by moonlight, after having the satisfaction to hear the watch cried, and ten guineas offered for it again; he would have been glad of the ten guineas instead of the watch, but durst not venture to carry it home. "Well," says I, "you are afraid, and indeed you have reason; give it me, I will venture to carry it again;" but he would not let me, but told me that, when we came into Scotland, we might sell any thing there without danger; which was true indeed, for there they asked us no questions.

We set out, as I said, in the evening by moonlight, and travelled hard, the road being very plain and large, till we came to Grantham, by which time it was about two in the morning, and all the town, as it were, dead asleep; so we went on for Newark, which we reached about eight in the morning, and there we lay down and slept most of the day; and by this sleeping so continually in the day-time, I kept him from doing a great deal of mischief, which he would otherwise have done.

From Newark we took advice of one that was accidentally comparing the roads, and we concluded that the road by Nottingham would be the best for us; so we turned out of the great road, and went up the side of the Trent to Nottingham: here he played his pranks again in a manner that it was the greatest wonder imaginable to me that he was not surprised, and yet he came off clear; and now he had got so many bulky goods that he bought him a portmanteau to carry them in. It was in vain for me to offer to restrain him any more, so after this he went on his own way.

At Nottingham, I say, he had such success as made us the hastier to be going than otherwise we should have been, lest we should have been baulked and should be laid hold of; from thence we left the road, which leads to the north again, went away by Mansfield into Scarsdale, in Yorkshire.

I shall take up no more of my own story with his pranks; they very well merit to be told by themselves, but I shall observe only what relates to our journey. In a word, I dragged him along as fast as I could, till I came to Leeds in Yorkshire. Here, though it be a large and populous town, yet he could make nothing of it, neither had he any success at Wakefield; and he told me, in short, that the north-country people were certainly all thieves. "Why so?" said I; "the people seem to be just as other people are."—"No, no," says he, "they have their eyes so about them, and are all so sharp, they look upon everybody that comes near them to be a pickpocket, or else they would never stand so upon their guard; and then again," says he, "they are so poor, there is but little to be got; and I am afraid," says he, "the farther we go north we shall find it worse."—"Well," said I, "what do you infer from thence?"—"I argue from thence," says he, "that we shall do nothing there, and I had as good go back into the south and be hanged, as into the north to be starved."

Well, we came at length to Newcastle upon Tyne. Here, on a market day, was a great throng of people, and several of the town's-people going to market to buy provisions; and here he played his pranks, cheated a shopkeeper of 15*l.* or 16*l.* in goods, and got clear away with them; stole a horse, and sold that he came upon, and played so many pranks, that I was quite frightened for him; I say for him, for I was not concerned for myself, having never stirred out of the house where I lodged, at least not with him, nor without some or other with me belonging to the inn, that might give an account of me.

Nor did I use this caution in vain, for he had made himself so public by his rogueries, that he was waylaid everywhere to be taken, and had he not artfully first given out, that he was come from Scotland, and was going towards London, inquiring that road and the like, which amused his pursuers for the first day, he had been taken, and in all probability had been hanged there, but by that artifice he got half a day's time of them; and yet, as it was, he was put so to it, that he was fain to plunge, horse and all, into the river Tweed and swim over, and thereby made his escape. It was true that he was before upon Scots ground (as they called it), and consequently they had no power to have carried him off if anybody had opposed them; yet, as they were in a full chase after him, could they have come up with him, they would have run the risk of the rest, and they could but have delivered him up if they had been questioned about it. However, as he got over the Tweed, and was landed safe, they could neither follow him, the water being too high at the usual place of going over, nor could they have attempted to have brought him away if they had taken him: the place where he took the river was where there is a ford below Kelso, but the water being up, the ford was not passable, and he had no time to go to the ferry-boat, which is about a furlong off, opposite to the town.

Having thus made his escape, he went to Kelso, where he had appointed me to come after him.

I followed with a heavy heart, expecting every hour to meet him upon the road, in the custody of the constables, and such people, or to hear of him in the gaol; but when I came to a place on the border, called Woller-haugh-head, there I understood how he had been chased, and how he had made his escape.

When I came to Kelso, he was easy enough to be found; for his having desperately swam the Tweed, a rapid and large river, made him much talked of, though it seems they had not heard of the occasion of it, nor anything of his character; for he had wit enough to conceal all that, and live as retired as he could till I came to him.

I was not so much rejoiced at his safety as I was provoked at his conduct; and the more, for that I could not find he had yet the least notion of his having been void of common sense with respect to his circumstances, as well as contrary to what he promised me. However, as there was no beating anything into his head by words, I only told him, that I was glad he was at last gotten into a place of safety, and I asked him then how he intended to manage himself in that country? He said in a few words, he did not know yet, he doubted the people were very poor; but if they had any money, he was resolved to have some of it.

"But do you know too," says I, "that they are the severest people upon criminals of your kind in the world?" He did not value that, he said, in his blunt short way, he would venture it; upon this I told him that, seeing it was so, and he would run such ventures, I would take my leave of him, and be gone back to England. He seemed sullen, or rather it was the roughness of his untractable disposition; he said I might do what I would, he would do as he found opportunity; however, we did not part immediately, but went on towards the capital city; on the road we found too much poverty, and too few people, to give him room to expect any advantage in his way; and though he had his eyes about him as sharp as a hawk, yet he saw plainly there was nothing to be done; for as to the men, they did not seem to have much money about them; and for the women, their dress was such, that had they any money, or indeed any pockets, it was impossible to come at them; for, wearing large plaids about them, and down to their knees, they were wrapped up so close, that there was no coming to make the least attempt of that kind.

Kelso was indeed a good town, and had abundance of people in it; and yet, though he staid one Sunday there, and saw the church, which is very large, and thronged with people; yet, as he told me, there was not one woman to be seen in all the church with any other dress than a plaid, except in two pews, which belonged to some noblemen, and who, when they came out, were so surrounded with footmen and servants, that there was no coming near them, any more than there was any coming near the king surrounded by his guards.

We set out therefore with this discouragement, which I was secretly glad of, and went forward for Edinburgh. All the way thither we went through no considerable town, and it was but very coarse travelling for us, who were strangers; for we met with waters which were very dangerous to pass, by reason of hasty rains, at a place called Lauderdale, and where my captain was really in danger of drowning, his horse being driven down by the stream, and fell under him, by which he wetted and spoiled his stolen goods, that he brought from Newcastle, and which he had kept dry strangely, by holding them up in his arms, when he swam the Tweed; but here it wanted but little, that he and his horse had been lost, not so much by the depth of the water, as the fury of the current; but he had a proverb in his favour, and he got out of the water, though with difficulty enough, not being born to be drowned, as I shall observe afterwards in its place.

We came to Edinburgh, the third day from Kelso, having stopped at an inn one whole day, at a place called Soutra-hill, to dry our goods and refresh ourselves. We were oddly saluted at Edinburgh, the next day after we came thither; my captain having a desire to walk, and look about him, asked me if I would go and see the town? I told him yes; so we went out, and coming through a gate, that they call the Netherbow, into the great High street, which went up to the Cross, we were surprised to see it thronged with an infinite number of people: Ay (says my captain) this will do; however, as I had made him promise to make no adventures that day, otherwise I told him I would not go out with him, so I held him by the sleeve, and would not let him stir from me.

Then we came up to the Market-cross, and there, besides the great number of people who passed and repassed, we saw a great parade, or kind of meeting, like an Exchange of gentlemen, of all ranks and qualities, and this encouraged my captain again, and he pleased himself with that sight.

It was while we were looking and wondering at what we saw here that we were surprised with a sight which we little expected. We observed the people running on a sudden, as to see some strange thing just coming along, and strange it was, indeed; for we saw two men naked from the waist upwards run by us as swift as the wind, and we imagined nothing but that it was two men running a race for some mighty wager. On a sudden we found two long small ropes or lines, which hung down at first, pulled strait, and the two racers stopped, and stood still one close by the other. We could not imagine what this meant; but the reader may judge at our surprise when we found a man follow after who had the ends of both those lines in his hands, and who, when he came up to them, gave each of them two frightful lashes with a wire-whip, or lash, which he held in the other hand; and then the two poor naked wretches run on again to the length of their line or tether, where they waited for the like salutation; and in this manner they danced the length of the whole street, which is about half a mile.

This was a dark prospect to my captain, and put him in mind, not only of what he was to expect if he made a slip in the way of his profession in this place, but also of what he had suffered when he was but a boy at the famous place called Bridewell.

But this was not all; for, as we saw the execution, so we were curious to examine into the crime too; and we asked a young fellow who stood near us what the two men had done for which they suffered that punishment? The fellow, an unhappy ill-natured Scotchman, perceived by our speech that we were Englishmen, and by our question that we were strangers, told us, with a malicious wit, that they were two Englishmen, and that they were whipped so for picking pockets and other petty thieveries, and that they were afterwards to be sent away over the border into England.

Now this was every word of it false, and was only formed by his nimble invention to insult us as Englishmen; for, when we inquired further, they were both Scotchmen, and were thus scourged for the usual offences for which we give the like punishment in England; and the man who held the line and scourged them was the city hangman, who, by the way, is there an officer of note, has a constant salary, and is a man of substance; and not only so, but a most dexterous fellow in his office, and makes a great deal of money of his employment.

This sight, however, was very shocking to us; and my captain turned to me; "Come," says he, "let us go away; I won't stay here any longer." I was glad to hear him say so, but did not think he had meant or intended what he said; however, we went back to our quarters, and kept pretty much within, only that in the evenings we walked about. But even then my captain found no employment, no encouragement; two or three times, indeed, he made a prize of some mercery and millinery goods; but when he had them he knew not what to do with them, so that, in short, he was forced to be honest, in spite of his good will to be otherwise.

We remained here about a month; when, on a sudden, my captain was gone, horse and all, and I knew nothing what was become of him, nor did I ever see or hear of him for eighteen months after, nor did he so much as leave the least notice for me either whither he was gone or whether he would return to Edinburgh again or no.

I took his leaving me very heinously, not knowing what to do with myself, being a stranger in the place; and, on the other hand, my money abated apace too. I had for the most part of this time my horse upon my own hands to keep; and, as horses yield but a sorry price in Scotland, I found no opportunity to make much of him; and, on the other hand, I had a secret resolution, if I had gone back to England, to have restored him to the owner at Puckeridge, by Ware; and so I should have wronged him of nothing, but of the use of him for so long a time. But I found an occasion to answer all my designs about the horse to advantage.

There came a man to the stabler (so they call the people at Edinburgh that take in horses to keep) and wanted to know if he could hear of any return horses for England. My landlord (so we called him) came bluntly to me one day, and asked me if my horse was my own. It was an odd question, as my circumstances stood, and puzzled me at first, and I asked why, and what was the matter. "Because," says he, "if it be a hired horse in England, as is often the case with Englishmen who come to Scotland, I could help you to send it back, and get you something for riding." So he expressed himself.

I was very glad of the occasion; and, in short, took security there of the person for delivering the horse safe and sound, and had 15s. sterling for the riding him. Upon this agreement I gave order to leave the horse at the Falcon at Puckeridge, and where I heard, many years after, that he was honestly left, and that the owner had him again, but had nothing for the loan of him.

Being thus eased of the expense of my horse, and having nothing at all to do, I began to consider with myself what would become of me, and what I could turn my hand to: I had not much diminished my stock of money, for though I was all the way so wary, that I would not join with my captain in his desperate attempts, yet I made no scruple to live at his expense, which, as I came out of England only to keep him company, had been but just, had I not known that all he had to spend upon me was what he robbed honest people of, and that I was all that while a receiver of stolen goods; but I was not come so far then as to scruple that part at all.

In the next place, I was not so anxious about my money running low, because I knew what a reserve I had made at London; but still I was very willing to have engaged in any honest employment for a livelihood; for I was sick indeed of the wandering life which I had led, and was resolved to thieve no more; but then two or three things, which I had offered me, I lost, because I could not write or read.

This afflicted me a great while very much; but the stabler, as I have called him, delivered me from my anxiety that way, by bringing me to an honest, but poor young man, who undertook to teach me both to write and read, and in a little time too, and for a small expense, if I would take pains at it. I promised all possible diligence, and to work I went with it, but found the writing much more difficult to me than the reading.

However, in half a year's time, or thereabouts, I could read and write too, tolerably well, inso-much that I began to think I was now fit for business; and I got by it into the service of a certain officer of the customs, who employed me for a time, but as he set me to do little but pass and repass between Leith and Edinburgh, with the accompts which he kept for the farmers of the customs there, leaving me to live at my own expense till my wages should be due, I run out the little money I had left, in clothes and subsistence, and a little before the year's end, when I was to have 12*l.* English money, truly my master was turned out of his place; and, which was worse, having been charged with some misapplications, was obliged to take shelter in England, and so we that were servants, for there were three of us, were left to shift for ourselves.

This was a hard case for me in a strange place, and I was reduced by it to the last extremity. I might have gone for England, an English ship being there, the master of which proffered me to give me my passage (upon telling him my distress) and to take my word for the payment of 10*s.* when I came there; but my captain appeared just then under new circumstances, which obliged him not to go away, and I was loth to leave him; it seems we were yet farther to take our fate together.

I have mentioned that he left me, and that I saw him no more for eighteen months: his rambles and adventures were many in that time; he went to Glasgow, played some remarkable pranks there, escaped almost miraculously from the gallows, got over to Ireland, wandered about there, turned raparee, and did some villanous things there, and escaped from Londonderry, over to the Highlands in the north of Scotland; and about a month before I was left destitute at Leith, by my master, behold! my noble Captain Jack came in there, on board the ferry-boat from Fife, being, after all adventures and successes, advanced to the dignity of a foot soldier, in a body of recruits raised in the north for the regiment of Douglas.

After my disaster, being reduced almost as low as my captain, I found no better shift before me, at least for the present, than to enter myself a soldier too; and thus we were ranked together, with each of us a musquet upon our shoulders, and, I confess, that thing did not sit so ill upon me as I thought at first it would have done; for, though I fared hard, and lodged ill (for the last especially is the fate of poor soldiers in that part of the world), yet to me, that had been used to lodge on the ashes in the glass-house, this was no great matter; I had a secret satisfaction at being now under no necessity of stealing, and living in fear of a prison, and of the lash of the hangman; a thing which, from the time I saw it in Edinburgh, was so terrible to me, that I could not think of it without horror; and it was an inexpressible ease to my mind that I was now in a certain way of living, which was honest, and which I could say, was not unbecoming a gentleman.

Whatever was my satisfaction in that part, yet other circumstances did not equally concur to make this life suit me; for after we had been about six months in this figure, we were informed that the recruits were all to march for England, and to be shipped off at Newcastle, or at Hull, to join the regiment, which was then in Flanders.

I should tell you, that, before this, I was extremely delighted with the life of a soldier, and I took the exercise so naturally, that the sergeant that taught us to handle our arms, seeing me so ready at it, asked me if I had never carried arms before: I told him no; at which he swore, though jesting, they call you colonel, says he, and I believe you will be a colonel, or you must be some colonel's bastard, or you would never handle your arms as you do, at once or twice showing."

This pleased me extremely, and encouraged me, and I was mightily taken with the life of a soldier; but when the captain came and told me the news, that we were to march for England, and to be shipped off for Flanders at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, I was surprised very much, and new thoughts began to come in my mind; as, first, my captain's condition was particular, for he durst not appear publicly at Newcastle, as he must have done if he had marched with the battalion (for they were a body of above 400, and therefore called themselves a battalion, though they were but recruits, and belonged to the several companies abroad), I say, he must have marched with them, and been publicly seen, in which case he would have been apprehended, and delivered up; in the next place, I remembered that I had almost 100*l.* in money in London, and if it should have been asked all the soldiers in the regiment, which of them would go to Flanders a private sentinel if they had 100*l.* in their pockets, I believe none of them would answer in the affirmative; 100*l.* being at that time sufficient to buy colours in any new regiment, though not in that regiment, which was on an old establishment: this whetted my ambition, and I dreamt of nothing but being a gentleman officer, as well as a gentleman soldier.

These two circumstances concurring, I began to be very uneasy and very unwilling in my thoughts to go over a poor musqueteer into Flanders, to be knocked on the head at the tune of 3*s.* 6*d.* a week: while I was daily musing on the circumstances of being sent away, as above, and considering what to do, my captain comes to me one evening; "Hark ye, Jack," says he, "I must speak with you; let us take a walk in the fields a little out from the houses." We were quartered at a place called Park-end, near the town of Dunbar, about twenty miles from Berwick-upon-Tweed, and about sixteen miles from the river Tweed, the nearest way.

We walked together here, and talked seriously upon the matter; the captain told me how his case stood, and that he durst not march with the battalion into Newcastle; that if he did, he should be taken out of the ranks and tried for his life, and that I knew as well as he. "I could go privately to Newcastle," says he, "and go through the town well enough, but to go publicly is to run into the jaws of destruction."—"Well," says I, "that is very true, but what will you do?"—"Do!" says he, "do you think I am so bound by honour, as a gentleman soldier, that I will be hanged for them? No, no," says he, "I am resolved to be gone, and I would have you go with us."—"What do you mean by us?" said I.—"Why, here is another honest fellow, an Englishman also," says he, "that is resolved to desert too, and he has been a long while in the service, and says he knows how we shall be used abroad, and he will not go to Flanders," says he, "not he."

"Why," says I, "you will be shot to death for deserters if you are taken, and they will send out scouts for you in the morning all over the country, so that you will certainly fall into their hands."—"As for that," says he, "my comrade is thoroughly acquainted with the way, and has undertaken to bring us to the banks of the Tweed, before they can come up with us, and when we are on the other side of the Tweed, they can't take us up."

"And when would you go away?" says I.

"This minute," says he; "no time to be lost; 'tis a fine moon shining night."

"I have none of my baggage," says I; "let me go back and fetch my linen, and other things."

"Your linen is not much, I suppose," says he, "and we shall easily get more in England the old way."

"No," says I, "no more of your old ways; it has been owing to those old ways that we are now in such a strait."

"Well, well," says he, "the old ways are better than this starving life of a gentleman, as we call it."

"But," says I, "we have no money in our pockets, how shall we travel?"

"I have a little," says the captain; "enough to help us on to Newcastle, and if we can get none by the way, we will get some collier ship to take us in, and carry us to London by sea."

"I like that the best of all the measures you have laid yet," said I; and so I consented to go, and went off with him immediately. The cunning rogue having lodged his comrade a mile off under the hills, had dragged me by talking with him by little and little that way, till just when I consented, he was in sight, and he said, "Look, there's my comrade!" whom I knew presently, having seen him among the men.

Being thus gotten under the hills, and a mile off the way, and the day just shut in, we kept on apace, resolving, if possible, to get out of the reach of our pursuers before they should miss us, or know anything of our being gone.

We plied our time so well, and travelled so hard, that by five o'clock in the morning we were at a little village, whose name I forget; but they told us that we were within eight miles of the Tweed; and that as soon as we should be over the river we were on English ground.

We refreshed a little here, but marched on with but little stay; however it was half an hour past eight in the morning before we reached the Tweed, so it was at least twelve miles, when they told us it was but eight. Here we overtook two more of the same regiment, who had deserted from Haddington, where another part of the recruits were quartered.

These were Scotchmen, and very poor, having not one penny in their pockets; and had no more when they made their escape but 8s. between them; and when they saw us, whom they knew to be of the same regiment, they took us to be pursuers, and that we came to lay hold of them; upon which they stood upon their defence, having the regiment swords on, as we had also, but none of the mounting or clothing; for we were not to receive the clothing till we came to the regiment in Flanders.

It was not long before we made them understand that we were in the same circumstances with themselves, and so we soon became one company; and after resting some time on the English side of the river (for we were heartily tired, and the others were as much fatigued as we were), I say, after resting awhile, we set forward towards Newcastle, whither we resolved to go to get our passage by sea to London; for we had not money to hold us out any farther.

Our money was ebbd very low; for, though I had one piece of gold in my pocket, which I kept reserved for the last extremity, yet it was but half-a-guinea, and my captain had borne all our charges as far as his money would go, so that when we came to Newcastle, we had but sixpence left in all to help ourselves, and the two Scots had begged their way all along the road.

We contrived to come into Newcastle in the dusk of the evening, and even then we durst not venture into the public part of the town, but made down towards the river, something below the town, where some glass-houses stand: here we knew not what to do with ourselves; but, guided by our fate, we put a good face upon the matter, and went into an alehouse, sat down, and called for a pint of beer.

The house was kept by a woman only, that is to say, we saw no other; and, as she appeared very frank, and entertained us cheerfully, we at last told our condition, and asked her if she could not help us to some kind master of a collier, that would give us a passage to London by sea. The subtle devil, who immediately found us proper fish for her hook, gave us the kindest words in the world, and told us she was heartily sorry she had not seen us one day sooner; that there was a collier master, of her particular acquaintance, that went away but with the morning tide, that the ship was fallen down to Shields, but she believed was hardly over the bar yet, and she would send to his house and see if he was gone on board, for sometimes the masters do not go away till a tide after the ship, and she was sure, if he was not gone, she could prevail on him to take us all in; but then she was afraid we must go on board immediately, the same night.

We begged her to send to his house, for we knew not what to do, and if she could oblige him to take us on board, we did not care what time of night it was; for, as we had no money, we had no lodging, and we wanted nothing but to be on board.

We looked upon this as a mighty favour, that she sent to the master's house, and to our greater joy she brought us word about an hour after, that he was not gone, and was at a tavern in the town, whither his boy had been to fetch him; and that he had sent word he would call there in the way home.

This was all in our favour, and we were extremely pleased with it. About an hour after, the landlady being in the room with us, her maid brings us word the master was below; so down she goes to him, telling us she would go and tell him our case, and see to persuade him to take us all on board. After some time she comes up with him, and brings him into the room to us: "Where are these honest gentlemen soldiers," says he, "that are in such distress?" We stood all up and paid our respects to him. "Well, gentlemen, and is all your money spent?"

"Indeed it is," said one of our company, "and we shall be infinitely obliged to you, sir, if you will give us a passage; we shall be very willing to do anything we can in the ship, though we are not seamen."

"Why," says he, "were none of you ever at sea in your lives?"

"No," says we, "not one of us."

"You will be able to do me no service then," says he, "for you will be all sick. Well, however," says he, "for my good landlady's sake here, I'll do it; but are you all ready to go on board, for I go on board this very night?"

"Yes, sir," says we again, "we are ready to go this minute."

"No, no," says he very kindly, "we'll drink together; come, landlady," says he, "make these honest gentlemen a sneaker of punch."

We looked at one another, for we knew we had no money, and he perceived it; "Come, come," says he, "don't be concerned at your having no money; my landlady here and I never part with dry lips. Come, good wife," says he, "make the punch as I bid you."

We thanked him, and said, "God bless you, noble captain," a hundred times over, being overjoyed with such good luck. While we were drinking the punch he calls the landlady; "Come," says he, "I'll step home and take my things, and bid them good-bye, and order the boat to come at high water and take me up here; and pray, good wife," says he, "get me something for supper; sure, if I can give these honest men their passage, I may give them a bit of victuals too; it may be they ha'n't had much for dinner."

With this away he went, and in a little while we heard the Jack agoing, and one of us going down stairs for a spy, brought us word there was a good leg of mutton at the fire: in less than an hour our captain came again, and came up to us, and blamed us that we had not drank all the punch out; "Come," says he, "don't be bashful, when that is out we can have another; when I am obliging poor men, I love to do it handsomely."

We drank on, and drank the punch out, and more was brought up, and he pushed it about apace; and then came up a leg of mutton, and I need not say that we eat heartily, being told several times that we should pay nothing; after supper was done, he bids my landlady ask if the boat was come? And she brought word no, it was not high water by a good deal. "No," says he! "Well, then, give us some more punch." So more punch was brought in, and, as was afterwards confessed, something was put into it, or more brandy than ordinary, that by the time the punch was drunk out we were all very drunk, and, as for me, I was asleep.

About the time that was out we were told the boat was come; so we tumbled out, almost over one another, into the boat, and away we went, and our captain with us in the boat. Most of us, if not all, fell asleep, till after some time, though how much, or how far going we knew not, the boat stopped, and we were waked and told we were at the ship's side, which was true; and with much help, and holding us for fear we should fall over-board, we were all gotten into the ship; all I remember of it was this, that as soon as we were on board our captain, as we called him, called out thus; "Here, boatswain, take care of these gentlemen, and give them good cabins, and let them turn in and go to sleep, for they are very weary;" and so indeed we were, and very drunk too, being the first time I had ever drank any punch in my life.

CHAP. VIII.

WE ARE KIDNAPPED, AND CARRIED ON BOARD SHIP BY A VIRGINIA CAPTAIN—MAKE THE COAST OF VIRGINIA IN 32 DAYS—CAPTAIN JACK MAKES HIS ESCAPE—A PEEP INTO FUTURITY—I AM SOLD ALONG WITH THE OTHERS TO A RICH PLANTER—MY MASTER HOLDS A LONG CONVERSATION WITH ME, AND IN CONSEQUENCE OF MY GOOD BEHAVIOUR PUTS ME IN A PLACE OF TRUST.

WELL, care was taken of us according to order, and we were put into very good cabins, where we were sure to go immediately to sleep. In the meantime the ship, which was indeed just ready to go, and only on notice given had come to an anchor for us at Shields, weighed, stood over the bar, and went off to sea; and when we waked, and began to peep abroad, which was not till near noon the next day, we found ourselves a great way at sea, the land in sight indeed, but at a great distance, and all going merrily on for London, as we understood it; we were very well used and well satisfied with our condition for about three days, when we began to inquire whether we were not almost come, and how much longer it would be before we should come into the river.

"What river?" says one of the men. "Why, the Thames," says my Captain Jack. "The Thames!" says the seaman, "what do you mean by that? What, ha'n't you had time enough to be sober yet?" So captain Jack said no more, but looked about him like a fool; when awhile after some other of us asked the like question, and the seaman, who knew nothing of the cheat, began to smell a trick; and turning to the other Englishman that came with us, "Pray," says he, "where do you fancy you are going, that you ask so often about it?"—"Why to London," says he, "where should we be going? We agreed with the captain to carry us to London."

"Not with the captain," says he; "I dare say, poor men, you are all cheated, and I thought so when I saw you come aboard with that kidnapping rogue Gilliman; poor men!" adds he, "you are all betrayed; why, you are going to Virginia, and the ship is bound to Virginia."

The Englishman falls a storming and raving like a madman, and we gathering round him, let any man guess, if they can, what was our surprise, and how we were confounded when we were told how it was; in short, we drew our swords, and began to lay about us, and made such a noise and hurry in the ship that at last the seamen were obliged to call out for help. The captain commanded us to be disarmed in the first place, which was not, however, done without giving and receiving some wounds, and afterwards he caused us to be brought to him into the great cabin.

Here he talked calmly to us, that he was really very sorry for what had befallen us; that he perceived we had been trepanned, and that the fellow who had brought us on board was a rogue that was employed by a sort of wicked merchants not unlike himself; that he supposed he had been represented to us as captain of the ship, and asked us if it was not so? We told him yes, and gave him a large account of ourselves, and how we came to the woman's house to inquire for some master of a collier to get a passage to London, and that this man engaged to carry us to London in his own ship, and the like, as is related above.

He told us he was very sorry for it, and he had no hand in it; but it was out of his power to help us, and let us know very plainly what our condition was, namely, that we were put on board his ship as servants to be delivered at Maryland to such a man, whom he named to us; but that, however, if we would be quiet and orderly in the ship, he would use us well in the passage, and take care we should be used well when we came there, and that he would do anything for us that lay in his power; but if we were unruly and refractory, we could not expect but he must take such measures as to oblige us to be satisfied; and that, in short, we must be hand-cuffed, carried down between the decks and kept as prisoners, for it was his business to take care that no disturbance must be in the ship.

My captain raved like a madman, swore at the captain, told him he would not fail to cut his throat either on board, or a-shore, whenever he came within his reach; and that if he could not do it now he would do it after he came to England again, if ever he durst show his face there again; for he might depend upon it if he was carried away to Virginia he should find his way to England again; that if it was twenty years after he would have satisfaction of him. "Well, young man," says the captain smiling, "'tis very honestly said, and then I must take care of you while I have you here, and afterwards I must take care of myself."—"Do your worst," says Jack boldly, "I'll pay you home for it one time or other."—"I must venture that, young man," says he, still calmly, "but for the present you and I must talk a little; so he bids the boatswain, who stood near him, secure him, which he did; I spoke to him to be easy and patient, and that the captain had no hand in our misfortune.

"No hand in it! d—n him," said he aloud, "do you think he is not confederate in this villany? would any honest man receive innocent people on board his ship, and not inquire of their circumstances, but carry them away and not speak to them? and now he knows how barbarously we are treated, why does he not set us on shore again? I tell you he is a villain, and none but him; why does he not complete his villany and murder us, and then he will be free from our revenge? but nothing else shall ever deliver him from my hands, but sending us to the d—l, or going thither himself; and I am honester in telling him so fairly, than he has been to me, and am in no passion any more than he is."

The captain was, I say, a little shocked at his boldness, for he talked a great deal more of the same kind, with a great deal of spirit and fire, and yet, without any disorder in his temper; indeed I was surprised at it, for I never had heard him talk so well, and so much to the purpose in my life: the captain was, I say, a little shocked at it; however, he talked very handsomely to him, and told him, "Look ye, young man, I bear with you the more because I am sensible your case is very hard, and yet I cannot allow your threatening me neither, and you oblige me by that to be severer with you than I intended: however, I will do nothing to you but what your threatening my life makes necessary." The boatswain called out to have him to the geers, as they called it, and to have him taste the cat-o'-nine-tails; all which were terms we did not understand till afterwards, when we were told he should have been whipped and pickled, for they said it was not to be suffered; but the captain said, "No, no, the young man has been really injured, and has reason to be very much provoked; but I have not injured him," says he; and then he protested he had no hand in it, that he was put on board, and we also, by the owners' agent, and for their account; that it was true that they did always deal in servants, and carried a great many every voyage; but that it was no profit to him as commander, but they were always put on board by the owners, and that it was none of his business to inquire about them; and, to prove that he was not concerned in it, but was very much troubled at so base a thing, and that he would not be instrumental to carry us away against our wills, if the wind and the weather would permit, he would set us on shore again, though, as it blowed then, the wind being at southwest, and a hard gale, and that they were already as far as the Orkneys, it was impossible.

But the captain was the same man; he told him that, let the wind blow how it would, he ought not to carry us away against our consents; and as to his pretences of his owners and the like, it was saying of nothing to him, for it was he, the captain, that carried us away, and that whatever rogue trepanned us on board (now he knew it) he ought no more to carry us away than murder us; and that he demanded to be set on shore, or else he, the captain, was a thief and a murderer.

The captain continued mild still; and then I put in with an argument, that had like to have brought us all back, if the weather had not really hindered it; which, when I came to understand sea affairs better, I found was indeed so, and that it had been impossible. I told the captain that I was sorry that my brother was so warm, but that our usage was villanous, which he could not deny: then I took up the air of what my habit did not agree with: I told him that we were not people to be sold for slaves, that though we had the misfortune to be in a circumstance that obliged us to conceal ourselves, having disguised ourselves to get out of the army, as being not willing to go into Flanders, yet that we were men of substance, and able to discharge ourselves from the service when it came to that; and, to convince him of it, I told him I would give him sufficient security, to pay 20*l.* a-piece for my brother and myself; and in as short time as we could send from the place he should put in to London, and receive a return; and, to show that I was able to do it, I pulled out my bill for 94*l.* from the gentleman of the custom-house, and who, to my infinite satisfaction, he knew as soon as he saw the bill. He was astonished at this, and lifting up his hands, "By what witchcraft," says he, "were you brought hither!"

"As to that," says I, "we have told you the story, and we add nothing to it; but we insist upon it, that you will do this justice to us now." "Well," says he, "I am very sorry for it, but I cannot answer putting back the ship; neither, if I could," says he, "is it practicable to be done."

While this discourse lasted the two Scotchmen and the other Englishman were silent; but as I seemed to acquiesce, the Scotchmen began to talk to the same purpose, which I need not repeat, and had not mentioned, but for a merry passage that followed. After the Scotchmen had said all they could, and the captain still told them they must submit,—“And will you then carry us to Virginia?” “Yes,” says the captain. “And will we be sold,” says the Scotchman, “when we come there?” “Yes,” says the captain. “Why then, sir,” says the Scotchman, “the devil will have you at the hinder end of the bargain.” “Say you so,” says the captain smiling; “well, well, let the devil and I alone to agree about that: do you be quiet, and behave civilly as you should do, and you shall be used as kindly, both here and there too, as I can.” The poor Scotchmen could say little to it, nor I, nor any of us; for we saw there was no remedy, but to leave the devil and the captain to agree among themselves, as the captain had said, as to the honesty of it.

Thus, in short, we were all, I say, obliged to acquiesce but my captain, who was so much the more obstinate when he found that I had a fund to make such an offer upon, nor could all my persuasions prevail with him: the captain of the ship and he had many pleasant dialogues about this in the rest of the voyage, in which Jack never treated him with any language but that of kidnapper and villain, nor talked of anything but of taking his revenge of him; but I omit that part, though very diverting, as being no part of my own story.

In short, the wind continued to blow hard, though very fair, till, as the seamen said, we were past the Islands on the north of Scotland, and that we began to steer away westerly (which I came to understand since), as there was no land any way for many hundred leagues, so we had no remedy but patience, and to be easy as we could; only my surly Captain Jack continued the same man all the way.

We had a very good voyage, no storms all the way, and a northerly wind almost twenty days together; so that, in a word, we made the capes of Virginia in two and thirty days, from the day we steered west, as I have said, which was in the latitude of 60 degrees, 30 minutes, being to the north of the Isle of Great Britain; and this they said was a very quick passage.

Nothing material happened to me during the voyage; and indeed, when I came there, I was obliged to act in so narrow a compass, that nothing very material could present itself.

When we came ashore, which was in a great river, which they call Potomack, the captain asked us, but me more particularly, whether I had anything to propose to him now? Jack answered “Yes, I have something to propose to you, captain; that is, that I have promised you to cut your throat, and depend upon it I will be as good as my word.” “Well, well,” says the captain, “if I can’t help it, you shall;” so he turned away to me. I understood him very well what he meant; but I was now out of the reach of any relief; and as for my note, it was now but a bit of paper of no value, for nobody could receive it but myself. I saw no remedy, and so talked coldly to him of it as of a thing I was indifferent about; and indeed I was grown indifferent, for I considered all the way on the voyage, that as I was bred a vagabond, had been a pick-pocket and a soldier, and was run from my colours, and that I had no settled abode in the world, nor any employ to get anything by, except that wicked one I was bred to, which had the gallows at the heels of it, I did not see but that this service might be as well to me as other business; and this I was particularly satisfied with, when they told me, that after I had served out the five years’ servitude I should have the courtesy of the country (as they called it), that is, a certain quantity of land to cultivate and plant for myself. So that now I was like to be brought up to something by which I might live, without that wretched thing called stealing, which my very soul abhorred, and which I had given over, as I have said, ever since that wicked time that I robbed the poor widow of Kentish Town.

In this mind I was when I arrived at Virginia; and so, when the captain inquired of me what I intended to do, and whether I had anything to propose (that is to say, he meant whether I would give him my bill, which he wanted to be fingering very much), I answered coldly, “My bill would be of no use to me now, for nobody would advance anything upon it; only this I would say to him, that, if he would carry me and Captain Jack back to England, and to London again, I would pay him the 20*l.* off my bill for each of us. This he had no mind to; “For as to your brother,” says he, “I would not take him into my ship for twice 20*l.*; he is such a hardened, desperate villain,” says he, “I should be obliged to carry him in irons as I brought him hither.”

Thus we parted with our captain, or kidnapper, call him as you will. We were then delivered to the merchants, to whom we were consigned, who again disposed of us as they thought fit, and in a few days we were separated.

As for my Captain Jack, to make short of the story, that desperate rogue had the good luck to have a very easy, good master, whose business and good humour he abused very much; and, in particular, took an opportunity to run away with a boat, which his master entrusted him and another with, to carry some provisions down the river to another plantation which he had there. This boat and provisions they ran away with, and sailed north to the bottom of the bay (as they call it), and into a river called Susquehanna, and there, quitting the boat, they wandered through the woods, till they came into Pennsylvania, from whence they made shift to get passage to New England, and from thence home; where, falling in among his old companions, and to the old trade, he was at length taken and hanged, about a month before I came to London, which was near twenty years afterward.

My part was harder at the beginning, though better at the latter end; I was disposed of (that is to say, sold) to a rich planter, whose name was Smith, and with me the other Englishman, who was my fellow-deserter, that Jack brought to me when we went off from Dunbar.

We were now fellow-servants, and it was our lot to be carried up a small river or creek, which falls into Potomack river, about eight miles from the great river. Here we were brought to the plantation, and put in among about fifty servants, as well negroes as others; and being delivered to the head man, or director or manager of the plantation, he took care to let us know that we must expect to work, and very hard too; for it was for that purpose his master bought servants, and for no other. I told him, very submissively, that since it was our misfortune to come into such a miserable condition as we were in, we expected no other; only we desired we might be showed our business, and be allowed to learn it gradually, since he might be sure we had not been used to labour; and, I added, that when he knew particularly by what methods we were brought and betrayed into such a condition, he would perhaps see cause at least to show us that favour, if not more. This I spoke with such a moving tone as gave him curiosity to inquire into the particulars of our story, which I gave him at large, a little more to our advantage, too, than ordinary.

This story, as I hoped it would, did move him to a sort of tenderness; but yet he told us that his master's business must be done, and that he expected we must work as above; that he could not dispense with that upon any account whatever. Accordingly to work we went; and indeed we had three hard things attending us; namely, we worked hard, lodged hard, and fared hard. The first I had been an utter stranger to, the last I could shift well enough with.

During this scene of life I had time to reflect on my past hours, and upon what I had done in the world; and though I had no great capacity of making a clear judgment, and very little reflection from conscience, yet it made some impression upon me; and, particularly, that I was brought into this miserable condition of a slave, by some strange directing power, as a punishment for the wickedness of my younger years; and this thought was increased upon the following occasion: the master, whose service I was now engaged in, was a man of substance and figure in the country, and had abundance of servants, as well negroes as English; in all, I think, he had near two hundred, and among so many, as some grew every year infirm and unable to work, others went off upon their time being expired, and others died; and by these and other accidents the number would diminish if they were not often recruited and filled, and this obliged him to buy more every year.

It happened while I was here that a ship arrived from London with several servants, and among the rest were seventeen transported felons, some burnt in the hand, others not; eight of whom my master bought for the time specified in the warrant for their transportation respectively, some for a longer, some a shorter term of years.

Our master was a great man in the country, and a justice of peace, though he seldom came down to the plantation where I was; yet, as the new servants were brought on shore, and delivered at our plantation, his worship came thither, in a kind of state, to see and receive them. When they were brought before him, I was called, among other servants, as a kind of guard, to take them into custody, after he had seen them, and to carry them to the work. They were brought by a guard of seamen from the ship, and the second mate of the ship came with them, and delivered them to our master, with the warrant for their transportation, as above.

When his worship had read over the warrants, he called them over by their names, one by one, and having let them know, by his reading the warrants over again to each man respectively, that he knew for what offences they were transported, he talked to every one separately very gravely; let them know how much favour they had received in being saved from the gallows, which the law had appointed for their crimes; that they were not sentenced to be transported, but to be hanged, and that transportation was granted them upon their own request and humble petition.

Then he laid before them, that they ought to look upon the life they were just agoing to enter upon as just beginning the world again; that if they thought fit to be diligent and sober, they would (after the time they were ordered to serve was expired) be encouraged by the constitution of the country to settle and plant for themselves; and that even he himself would be so kind to them, that, if he lived to see any of them serve their time faithfully out, it was his custom to assist his servants in order to their settling in that country, according as their behaviour might merit from him; and they would see and know several planters round about them, who now were in very good circumstances, and who formerly were only his servants in the same condition with them, and came from the same place (that is to say), Newgate; and some of them had the mark of it in their hands, but were now very honest men, and lived in very good repute.

Among the rest of his new servants he came to a young fellow not above seventeen or eighteen years of age, and his warrant mentioned that he was, though a young man, yet an old offender; that he had been several times condemned, but had been respited or pardoned, but still he continued an incorrigible pickpocket; that the crime for which he was now transported, was for picking a merchant's pocket-book, or letter-case, out of his pocket, in which were bills of exchange for a very great sum of money; that he had afterwards received the money upon some of the bills; but that going to a goldsmith in Lombard-street with another bill, and having demanded the money, he was stopped, notice having been given of the loss of them; that he was condemned to die for the felony, and being so well known for an old offender, had certainly died, but the merchant, upon his earnest application, had obtained that he should be transported, on condition that he restored all the rest of his bills, which he had done accordingly.

Our master talked a long time to this young fellow; mentioned, with some surprise, that he so young should have followed such a wicked trade so long as to obtain the name of an old offender at so young an age; and that he should be styled incorrigible, which is to signify that, notwithstanding his being whipt two or three times, and several times punished by imprisonment, and once burnt in the hand, yet nothing would do him any good, but that he was still the same. He talked mighty religiously to this boy, and told him, God had not only spared him from the gallows, but had now mercifully delivered him from the opportunity of committing the same sin again, and put it into his power to live an honest life, which perhaps he knew not how to do before; and though some part of his life now might be laborious, yet he ought to look on it to be no more than being put out apprentice to an honest trade, in which, when he came out of his time, he might be able to set up for himself, and live honestly.

Then he told him that, while he was a servant, he would have no opportunity to be dishonest, so when he came to be for himself he would have no temptation to it; and so, after a great many other kind things said to him and the rest, they were dismissed.

I was exceedingly moved at this discourse of our master's, as anybody would judge I must be, when it was directed to such a young rogue, born a thief and bred up a pickpocket, like myself; for I thought all my master said was spoken to me, and sometimes it came into my head, that sure my master was some extraordinary man, and he knew all things that ever I had done in my life.

But I was surprised to the last degree, when my master, dismissing all the rest of us servants, pointed at me, and speaking to his head clerk, "Here," says he, "bring that young fellow hither to me."

I had been near a year in the work, and I had plied it so well, that the clerk, or head man, either flattered me, or did really believe that I behaved very well; but I was terribly frightened to hear myself called out aloud, just as they used to call for such as had done some misdemeanor, and were to be lashed, or otherwise corrected.

I came in like a malefactor indeed, and thought I looked like one just taken in the fact, and carried before the justice; and indeed, when I came in, for I was carried into an inner room, or parlour, in the house to him; his discourse to the rest was in a large hall, where he sat in a seat like a lord judge upon the bench, or a petty king upon his throne.

When I came in, I say, he ordered his man to withdraw, and I standing half naked and bare-headed, with my haugh, or hoe, in my hand (the posture and figure I was in at my work), near the door, he bade me lay down my hoe, and come nearer; then he began to look a little less stern and terrible than I fancied him to look before, or, perhaps, both his countenance then and before might be, to my imagination, differing from what they really were; for we do not always judge those things by the real temper of the person, but by the measure of our apprehensions.

"Hark ye, young man, how old are you?" says my master, and so our dialogue began.

Jack. "Indeed, sir, I do not know."

Mast. "What is your name?"

Jack. "They call me Colonel here, but my name is Jack, an't please your worship."

Mast. "But pr'ythee what is thy name?"

Jack. "Jack."

Mast. "What! is thy Christian name, then, Colonel, and thy surname Jack?"

Jack. "Truly, sir, to tell your honour the truth, I know little or nothing of myself, nor what my true name is; but thus I have been called ever since I remember; which is my Christian name, or which my surname, or whether I was ever christened or not, I cannot tell."

Mast. "Well, however, that's honestly answered. Pray, how came you hither, and on what account are you made a servant here?"

Jack. "I wish your honour could have patience with me to hear the whole story; it is the hardest and most unjust thing that ever came before you."

Mast. "Say you so? tell it me at large then; I'll hear it, I promise that, if it be an hour long."

This encouraged me, and I began at my being a soldier, and being persuaded to desert at Dunbar, and gave him all the particulars, as they are related above, to the time of my coming on shore, and the captain talking to me about my bill after I arrived here. He held up his hands several times as I went on, expressing his abhorrence of the usage I had met with at Newcastle, and inquired the name of the master of the ship; "For," said he, "that captain, for all his smooth words, must be a rogue." So I told him his name, and the name of the ship, and he took it down in his book, and then we went on.

Mast. "But pray answer me honestly, too, to another question; what was it made you so much concerned at my talking to the boy there, the pickpocket?"

Jack. "An't please your honour, it moved me to hear you talk so kindly to a poor slave."

Mast. "And was that all; speak truly now?"

Jack. "No, indeed, but a secret wish came into my thoughts, that you that were so good to such a creature as that, could but one way or other know my case, and that if you did, you would certainly pity me, and do something for me."

Mast. "Well, but there was nothing in his case that hit with your own, that made you so affected with it, for I saw tears come from your eyes, and it was that made me call to speak to you."

Jack. "Indeed, sir, I have been a wicked idle boy, and was left desolate in the world; but that boy is a thief, and condemned to be hanged; I never was before a court of justice in my life."

Mast. "Well, I won't examine you too far; if you were never before a court of justice, and are not a criminal transported, I have nothing farther to inquire of you. You have been ill used, that's certain, and was it that that affected you?"

Jack. "Yes, indeed, please your honour:" (we all called him his honour or his worship.)

Mast. "Well, now I do know your case, what can I do for you? You speak of a bill of 94*l.* of which you would have given the captain 40*l.* for your liberty; have you that bill in your keeping still?"

Jack. "Yes, sir, here it is." (I pulled it out of the waistband of my drawers, where I always found means to preserve it, wrapped up in a piece of paper, and pinned to the waistband, and yet almost worn out too with often pinning and removing, so I gave it to him to read, and he read it.)

Mast. "And is this gentleman in being that gave you the bill?"

Jack. "Yes, sir, he was alive, and in good health, when I came from London, which you may see by the date of the bill, for I came away the next day."

Mast. "I do not wonder that the captain of the ship was willing to get this bill of you, when you came on shore here."

Jack. "I would have given it into his possession, if he would have carried me and my brother back again to England, and have taken what he asked for us out of it."

Mast. "Ay, but he knew better than that too; he knew, if he had any friends there, they would call him to an account for what he had done; but I wonder he did not take it from you while you were at sea, either by fraud or by force."

Jack. "He did not attempt that indeed."

Mast. "Well, young man, I have a mind to try if I can do you any service in this case. On my word, if the money can be paid, and you can get it safe over, I might put you in a way how to be a better man than your master, if you will be honest and diligent."

Jack. "As I behave myself in your service, sir, you will, I hope, judge of the rest."

Mast. "But perhaps you hanker after returning to England."

Jack. "No, indeed, sir, if I can but get my bread honestly here, I have no mind to go to England, for I know not how to get my bread there; if I had, I had not listed for a soldier."

Mast. "Well, but I must ask you some questions about that part hereafter; for 'tis indeed something strange that you should list for a soldier when you had 94*l.* in your pocket."

Jack. "I shall give your worship as particular account of that as I have of the other part of my life, if you please, but 'tis very long."

Mast. "Well, we will have that another time; but to the case in hand; are you willing I should send to anybody at London, to talk with that gentleman that gave you the bill; not to take the money of him, but to ask him only whether he has so much money of yours in his hands? and whether he will part with it when you shall give order, and send the bill, or a duplicate of it? that is," says he, "the copy;" and it was well he did say so, for I did not understand the word duplicate at all.

Jack. "Yes, sir, I will give you the bill itself, if you please, I can trust it with you, though I could not with him."

Mast. "No, no, young man, I won't take it from you."

Jack. "I wish your worship would please to keep it for me, for, if I should lose it, then I am quite undone."

Mast. "I will keep it for you, Jack, if you will, but then you shall have a note under my hand, signifying that I have it, and will return it you upon demand, which will be as safe to you as the bill; I won't take it else."

So I gave my master the bill, and he gave me his note for it; and he was a faithful steward for me, as you will hear in its place. After this conference I was dismissed, and went to my work, but, about two hours after, the steward, or the overseer of the plantation, came riding by, and, coming up to me as I was at work, pulled a bottle out of his pocket, and, calling me to him, gave me a dram of rum; when, in good manners, I had taken but a little sup, he held it out to me again and bade me take another, and spoke wondrous civilly to me, quite otherwise than he used to do.

This encouraged me and heartened me very much; but yet I had no particular view of anything, or which way I should have any relief.

A day or two after, when we were all going out to our work in the morning, the overseer called me to him again, and gave me a dram and a good piece of bread, and bade me come off from my work about one o'clock, and come to him to the house, for he must speak with me.

When I came to him, I came, to be sure, in the ordinary habit of a poor half-naked slave. "Come hither, young man," says he, "and give me your hoe." When I gave it him, "Well," says he, "you are to work no more in this plantation."

I looked surprised, and as if I was frightened. "What have I done, sir," said I, "and whither am I to be sent away?"

"Nay, nay," says he, and looked very pleasantly; "do not be frightened, 'tis for your good, 'tis not to hurt you; I am ordered to make an overseer of you, and you shall be a slave no longer."

"Alas!" says I to him, "I an overseer! I am in no condition for it. I have no clothes to put on, no linen, nothing to help myself."

"Well, well," says he, "you may be better used than you are aware of; come hither with me." So he led me into a vast great warehouse, or rather set of warehouses, one within another, and calling the warehouse-keeper, "Here," says he, "you must clothe this man, and give him everything necessary, upon the foot of number five, and give the bill to me; our master has ordered me to allow it in the accout of the west plantation." That was, it seems, the plantation where I was to go.

CHAPTER IX.

I STUMBLE AT THE THRESHOLD OF MY NEW OFFICE
—I STUDY TO RENDER THE NEGROES OBEDIENT WITHOUT PUNISHMENT, AND SUCCEED—OUR MASTER VISITS THE PLANTATION—CONVERSATION WITH HIM—I GAIN HIS GOOD GRACES MORE AND MORE—FIDELITY OF A NEGRO.

ACCORDINGLY, the warehouse-keeper carried me into an inner warehouse, where were several suits of clothes of the sort his orders mentioned, which were plain, but good sort of clothes, ready made, being of a good broad-cloth, about 1*l.*s. a yard in England, and with this he gave me three good shirts, two pair of shoes, stockings and gloves, a hat, six neckcloths, and, in short, everything I could want; and when he had looked everything out, and fitted them, he lets me into a little room by itself. "Here," says he, "go in there a slave, and come out a gentleman;" and with that carried everything into the room, and, shutting the door, bid me put them on, which I did most willingly; and now you may believe that I began to hope for something better than ordinary.

In a little while after this came the overseer, and gave me joy of my new clothes, and told me I must go with him; so I was carried to another plantation, larger than that where I worked before, and where there were two overseers, or clerks, one within doors and two without. This last was removed to another plantation, and I was placed there in his room; that is to say, as the clerk without doors, and my business was to look after the servants and negroes, and take care that they did their business, provide their food, and, in short, both govern and direct them.

I was elevated to the highest degree in my thoughts at this advancement, and it is impossible for me to express the joy of my mind upon this occasion; but there came a difficulty upon me that shocked me so violently, and went so against my very nature, that I really had almost forfeited my place about it, and, in all appearance, the favour of our master, who had been so generous to me; and this was, that when I entered upon my office, I had a horse given me, and a long horse-whip, like what we call in England a hunting-whip. The horse was to ride up and down all over the plantation to see the servants and negroes did their work, and the plantation being so large, it could not be done on foot, at least so often and so effectually as was required; and the horse-whip was given me to correct and lash the slaves and servants when they proved negligent or quarrelsome, or, in short, were guilty of any offence. This part turned the very blood within my veins, and I could not think of it with any temper, that I, who was but yesterday a servant or slave like them, and under the authority of the same lash, should lift up my hand to the cruel work which was my terror but the day before. This, I say, I could not do; insomuch that the negroes perceived it, and I had soon so much contempt upon my authority that we were all in disorder.

The ingratitude of their return for the compassion I showed them provoked me, I confess, and a little hardened my heart; and I began with the negroes, two of whom I was obliged to correct, and I thought I did it most cruelly; but after I lashed them till every blow I struck them hurt myself, and I was ready to faint at the work, the rogues laughed at me, and one of them had the impudence to say behind my back, that, if he had the whipping of me, he would show me better how to whip a negro.

Well, however, I had no power to do it in such a barbarous manner as I found it was necessary to have it done, and the defect began to be a detriment to our master's business, and now I began indeed to see that the cruelty so much talked of used in Virginia and Barbadoes and other colonies, in whipping the negro slaves, was not so much owing to the tyranny and passion and cruelty of the English as had been reported; the English not being accounted to be of a cruel disposition, and really are not so; but that it is owing to the brutality and obstinate temper of the negroes, who cannot be managed by kindness and courtesy, but must be ruled with a rod of iron, beaten with scorpions, as the Scripture calls it, and must be used as they do use them, or they would rise and murder all their masters, which, their numbers considered, would not be hard for them to do if they had arms and ammunition suitable to the rage and cruelty of their nature.

But I began to see at the same time that this brutal temper of the negroes was not rightly managed; that they did not take the best course with them to make them sensible either of mercy or punishment; and it was evident to me that even the worst of those tempers might be brought to a compliance without the lash, or, at least, without so much of it as they generally inflicted.

Our master was really a man of humanity himself, and was sometimes so full of tenderness that he would forbid the severities of his overseers and stewards; but he saw the necessity of it, and was obliged at last to leave it to the discretion of his upper servants; yet he would often bid them be merciful, and bid them consider the difference of the constitution of the bodies of the negroes; some being less able to bear the tortures of their punishment than others, and some of them less obstinate too than others.

However, somebody was so officious as to inform him against me upon this occasion; and let him know that I neglected his affairs, and that the servants were under no government; by which means his plantation was not duly managed, and that all things were in disorder.

This was a heavy charge for a young overseer, and his honour came like a judge, with all his attendants, to look into things, and hear the cause. However, he was so just to me, as that, before he censured me, he resolved to hear me fully, and that not only publicly but in private too; and the last part of this was my particular good fortune; for as he had formerly allowed me to speak to him with freedom, so I had the like freedom now, and had full liberty to explain and defend myself.

I knew nothing of the complaint against me till I had it from his own mouth; nor anything of his coming till I saw him in the very plantation, viewing his work, and viewing the several pieces of ground that were ordered to be new planted; and after he had rode all round, and seen things in the condition which they were to be seen in; how everything was in its due order, and the servants and negroes were all at work, and everything appearing to his mind, he went into the house.

As I saw him come up the walks I ran towards him, and made my homage, and gave him my humble thanks for the goodness he had showed me, in taking me from the miserable condition I was in before, and employing and entrusting me in his business; and he looked pleasant enough, though he did not say much at first, and I attended him through the whole plantation, gave him an account of everything as he went along, answered all his objections and inquiries everywhere in such a manner, as it seems, he did not expect, and, as he acknowledged afterwards, everything was very much to his satisfaction.

There was an overseer, as I observed, belonging to the same plantation, who was, though not over me, yet in a work superior to mine; for his business was to see the tobacco packed up, and deliver it either on board the sloops, or otherwise, as our master ordered, and to receive English goods from the grand warehouse, which was at the other plantation, because that was nearest the water side; and, in short, to keep the accompts.

This overseer, an honest and upright man, made no complaint to him of his business being neglected, as above, or of anything like it, though he inquired of him about it, and that very strictly too.

I should have said, that as he rode over the plantation, he came in his round to the place where the servants were usually corrected, when they had done any fault; and there stood two negroes, with their hands tied behind them, as it were under sentence; and when he came near them, they fell on their knees, and made pitiful signs to him for mercy. "Alas! alas!" says he, turning to me, "why did you bring me this way? I do not love such sights, what must I do now? I must pardon them; prithee, what have they done?" I told him the particular offences which they were brought to the place for; one had stolen a bottle of rum, and had made himself drunk with it, and when he was drunk, had done a great many mad things, and had attempted to knock one of the white servant's brains out with a handspike; but that the white man had avoided the blow, and, striking up the negro's heels, had seized him, and brought him prisoner thither, where he had lain all night; and that I had told him he was to be whipped that day, and the next three days, twice every day.

"And could you be so cruel?" says his honour, "why you would kill the poor wretch; and so, besides the blood which you would have to answer for, you would lose me a lusty man negro, which cost me at least 30*l.* or 40*l.* and bring a reproach upon my whole plantation; nay, and more than that, some of them in revenge would murder me, if ever it was in their power."

"Sir," says I, "if those fellows are not kept under by violence, I believe you are satisfied nothing is to be done with them; and it is reported, in your works, that I have been rather their jest than their terror, for want of using them as they deserve; and I was resolved, how much soever it is against my own disposition, that your service should not suffer for my unseasonable forbearance; and therefore, if I had scourged him to death—"—"Hold," says he, "no, no, by no means, no such severity in my bounds; remember, young man, you were once a servant, deal as you would acknowledge it would be just to deal with you in his case, and mingle always some mercy; I desire it, and let the consequence of being too gentle be placed to my account."

This was as much as I could desire, and the more, because what passed was in public, and several, both negroes and white servants, as well as the particular persons who had accused me, heard it all, though I did not know it. "A cruel dog of an overseer," says one of the white servants behind, "he would have whipped poor bullet-head (so they called the negro that was to be punished) to death, if his honour had not happened to come to-day."

However, I urged the notorious crime this fellow was guilty of, and the danger there was in such forbearance, from the refractory and incorrigible temper of the negroes, and pressed a little the necessity of making examples; but he said, "Well, well, do it the next time, but not now;" so I said no more.

The other fellow's crime was trifling compared with this; and the master went forward, talking of it to me, and I following him, till we came to the house; when, after he had been sat down a while, he called me to him; and, not suffering my accusers to come near, till he had heard my defence, he began with me thus.

Mast. "Hark ye, young man, I must have some discourse with you. Your conduct is complained of since I set you over this plantation; I thought your sense of the obligation I had laid on you would have secured your diligence and faithfulness to me."

Jack. "I am very sorry any complaint should be made of me, because the obligation I am under to your honour (and which I freely confess) does bind me to your interest in the strongest manner imaginable; and, however I may have mistaken my business, I am sure I have not willingly neglected it."

Mast. "Well, I shall not condemn you without hearing you, and therefore I called you in now to tell you of it."

Jack. "I humbly thank your honour; I have but one petition more, and that is, that I may know my accusation; and, if you please, my accusers."

Mast. "The first you shall, and that is the reason of my talking to you in private; and if there is any need of a further hearing, you shall know your accusers too. What you are charged with is just contrary to what appeared to me just now, and therefore you and I must come to a new understanding about it, for I thought I was too cunning for you, and now I think you have been too cunning for me."

Jack. "I hope your honour will not be offended that I do not fully understand you."

Mast. "I believe you do not; come, tell me honestly, did you really intend to whip the poor negro twice a day for four days together, that is to say, to whip him to death, for that would have been the English of it, and the end of it."

Jack. "If I may be permitted to guess, sir, I believe I know the charge that is brought against me; and that your honour has been told, that I have been too gentle with the negroes, as well as with other servants; and that when they deserved to be used with the accustomed severity of the country, I have not given them half enough; and that by this means they are careless of your business, and that your plantation is not well looked after, and the like."

Mast. "Well, you guess right; go on."

Jack. "The first part of the charge I confess, but the last I deny; and appeal to your honour's strictest examination into every part of it."

Mast. "If the last part could be true, I would be glad the first were: for it would be an infinite satisfaction to me that, my business not being neglected nor our safety endangered, those poor wretches could be used with more humanity; for cruelty is the aversion of my nature, and it is the only uncomfortable thing that attends me in all my prosperity."

Jack. "I freely acknowledge, sir, that at first it was impossible for me to bring myself to that terrible work. How could I, that was but just come out of the terror of it myself, and had but the day before been a poor, naked, miserable servant myself, and might be to-morrow reduced to the same condition again; how could I use this (showing a horsewhip) terrible weapon on the naked flesh of my fellow-servants as well as fellow creatures? At least, sir, when my duty made it absolutely necessary, I could not do it without the utmost horror. I beseech you pardon me if I have such a tenderness in my nature, that though I might be fit to be your servant, I am incapable of being an executioner, having been an offender myself."

Mast. "Well, but how then can my business be done; and how will this terrible obstinacy of the negroes, who, they tell me, can be no otherwise governed, be kept from neglect of their work, or even insolence and rebellion?"

Jack. "This brings me, sir, to the latter part of my defence; and here I hope your honour will be pleased to call my accusers, or that you will give yourself the trouble of taking the exactest view of your plantation, and see, or let them show you, if anything is neglected, if your business has suffered in anything, or if your negroes or other servants are under less government than they were before; and if, on the contrary, I have found out that happy secret to have good order kept, the business of the plantation done, and that with diligence and dispatch, and that the negroes are kept in awe, the natural temper of them subjected, and the safety and peace of your family secured, as well by gentle means as by rough, by moderate correction as by torture and barbarity, by a due awe of just discipline as by the horror of insufferable torments, I hope your honour will not lay that sin to my charge."

Mast. "No, indeed; you would be the most acceptable manager that ever I employed; but how then does this consist with the cruel sentence you had passed on the poor fellow that is in your condemned hole yonder, who was to be whipped eight times in four days?"

Jack. "Very well, sir; first, sir, he remains under the terrible apprehensions of a punishment so severe as no negro ever had before; this fellow, with your leave, I intended to release to-morrow without any whipping at all, after talking to him in my way about his offence, and raising in his mind a sense of the value of pardon; and if this makes him a better servant than the severest whipping will do, then I presume you would allow I have gained a point."

Mast. "Ay, but what if it should not be so? for these fellows have no sense of gratitude."

Jack. "That is, sir, because they are never pardoned; if they offend, they never know what mercy is, and what then have they to be grateful for?"

Mast. "Thou art in the right indeed; where there is no mercy shown, there is no obligation laid upon them."

Jack. "Besides, sir, if they have at any time been let go, which is very seldom, they are not told what the case is; they take no pains with them to imprint principles of gratitude on their minds, to tell them what kindness is shown them, and what they are indebted for it, and what they might gain in the end by it."

Mast. "But do you think such usage would do? Would it make any impression? You persuade yourself it would, but you see 'tis against the received notion of the whole country."

Jack. "There are, it may be, public and national mistakes and errors in conduct, and this is one."

Mast. "Have you tried it? You cannot say it is a mistake till you have tried and proved it to be so."

Jack. "Your whole plantation is a proof of it. This very fellow had never acted as he did if he had not gotten rum in his head, and been out of the government of himself; so that indeed all the offence I ought to have punished him for had been that of stealing a bottle of rum, and drinking it all up; in which case, like Noah, he did not know the strength of it, and when he had it in his head he was a madman, he was as one raging and distracted; so that, for all the rest, he deserved pity rather than punishment."

Mast. "Thou art right, certainly right, and thou wilt be a rare fellow if thou canst bring these notions into practice: I wish you had tried it upon any one particular negro, that I might see an example; I would give 500*l.* it could be brought to bear."

Jack. "I desire nothing, sir, but your favour and the advantage of obliging you; I will show you an example of it among your own negroes, and all the plantation will acknowledge it."

Mast. "You make my very heart glad within me, Jack; if you can bring this to pass, I here give you my word I'll not only give you your own freedom, but make a man of you for this world as long as you live."

Upon this I bowed to him very respectfully, and told him the following story. There is a negro, sir, in your plantation, who has been your servant several years before I came; he did a fault that was of no great consequence in itself, but perhaps would have been worse if they had indeed gone farther, and I had him brought into the usual place and tied him by the thumbs for correction, and he was told that he should be whipped and pickled in a dreadful manner. After I had made proper impressions on his mind of the terror of his punishment, and found that he was sufficiently humbled by it, I went into the house and caused him to be brought out, just as they do when they go to correct the negroes on such occasions: when he was stripped and tied up, he had two lashes given him that were indeed very cruel ones, and I called to them to hold. "Hold," said I to the two men that had just begun to lay on upon the poor fellow, "hold," said I; "let me talk to him."

So he was taken down. Then I began and represented to him how kind you, that were his great master,* had been to him; that you had never done him any harm, that you had used him gently, and he had never been brought to this punishment in so many years, though he had done some faults before; that this was a notorious offence, for he had stolen some rum, and made himself and two other negroes drunk-mad,† and had abused two women negroes who had hus-

* So the negroes call the owner of the plantation, or at least so they called him, because he was a great man in the country, having three or four large plantations.

† To be drunk in a negro is to be mad; for when they get rum they are worse than raving, and fit to do any manner of mischief.

bands in our master's service, but in another plantation; and played several pranks, and for this I had appointed him this punishment.

He shook his head, and made signs that he was muchee sorree, as he called it. "And what will you say or do," said I, "if I should prevail with the great master to pardon you? I have a mind to go and see if I can beg for you." He told me he would lie down, let me kill him; "me will," says he, "run, go, fetch, bring for you as long as me live." This was the opportunity I had a mind to have, to try whether, as negroes have all the other faculties of reasonable creatures, they had not also some sense of kindness, some principles of natural generosity, which, in short, is the foundation of gratitude; for gratitude is the product of generous principles.

"You please me with the beginning of this story," says he; "I hope you have carried it on."

"Yes, sir," says I, "it has been carried on farther perhaps than you imagine, or will think has been possible in such a case."

But I was not so arrogant as to assume the merit to myself. "No, no," said I, "I do not ask you to go or run for me, you must do all that for our great master, for it will be from him entirely that you will be pardoned, if you are pardoned at all, for your offence is against him; and what will you say, will you be grateful to him, and run, go, fetch, bring, for him as long as you live, as you have said you would for me?"

"Yes, indeed," says he, "and muchee do, muchee do, for you too (he would not leave me out); you ask him for me."

Well, I put off all his promised gratitude to me from myself, as was my duty, and placed it to your account; told him I knew you was muchee good, muchee pitiful, and I would persuade you if I could; and so told him I would go to you, and he should be whipped no more till I came again. "But, hark ye, Mouchat," says I (that was the negro's name), "they tell me when I came hither, that there is no showing kindness to any of you negroes; that when we spare you from whipping, you laugh at us, and are the worse."

He looked very serious at me, and said, "O that no so; the masters say so, but no be so, no be so, indeede, indeede," and so we parleyed.—

Jack. "Why do they say so then? To be sure they have tried you all."

Negro. "No, no, they no try, they say so, but no try."

Jack. "I hear them all say so."

Negro. "Me tell you the true; they have no mercie, they beat us cruel, all cruel, they never have show mercie. How can they tell we be no better?"

Jack. "What! do they never spare?"

Negro. "Master, me speakee the true; they never give mercie, they always whippee, lashee, knockee down, all cruel: negro be muchee better man, do muchee better work, but they tell us no mercie."

Jack. "But, what, do they never show any mercy?"

Negro. "No never, no never; all whippee, all whippee, cruel, worse than they whippee de horse, whippee de dog."

Jack. "But would they be better if they did?"

Negro. "Yes, yes, negro be muchee better if they be mercie; when they be whippee, whippee, negro muchee cry, muchee hate, would kill if they had de gun; but when they makee de mercie, then negro tell the great tankee, and love to worke, and do muchee worke, and because be good master to them."

Jack. "They say no, you would laugh at them, and mock when they show mercy."

Negro. "How! they say when they show mercie; they never show mercie, me never see them show one mercie since me live."

"Now, sir," said I, "if this be so, really they go, I dare say, contrary to your inclination; for I see you are but too full of pity for the miserable; I saw it in my own case; and upon a presumption that you had rather have your work done from a principle of love than fear, without making your servants bleed for every trifle, if it were possible,—I say, upon this presumption, I dealt with this Mouchat as you shall hear."

Mast. "I have never met with anything of this kind since I have been a planter, which is now above 40 years. I am delighted with the story; go on; I expect a pleasant conclusion."

Jack. "The conclusion, sir, will be, I believe, as much to your satisfaction as the beginning; for it every way answered my expectation, and will yours also; and show you how you might be faithfully served if you pleased, for 'tis certain you are not so served now."

Mast. "No, indeed; they serve me, but just as they do the devil, for fear I should hurt them; but 'tis contrary to an ingenuous spirit to delight in such service; I abhor it, if I could but know how to get any other."

Jack. "It is easy, sir, to show you that you may be served upon better principles, and consequently be better served, and more to your satisfaction; and I dare undertake to convince you of it."

Mast. "Well, go on with the story."

Jack. "After I had talked thus to him, I said, 'Well, Mouchat, I shall see how you will be afterward, if I can get our great master to be merciful to you at this time.'"

Negro. "Yes, you shall see, you muchee see, muchee see."

Upon this, I called for my horse, and went from him, and made as if I rode away to you, who, they told me, was in the next plantation, and having stayed four or five hours, I came back and talked to him again; told him that I had waited on you, and that you had heard of his offence, was highly provoked, and had resolved to cause him to be severely punished for an example to all the negroes in the plantation; but that I had told you how penitent he was, and how good he would be if you would pardon him, and had at last prevailed on you: that you had told me what all people said of the negroes; how, that to show them mercy, was to make them think you were never in earnest with them, and that you did but trifle and play with them. However, that I had told you what he had said of himself, and that it was not true of the negroes, and that the white men said it, but that they could not know, because they did never show any mercy, and therefore had never tried: that I had persuaded you to show mercy, to try whether kindness would prevail as much as cruelty. "And now, Mouchat," said I, "you will be let go; pray let our great master see that I have said true." So I ordered him to be untied, gave him a dram of rum out of my pocket bottle, and ordered them to give him some victuals.

When the fellow was let loose, he came to me, and kneeled down to me, and took hold of my legs and of my feet, and laid his head upon the ground, and sobbed and cried like a child that had been corrected, but could not speak for his life; and thus he continued a long time. I would have taken him up, but he could not rise; but I cried as fast as he, for I could not bear to see a poor wretch lie on the ground to me, that was but a servant the other day like himself. At last, but not till a quarter of an hour, I made him get up, and then he spoke. "Me muchee know good great master, muchee good you master. No negro unthankful, me die for them, do me so muchee kind."

I dismissed him then, and bid him go to his wife, (for he was married,) and not work that afternoon; but, as he was going away, I called him again, and talked thus to him.

"Now, Mouchat," says I, "you see the white men can show mercy; now you must tell all the negroes what has been reported of them, that they regard nothing but the whip; that if they are used gently they are the worse, not the better; and that this is the reason why the white men show them no mercy; and convince them that they would be much better treated, and used kindlier, if they would shew themselves as grateful for kind usage as humble after torment; and see if you can work on them."

"Me go, me go," says he, "me muchee talk to them; they be muchee glad as me be, and do great work, to be used kind by de great master."

Mast. "Well, but now, what testimony have you of this gratitude you speak of? Have you seen any alteration among them?"

Jack. "I come next to that part, sir. About a month after this, I caused a report to be spread abroad in the plantation that I had offended you, the great master, and that I was turned out of the plantation, and was to be hanged. Your honour knows that some time ago you sent me upon your particular business into Potuxent river, where I was absent twelve days, then I took the opportunity to have this report spread about among the negroes to see how it would work."

Mast. "What! to see how Mouchat would take it?"

Jack. Yes, sir; and it made a discovery, indeed. The poor fellow did not believe it presently, but, finding I was still absent, he went to the head clerk, and standing at his door, said nothing, but looked like a fool of ten years old. After some time the upper overseer came out, and, seeing him stand there, at first said nothing, supposing he had been sent of some errand; but observing him to stand stock still, and that he was in the same posture and place, during the time that he had passed and repassed two or three times, he stops short the last time of his coming by. "What do you want," says he to him, "that you stand idle here so long?"

"Me speakee, me tell something," says he.

Then the overseer thought some discovery was at hand, and began to listen to him. "What would you tell me?" says he.

"Me tell? Pray," says he, "where be de other master?"

He meant he would ask where he was. "What other master do you mean?" says the clerk. "What, do you want to speak with the great master? He can't be spoke by you. Pray, what is your business; cannot you tell it to me?"

"No, no, me no speakee, the great master, the other master," says Mouchat.

"What, the colonel?" says the clerk.

"Yes, yes, the colonel," says he.

"Why, don't you know that he is to be hanged to-morrow," says the clerk, "for making the great master angry?"

"Yes, yes," says Mouchat, "me know, me know; but me want speak, me tell something."

"Well, what would you say?" says the clerk.

"O! me no let him makee de great master angry;" with that he kneeled down to the clerk.

"What ails you?" says the clerk, "I tell you he must be hanged."

"No, no," says he, "no hang de master; me kneel for him to great master."

"You kneel for him!" says the clerk; "what, do you think the great master will mind you? He has made the great master angry, and must be hanged, I tell you; what signifies your begging?"

Negro. "O! me pray, me pray the great master for him."

Clerk. "Why, what ails you, that you would pray for him?"

Negro. "O! he beggee the great master for me, now me beggee for him; the great master muchee good, muchee good; he pardon me when the other master beggee me, now he pardon him when me beggee for him again."

Clerk. "No, no, your begging won't do. Will you be hanged for him? If you do that, something may be."

Negro. "Yes, yes, me be hang for de poor master that beggee for me: Mouchat shall hang, the great master shall hangee me, whippee me, anything to save the poor master that beggee me; yes, yes, indeed."

Clerk. "Are you in earnest, Mouchat?"

Negro. "Yes, indeed; me tellee de true, the great master shall know me tellee de true, for he shall see the white man hangee me Mouchat; poor negro Mouchat will be hangee, be whippee, anything for the poor master that beggee for me."

With this the poor fellow cried most pitifully, and there was no room to question his being in earnest; when on a sudden I appeared, for I was fetched to see all this transaction. I was not in the house at first, but was just come home from the business you sent me of, and heard it all, and indeed neither the clerk nor I could bear it any longer; so he came out to me,—"Go to him," says he; "you have made an example that will never be forgot, that a negro can be grateful; go to him," adds he, "for I can talk to him no longer." So I appeared, and spoke to him presently, and let him see that I was at liberty; but to hear how the poor fellow behaved your honour cannot but be pleased.

Mast. "Prithee go on, I am pleased with it all;

'tis all a new scene of negro life to me, and very moving."

Jack. "For a good while he stood as if he had been thunderstruck and stupid; but, looking steadily at me, though not speaking a word, at last he mutters to himself, with a kind of a laugh, —" Ay, ay," says he, "Mouchat see, Mouchat no see; me wakee, me no wakee; no hangee, no hangee; he live truly, very live;" and then on a sudden he runs to me, snatches me away as if I had been a boy of ten years old, and takes me up upon his back, and runs away with me, till I was fain to cry out to him to stop; then he sets me down, and looks at me again, then falls a dancing about me, as if he had been bewitched, just as you have seen them do about their wives and children when they are merry.

Well, then he began to talk with me, and told me what they had said to him, how I was to be hanged. "Well," says I, "Mouchat, and would you have been satisfied to be hanged to save me?" "Yes, yes," says he, "be truly hangee to beggee you."

"But why do you love me so well, Mouchat?" said I.

"Did you no beggee me," he says, "at the great master? You savee me, make great master muchee good, muchee kind, no whippee me; me no forget; me be whipped, be hanged, that you no be hanged; me die that you no die; me no let any bad be with you all while that me live."

Now, sir, your honour may judge whether kindness, well managed, would not oblige these people as well as cruelty; and whether there are principles of gratitude in them or no.

Mast. "But what, then, can be the reason that we never believed it to be so before?"

Jack. "Truly, sir, I fear that Mouchat gave the true reason."

Mast. "What was that, pray? that we were too cruel?"

Jack. "That they never had any mercy showed them; that they never tried them whether they would be grateful or no; that if they did a fault, they were never spared, but punished with the utmost cruelty; so that they had no passion, no affection to act upon, but that of fear, which necessarily brought hatred with it; but that, if they were used with compassion, they would serve with affection as well as other servants: nature is the same, and reason governs in just proportions in all creatures; but, having never been let taste what mercy is, they know not how to act from a principle of love."

Mast. "I am convinced it is so; but now, pray tell me, how did you put this in practice with the poor negroes now in bonds yonder, when you passed such a cruel sentence upon them, that they should be whipped twice a-day for four days together; was that showing mercy?"

Jack. "My method was just the same; and if you please to inquire of Mr —, your other servant, you will be satisfied that it was so; for we agreed upon the same measures as I took with Mouchat; namely, first to put them into the utmost horror and apprehensions of the cruelest punishment that they ever heard of, and thereby enhance the value of their pardon, which was to come as from yourself, but not without our great intercession; then I was to argue with them, and work upon their reason, to make the mercy that was showed them sink deep into their minds, and give lasting impressions; explain the meaning of gratitude to them, and the nature of an obligation, and the like, as I had done with Mouchat."

Mast. "I am answered; your method is certainly right, and I desire you may go on with it; for I desire nothing on this side heaven more than to have all my negroes serve me from principles of gratitude for my kindness to them: I abhor to be feared like a lion, like a tyrant; it is a violence upon nature every way, and is the most disagreeable thing in the world to a generous mind."

Jack. "But, sir, I am doubtful that you may not believe that I intended to act thus with those poor fellows; I beseech you to send for Mr —, that he may tell you what we had agreed on, before I speak with him."

Mast. "What reason have I to doubt that?"

Jack. "I hope you have not; but I should be very sorry you should think me capable of executing such a sentence as you have heard me own I had passed on them, and there can be no way effectually to clear it up but this."

Mast. "Well, seeing you put so much weight upon it, he shall be called for."

He was accordingly called, and being ordered by the master to tell the measures that were concerted between us for the punishment or management of those negroes, he gave it just as I had done before.

Jack. "I hope, sir, you are now not only satisfied of the truth of the account I gave, relating to the method we had agreed on; but of its being so proper, and so likely to answer your end."

Mast. "I am fully satisfied, and shall be glad to see that it answers the end; for, as I have said, nothing can be more agreeable to me, nothing has so much robbed me of the comfort of all my fortunes, as the cruelty used, in my name, on the bodies of those poor slaves."

Jack. "It is certainly wrong, sir; it is not only wrong, as it is barbarous and cruel, but it is wrong too, as it is the worst way of managing and of having your business done."

Mast. "It is my aversion, it fills my very soul with horror; I believe, if I should come by while they were using those cruelties on the poor creatures, I should either sink down at the sight of it, or fly into a rage, and kill the fellow that did it, though it is done too by my own authority."

Jack. "But, sir, I dare say I shall convince you also that it is wrong in respect of interest; and that your business shall be better discharged, and your plantations better ordered, and more work done by the negroes, who shall be engaged by mercy and lenity, than by those who are driven and dragged by the whips and the chains of a merciless tormentor."

Mast. "I think the nature of the thing speaks for itself; doubtless it should be so, and I have often thought it would be so, and a thousand times wished it might be so; but all my English people pretended otherwise, and that it is impossible to bring the negroes to any sense of kindness, and consequently not to any obedience of love."

Jack. "It may be true, sir, that there may be found here and there a negro of a senseless, stupid, sordid disposition, perfectly untractable, indocile, and incapable of due impressions; especially incapable of the generosity of principle which I am speaking of. You know very well, sir, there are such among the Christians, as well as among the negroes; whence else came the English proverb, That if you save a thief from the gallows, he shall be the first to cut your throat. But, sir, if such a refractory, indocile fellow comes in our way, he must be dealt with, first, by the smooth ways to try him, then by the violent way to break his temper, as they break a horse; and, if nothing will do, such a wretch should be sold off, and others bought in his room; for the peace of the plantation should not be broken for one devilish tempered fellow: and if this was done, I doubt not you would have all your plantation carried on, and your work done, and not a negro or a servant upon it, but what would not only work for you, but even die for you, if there was an occasion for it, as you see this poor Mouchat would have done for me."

Mast. "Well, go on with your measures, and may you succeed; I'll promise you I will fully make you amends for it; I long to have these cruelties out of use, in my plantation especially; as for others, let them do as they will."

CHAPTER X.

MY MASTER GIVES ME MY LIBERTY, AND PUTS ME INTO A PLANTATION FOR MYSELF—PROCEEDINGS AS A PLANTER—I GET MY BILL CASHED IN LONDON, AND A SORTED PARCEL OF GOODS SENT OUT FOR ITS AMOUNT—THE GREATEST PART OF THEM ARE LOST AT THE MOUTH OF THE BAY—REFLECTIONS.

OUR master being gone, I went to the prisoners, and, first, I suffered them to be told that the great master had been there, and that he had been inclined to pardon them, till he knew what their crime was; but then he said it was so great a fault that it must be punished. Besides, the man that talked to them told them that the great master said that he knew if he had pardoned them they would but be the worse, for that the negroes were never thankful for being spared, and that there were no other ways to make them obedient but by severity.

One of the poor fellows, more sensible than the other, answered, if any negro be badder for being kindly used, they should be whipped till they were muchee better; but that he never knew that, for that he never knew the negro be kindly use.

This was the same thing as the other had said, and, indeed, was but too true, for the overseers really knew no such thing as mercy; and that notion, of the negroes being no other way to be governed but by cruelty, had been the occasion that no other method was ever tried among them.

Again, if a slack hand had at any time been held upon them, it had not been done with discretion, or as a point of mercy, and managed with the assistance of argument to convince the negroes of the nature and reason of it, and to show them what they ought to do in return for it; but it was perhaps the effect of negligence, ill conduct, and want of application to the business of the plantation; and then it was no wonder that the negroes took the advantage of it.

Well, I carried on the affair with these two negroes, just as I did with Mouchat, so I need not repeat the particulars; and they were delivered with infinite acknowledgments and thanks, even to all the extravagancies of joy usual in those people on such occasions; and such was the gratitude of those two pardoned fellows, that they were the most faithful and most diligent servants ever after that belonged to the whole plantation, Mouchat excepted.

In this manner I carried on the plantation fully to his satisfaction; and before a year more was expired, there was scarce any such thing as correction known in the plantation, except upon a few boys, who were incapable of the impressions that good usage would have made, even upon them too, till they had lived to know the difference.

It was some time after this conference that our great master, as we called him, sent for me again to his dwelling-house, and told me he had had an answer from England from his friend, to whom he had written about my bill. I was a little afraid that he was going to ask me leave to send it to London; but he did not say anything like that, but told me that his friend had been with the gentleman, and that he owned the bill, and that he had all the money in his hand that the bill had mentioned; but that he had promised the young man that had given him the money (meaning me) not to pay the money to anybody but himself, though they should bring the bill; the reason of which was, that I did not know who might get the bill away from me.

"But now, Colonel Jack," says he, "as you wrote him an account where you was, and by what wicked arts you were trepanned, and that it was impossible for you to have your liberty till you could get the money; my friend at London has written to me, that, upon making out a due copy of the bill here, attested by a notary, and sent to him, and your obligation likewise attested, whereby you oblige yourself to deliver the original to his order, after the money is paid, he will pay the money."

I told him I was willing to do whatever his honour directed; and so the proper copies were drawn, as I had been told were required.

"But now, what will you do with this money, Jack?" says he, smiling; "will you buy your liberty of me, and go to planting?"

I was too cunning for him now indeed, for I remembered what he had promised me; and I had too much knowledge of the honesty of his principles, as well as of the kindness he had for me, to doubt his being as good as his word; so I turned all this talk of his upon him another way. I knew that when he asked me if I would buy my liberty and go to planting, it was to try if I would leave him; so I said, "As to buying my liberty, sir, that is to say going out of your service, I had much rather buy more time in your service, and I am only unhappy that I have but two years to serve."

"Come, come, Colonel," says he, "don't flatter me; I love plain dealing; liberty is precious to everybody: if you have a mind to have your money brought over, you shall have your liberty to begin for yourself, and I will take care you shall be well used by the country, and get you a good plantation."

I still insisted that I would not quit his service for the best plantation in Maryland: that he had been so good to me, and I believed I was so useful to him, that I could not think of it; and at last I added, I hoped he could not believe but I had as much gratitude as a negro.

He smiled, and said he would not be served upon those terms; that he did not forget what he had promised, nor what I had done in his plantation; and that he was resolved in the first place to give me my liberty: so he pulls out a piece of paper, and throws it to me: "There," says he, "there's a certificate of your coming on shore, and being sold to me for five years, of which you have lived three with me, and now you are your own master." I bowed, and told him that I was sure, if I was my own master, I would be his servant as long as he would accept of my service; and now we strained courtesies, and he told me I should be his servant still; but it should be on two conditions, 1st, that he would give me 30*l.* a year and my board, for my managing the plantation I was then employed in; and, 2dly, that at the same time he would procure me a new plantation to begin upon for my own account; "For, Colonel Jack," says he, smiling, "though you are but a young man, yet 'tis time you were doing something for yourself."

I answered, that I could do little at a plantation for myself, unless I neglected his business, which I was resolved not to do on any terms whatever; but that I would serve him faithfully, if he would accept of me, as long as he lived. "So you shall," says he again; "and serve yourself too." And thus we parted for that time.

Here I am to observe in the general, to avoid dwelling too long upon a story, that as the two negroes, who I delivered from punishment, were ever after the most diligent and laborious poor fellows in the whole plantation, as above, except Mouchat, of whom I shall speak more by and by, so they not only were grateful themselves for their good usage, but they influenced the whole plantation: so that the gentle usage and lenity, with which they had been treated, had a thousand times more influence upon them, to make them diligent, than all the blows and kicks, whippings, and other tortures could have, which they had been used to, and now the plantation was famous for it; so that several other planters began to do the same, though I cannot say it was with the same success, which might be for want of taking pains with them, and working upon their passions in a right manner. It appeared that negroes were to be reasoned into things as well as other people, and it was by thus managing their reason that most of the work was done.

However, as it was, the plantations in Maryland were the better for this undertaking, and they are to this day less cruel and barbarous to their negroes than they are in Barbadoes and Jamaica; and 'tis observed the negroes are not in these colonies so desperate, neither do they so often run away, or so often plot mischief against their master, as they do in those.

I have dwelt the longer upon it, that, if possible, posterity might be persuaded to try gentler methods with those miserable creatures, and to use them with humanity; assuring them, that if they did so, adding the common prudence that every particular case would direct them to for itself, the negroes would do their work faithfully and cheerfully; they would not find any of that refractoriness and sullenness in their temper, that they pretend now to complain of; but they would be the same as their Christian servants, except that they would be the more thankful, and humble, and laborious, of the two.

I continued in this station between five and six years after this, and in all that time we had not one negro whipped, except, as I observed before, now and then an unlucky boy, and that only for trifles. I cannot say but we had some ill-natured, ungovernable negroes; but if at any time such offended they were pardoned the first time, in the manner as above; and the second time were ordered to be turned out of the plantation; and this was remarkable, that they would torment themselves at the apprehension of being turned away, more by a great deal than if they had been to be whipped, for then they were only sullen and heavy; nay, at length we found the fear of being turned out of the plantation had as much effect to reform them, that is to say, make them more diligent than any torture would have done; and the reason was evident, namely, because in our plantation they were used like men, in the others like dogs.

My master owned the satisfaction he took in this blessed change, as he called it, as long as he lived; and as he was so engaged, by seeing the negroes grateful, he showed the same principle or gratitude to those that served him, as he looked for in those that he served; and particularly to me, and so I come briefly to that part. The first thing he did after giving me my liberty, as above, and making me an allowance, was to get the country bounty to me, that is to say, a quantity of land to begin and plant for myself.

But this he managed a way by himself; and, as I found afterwards, took up, that is, purchased in my name, about three hundred acres of land, in a more convenient place than it would have otherwise been allotted me; and this he did by his interest with the lord proprietor; so that I had an extent of ground marked out to me, not next, but very near one of his own plantations. When I made my acknowledgment for this to him, he told me plainly, that I was not beholden to him for it at all; for he did it that I might not be obliged to neglect his business for the carrying on my own, and on that account he would not reckon to me what money he paid, which, however, according to the custom of the country, was not a very great sum; I think about 40*l.* or 50*l.*

Thus he very generously gave me my liberty, advanced this money for me, put me into a plantation for myself, and gave me 30*l.* a year wages for looking after one of his own plantations.

"But, Colonel," says he to me, "giving you this plantation is nothing at all to you, if I do not assist you to support it and to carry it on; and therefore I will give you credit for whatever is needful to you for the carrying it on; such as tools, provisions for servants, and some servants to begin; materials to build out-houses, and conveniencies of all sorts for the plantation, and to buy hogs, cows, horses for stock, and the like, and I'll take it out of your cargo, which will come from London, for the money of your bill."

This was highly obliging and very kind, and the more so, as it afterwards appeared. In order to this, he sent two servants of his own, who were carpenters; as for timber, boards, planks, and all sorts of such things, in a country almost all made of wood, they could not be wanting: these run me up a little wooden house in less than three weeks' time, where I had three rooms, a kitchen, an out-house, and two large sheds at a distance from the house, for store-houses, almost like barns, with stables at the end of them; and thus I was set up in the world, and, in short, removed by the degrees that you have heard, from a pick-pocket to a kidnapped miserable slave in Virginia (for Maryland is Virginia, speaking of them at a distance); then from a slave to a head officer or overseer of slaves, and from thence to a master planter.

I had now, as above, a house, a stable, two warehouses, and 300 acres of land; but, as we say, bare walls make giddy hussies, so I had neither axe nor hatchet to cut down the trees; horse nor hog, nor cow to put upon the land; not a hoe, or a spade, to break ground, nor a pair of hands, but my own, to go to work upon it.

But heaven and kind masters make up all those things to a diligent servant; and I mention it, because people who are either transported, or otherwise trepanned into those places, are generally thought to be rendered miserable, and undone; whereas, on the contrary, I would encourage them, upon my own experience, to depend upon it, that if their own diligence in the time of service gains them but a good character, which it will certainly do if they can deserve it, there is not the poorest and most despicable felon that ever went over, but may, after his time is served, begin for himself, and may in time be sure of raising a good plantation.

For example, I will now take a man in the meanest circumstances of a servant, who has served out his five or seven years (suppose a transported wretch for seven years): the custom of the place was then (what it is since I know not) that on his master's certifying that he had served his time out faithfully, he had fifty acres of land allotted him for planting, and on this plan he begins.

Some had a horse, a cow, and three hogs given, or rather lent them, as a stock for the land, which they made an allowance for at a certain time and rate.

Custom has made it a trade to give credit to such beginners as these, for tools, clothes-nails, iron-work, and other things necessary for their planting; and which the persons, so giving credit to them, are to be paid for, out of the crop of tobacco which they shall plant; nor is it in the debtor's power to defraud the creditor of payment in that manner; and as tobacco is their coin, as well as their product, so all things are to be purchased at a certain quantity of tobacco, the price being so rated.

Thus the naked planter has credit at his beginning, and immediately goes to work to cure the land and plant tobacco; and from this little beginning have some of the most considerable planters in Virginia, and in Maryland also, raised themselves; namely, from being without a hat, or a shoe, to estates of forty or fifty thousand pounds; and in this method, I may add, no diligent man ever miscarried, if he had health to work, and was a good man; for he every year increases a little, and every year adding more land and planting more tobacco, which is real money, he must gradually increase in substance, till at length he gets enough to buy negroes and other servants, and then never works himself any more.

In a word, every Newgate wretch, every desperate forlorn creature, the most despicable ruined man in the world, has here a fair opportunity put into his hands to begin the world again, and that upon a footing of certain gain, and in a method exactly honest; with a reputation that nothing past will have any effect upon: and innumerable people have raised themselves from the worst circumstances in the world, namely, from the cells in Newgate.

But I return to my own story: I was now a planter, and encouraged by a kind benefactor; for, that I might not be wholly taken up with my new plantation, he gave me freely, and without any consideration, my grateful negro Mouchat. He told me it was a debt due to the affection that poor creature had always had for me; and so indeed it was, for as the fellow would once have been hanged for me, so now, and to his last, he loved me so much, that it was apparent he did everything with pleasure that he did for me; and he was so overcome of joy when he heard that he was to be my negro, that the people in the plantation really thought it would turn his head, and that the fellow would go distracted.

Besides this, he sent me two servants more, a man and a woman, but these he put to my account, as above. Mouchat and these two fell immediately to work for me; and they began with about two acres of land, which had but little timber on it at first, and most of that was cut down by the two carpenters who built my house, or shed rather, for so it should be called.

These two acres I got in good forwardness, and most of it well planted with tobacco; though some of it we were obliged to plant with garden-stuff for food; such as potatoes, carrots, cabbages, pease, beans, &c.

It was a great advantage to me that I had so bountiful a master, who helped me out in every case; for in this very first year I received a terrible blow; for my bill, as I have observed, having been copied, and attested in form, and sent to London, my kind friend and custom-house gentleman paid me the money; and the merchant at London, by my good master's direction, had laid it all out in a sorted cargo of goods for me, such as would have made a man of me all at once; but, to my inexpressible terror and surprise, the ship was lost, and that just at the entrance into the capes, that is to say, the mouth of the bay; some of the goods were recovered, but spoiled, and in short, nothing but the nails, tools, and iron-work, were good for anything; and though the value of them was pretty considerable in proportion to the rest, yet my loss was irreparably great, and, indeed, the greatness of the loss consisted in its being irreparable.

I was perfectly astonished at the first news of the loss, knowing that I was in debt to my patron or master so much, that it must be several years before I should recover it; and as he brought me the bad news himself, he perceived my disorder, that is to say, he saw I was in the utmost confusion, and a kind of amazement, and so indeed I was, because I was so much in debt; but he spoke cheerfully to me. "Come," says he, "be not so discouraged, you may make up this loss." "No, sir," says I, "that never can be, for it is my all, and I never shall be out of debt." "Well but," says he, "you have no creditor, however, but me; and now remember, I once told you I would make a man of you, and I will not disappoint you for this disaster."

I thanked him, and did it with more ceremony and respect than ever, because I thought myself more under the hatches than I was before. But he was as good as his word, for he did not baulk me in the least of anything I wanted; and as I had more iron-work saved out of the ship, in proportion, than I wanted, I supplied him with some part of it, and took up some linen and cloths, and other necessities, from him in exchange.

And now I began to increase visibly. I had a large quantity of land cured, that is, freed from timber; and a very good crop of tobacco in view, and I got three servants more, and one negro; so that I had five white servants, and two negroes, and with this my affairs went very well on.

The first year, indeed, I took my wages, or salary (that is to say) of 30*l.* a year, because I wanted it very much; but the second and third years I resolved not to take it, on any account whatsoever, but to leave it in my benefactor's hands, to clear off the debt I had contracted.

And now I must impose a short digression on the reader, to note, that, notwithstanding all the disadvantages of a most wretched education, yet now, when I began to feel myself, as I may say, in the world, and to be arrived to an independent state, and to foresee, that I might be something considerable in time; I say, now I found different sentiments of things taking place in my mind; and, first, I had a solid principle of justice and honesty, and a secret horror at things past, when I looked back upon my former life: that original something, I knew not what, that used formerly to check me in the first meannesses of my youth, and used to dictate to me, when I was but a child, that I was to be a gentleman, continued to operate upon me now, in a manner I cannot describe; and I continually remembered the words of the ancient glass-maker, to the gentleman that he reproved for swearing, that to be a gentleman, was to be an honest man; that without honesty, human nature was sunk and degenerated; the gentleman lost all the dignity of his birth, and placed himself even below an honest beggar. These principles growing upon my mind in the present circumstances I was in, gave me a secret satisfaction that I can give no description of; it was an inexpressible joy to me, that I was now like to be, not only a man, but an honest man; and it yielded me a greater pleasure, that I was ransomed from being a vagabond, a thief, and a criminal, as I had been from a child, than that I was delivered from slavery, and the wretched state of a Virginia sold servant: I had notion enough in my mind of the hardships of the servant, or slave, because I had felt it, and worked through it; I remembered it as a state of labour and servitude, hardship and suffering. But the other shocked my very nature, chilled my blood, and turned the very soul within me; the thought of it was like reflections upon hell and the damned spirits; it struck me with horror, it was odious and frightful to look back on, and it gave me a kind of a fit, a convulsion or nervous disorder, that was very uneasy to me.

But to look forward, to reflect how things were changed, how happy I was, that I could live by my own endeavours, and was no more under the necessity of being a villain, and of getting my bread at my own hazard, and the ruin of honest families; this had in it something more than commonly pleasing and agreeable, and, in particular, it had a pleasure that till then I had known nothing of: it was a sad thing to be under a necessity of doing evil to procure that subsistence which I could not support the want of, to be obliged to run the venture of the gallows rather than the venture of starving, and to be always wicked for fear of want.

I cannot say that I had any serious religious reflections, or that these things proceeded yet from the uneasiness of conscience, but from mere reasonings with myself, and from being arrived to a capacity of making a right judgment of things more than before; yet I own I had such an abhorrence of the wicked life I had led, that I was secretly easy, and had a kind of pleasure in the disaster that was upon me about the ship, and that, though it was a loss, I could not but be glad that those ill-gotten goods were gone, and that I had lost what I had stolen; for I looked on it as none of mine, and that it would be fire in my flax if I should mingle it with what I had now, which was come honestly by, and was (as it were) sent from heaven to lay the foundation of my prosperity, which the other would be only as a moth to consume.

At the same time my thoughts dictated to me, that though this was the foundation of my new life, yet that this was not the superstructure, and that I might still be born for greater things than these; that it was honesty and virtue alone that made men rich and great, and gave them a fame, as well as a figure in the world, and that therefore I was to lay my foundation in these, and expect what might follow in time.

To help these thoughts, as I had learned to read and write when I was in Scotland, so I began now to love books, and particularly I had an opportunity of reading some very considerable ones; such as Livy's Roman history, the history of the Turks, the English history of Speed, and others; the history of the Low Country wars, the history of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, and the history of the Spaniards' conquest of Mexico, with several others, some of which I bought at a planter's house, who was lately dead, and his goods sold, and others I borrowed.

I considered my present state of life to be my mere youth, though I was now above thirty years old, because in my youth I had learned nothing; and if my daily business, which was now great, would have permitted, I would have been content to have gone to school; however, fate, that had yet something else in store for me, threw an opportunity into my hand; namely, a clever fellow, that came over a transported felon from Bristol, and fell into my hands for a servant. He had led a loose life, that he acknowledged, and being driven to extremities, took to the highway, for which, had he been taken, he would have been hanged; but falling into some low-priced rogueries afterwards, for want of opportunity for worse, was caught, condemned, and transported, and, as he said, was glad he came off so.

He was an excellent scholar, and I perceiving it, asked him one time, if he could give a method how I might learn the Latin tongue? He said, smilingly, yes, he could teach it me in three months, if I would let him have books, or even without books, if he had time. I told him a book would become his hands better than a hoe; and if he could promise to make me but understand Latin enough to read it, and understand other languages by it, I would ease him of the labour, which I was now obliged to put him to, especially if I was assured that he was fit to receive that favour of a kind master. In short, I made him to me, what my benefactor made me to him, and from him I gained a fund of knowledge, infinitely more valuable than the rate of a slave, which was what I paid for it: but of this hereafter.

With these thoughts I went cheerfully about my work. As I had now five servants, my plantation went on, though gently, yet safely, and increased gradually, though slowly; but the third year, with the assistance of my old benefactor, I purchased two negroes more, so that now I had seven servants; and having cured land sufficient for supply of their food, I was at no difficulty to maintain them; so that my plantation began now to enlarge itself; and as I lived without any personal expense, but was maintained at my old great master's, as we call him, and at his charge, with 30*l.* a year besides, so all my gain was laid up for increase.

I ADVANCE RAPIDLY TO RICHES AND HONOUR FOR TWELVE YEARS—MY BENEFACTOR DIES—MY PEDAGOGUE RELATES SEVERAL PASSAGES OF HIS LIFE TO ME—I EMBARK FOR ENGLAND—AM TAKEN BY A FRENCH PRIVATEER—THE PRIVATEER TAKES ANOTHER ENGLISH SHIP—ACCOUNT OF HER CARGO.

IN this posture I went on for twelve years, and was very successful in my plantation, and had gotten, by means of my master's favour, who now I called my friend, a correspondent in London, with whom I traded, shipped over my tobacco to him, and received European goods in return, such as I wanted to carry on my plantation, and sufficient to sell to others also.

In this interval, my good friend and benefactor died, and I was left very disconsolate on account of my loss, for it was indeed a great loss to me; he had been a father to me, and I was like a forsaken stranger without him, though I knew the country and the trade too, well enough, and had for some time chiefly carried on his whole business for him; yet I seemed now at a loss; my councillor and my chief supporter was gone, and I had no confidant to communicate with on all occasions, as formerly; but there was no remedy. I was however in a better condition to stand alone than ever; I had a very large plantation, and near seventy negroes, and other servants: In a word, I was grown really rich, considering my first circumstances, that began, as I may say, with nothing: that is to say, I had nothing of stock, but I had a great beginning, for I had such a man's friendship and support in my beginning, that indeed I needed no other stock, and if I had had 500*l.* to have begun with, and not the assistance, advice, and countenance of such a man, I had not been in a better condition; but he promised to make a man of me, and so he did, and in one respect, (I may say) I merited it of him; for I brought his plantation into such order, and the government of his negroes into such a regulation, that if he had given 500*l.* to have had it done, he would have thought his money well bestowed; his work was always in order, going forward to his mind, every thing was in a thriving posture, his servants all loved him, even negroes and all, and yet there was no such thing as a cruel punishment, or severities, known among them.

In my own plantation it was the same thing; I wrought so upon the reason and the affections of my negroes, that they served me cheerfully, and, by consequence, faithfully and diligently; when in my neighbour's plantation, there was not a week hardly passed without such horrible outcries, roarings and yellings of the servants, either under torture, or in fear of it, that their negroes would, in discourse with ours, wish themselves dead, and gone, (as it seems they believed they should after death) into their own country.

If I met with a sullen stupid fellow, as sometimes it was unavoidable, I always parted with him, and sold him off; for I would not keep any that sense of kind usage would not oblige; but I seldom met with such bad ones; for, by talking to them in a plain reasoning way, I found the temper of the roughest of them would break and soften; the sense of their own interest would prevail with them at first or last; and if it had not, the contrary temper was so general among my people, that their own fellows and countrymen would be against them, and that served to bring them to reason, as soon as any other thing; and this, those who think it worth their while, will easily find (viz.) that having prevailed effectually over one leading man among them to be tractable, and pleased, and grateful, he shall make them all like him, and that in a little while, with more ease than can be imagined.

I was now a planter, and also a student; my pedagogue, I mentioned above was very diligent, and proved an extraordinary man indeed; he taught me not only with application, but with admirable judgment in the teaching part; for I have seen it in many instances since that time, that every good scholar is not fitted for a school-master, and that the art of teaching is quite different from that of knowing the language taught.

But this man had both, and proved of great use to me, and I found reason, in the worth of the person, to be very kind to him, the circumstances considered. I once took the liberty to ask him how it came to pass, that he, who must have had a liberal education, and great advantages to have advanced him in the world, should be capable of falling into such miserable circumstances as he was in, when he came over? I used some caution in entering upon an inquiry, which (as I said) might not be pleasant to him to relate; but that I would make him amends, by telling him that if he desired not to enter into it with me, I would readily excuse him, and would not take it ill at all. This I did, because to a man under such afflictions, one should always be tender, and not put them upon relating any thing of themselves, which is grievous to them, or which they had rather was concealed.

But he told me, that it was true, that to look back upon his past life was indeed renovare dolorem; but that such mortifications were now useful to him, to help forward that repentance which he hoped he was sincerely entered upon; and that though it was with horror he looked back upon misspent time, and ill-applied gifts, which a bountiful Creator had blessed him with, and spared to him for a better improvement; yet he thought he ought to load himself with as much of the shame, as it pleased God to make his lot, since he had already loaded himself with the guilt in a shameless manner; till God (he still hoped in mercy to him) had cut him short, and brought him to public disgrace, though he could not say he had been brought to justice, for then he had been sent into eternity in despair, and not been sent to Virginia, to repent of the wickedest life that ever man lived.—He would have gone on, but I found his speech interrupted by a passionate struggle within, between his grief and his tears.

I took no more notice of it, than to tell him, that I was sorry I had asked him about it, but that it was my curiosity. When I saw that ignorant, untaught, untractable creatures come into misery and shame, I made no inquiry after their affairs; but when I saw men of parts and learning take such steps, I concluded it must be occasioned by something exceeding wicked. So indeed, (said he) the judge said to me when I begged mercy of him in Latin; he told me, that when a man, furnished with such learning, falls into such crimes, he is more inexcusable than other men; because his learning recommending him, he could not want advantages, and had the less temptation to crimes.

"But, sir," said he, "I believe my case was what I find is the case of most of the wicked part of the world, viz. that to be reduced to necessity is to be wicked; for necessity is not only the temptation, but is such a temptation as human nature is not empowered to resist. How good then," says he, "is that God, which takes from you, sir, the temptation, by taking away the necessity?"

I was so sensible of the truth of what he said (knowing it by my own case) that I could not enter any farther upon the discourse; but he went on voluntarily. "This, sir," says he, "I am so sensible of, that I think the case I am now reduced to much less miserable than the life which I lived before, because I am delivered from the horrid necessity of doing such ill things, which was my ruin and disaster then, even for my bread, and am not now obliged to ravish my bread out of the mouths of others by violence and disorder; but am fed, though I am made to earn it, by the hard labour of my hands, and I thank God for the difference." He paused here, but went on thus:

"How much is the life of a slave in Virginia to be preferred to that of the most prosperous thief in the world! Here I live miserable, but honest; suffer wrong, but do no wrong; my body is punished, but my conscience is not loaded; and, as I used to say, that I had no leisure to look in, but I would begin when I had some recess, some time to spare, now God has found me leisure to repent." He run on in this manner a great while, giving thanks, I believe most heartily, for his being delivered from the wretched life he had lived, though his misery were to be tenfold as much as it was.

I was sincerely touched with his discourse on this subject; I had known so much of the real difference of the case, that I could not but be affected with it, though till now, I confess, I knew little of the religious part. I had been an offender as well as he, though not altogether in the same degree, but I knew nothing of the penitence; neither had I looked back upon any thing as a crime, but as a life dishonourable, and not like a gentleman, which run much in my thoughts, as I have several times mentioned.

"Well, but now," says I, "you talk penitently and I hope you are sincere; but what would be your case, if you were delivered from the miserable condition of a slave sold for money, which you are now in? Should you not, think you, be the same man?"

"Blessed be God," says he, "that if I thought I should, I would sincerely pray that I might not be delivered, and that I might for ever be a slave rather than a sinner."

"Well but," says I, "suppose you to be under the same necessity, in the same starving condition, should you not take the same course?"

He replied very sharply, "That shows us the need we have of the petition in the Lord's prayer, 'Lead us not into temptation;' and of Solomon's or Hagar's prayer, 'Give me not poverty, lest I steal.' I should ever beg of God not to be left to such snares as human nature cannot resist. But I have some hope, that I should venture to starve, rather than to steal; but I also beg to be delivered from the danger, because I know not my own strength."

This was honestly spoken, indeed; and there really were such visible tokens of sincerity in all his discourse, that I could not suspect him. On some of our discourses on this subject, he pulled out a little dirty paper book, in which he had wrote down such a prayer in verse, as I doubt few Christians in the world could subscribe to; and I cannot but record it, because I never saw any thing like it in my life: the lines are as follow:

Lord! whatsoever sorrows rack my breast,
Till crime removes too, let me find no rest;
How dark soe'er my state, or sharp my pain,
O! let not troubles cease, and sin remain.

For Jesus' sake remove not my distress,
Till free triumphant grace shall repossess
The vacant throne from whence my sins depart,
And make a willing captive of my heart;
Till grace completely shall my soul subdue,
Thy conquest full, and my subjection true.

There were more lines on the same subject, but these were the beginning; and these touching me so sensibly, I have remembered them distinctly ever since, and have, I believe, repeated them to myself a thousand times.

I pressed him no more, you may be sure, after an answer so very particular and affecting as this was; it was easy to see the man was a sincere penitent, not sorrowing for the punishment he was suffering under; for his condition was no part of his affliction, he was rather thankful for it, as above: but his concern was a feeling and affecting sense of the wicked and abominable life he had led, the abhorred crimes he had committed, both against God and man, and the little sense he had had of the condition he was in, and that even till he came to the place where he now was.

I asked him if he had no reflection of this kind after or before his sentence? He told me, Newgate (for the prison at Bristol is called so, it seems, as well as that at London) was a place that seldom made penitents, but often made villains worse, till they learnt to defy God and devil. But that, however, he could look back with this satisfaction, that he could say, he was not altogether insensible of it, even then; but nothing that amounted to a thorough serious looking-up to heaven: that he often indeed looked in, and reflected upon his past misspent life, even before he was in prison, when the intervals of his wicked practices gave some time for reflection, and he would sometimes say to himself, whither am I going? to what will all these things bring me at last? and where will they end? sin and shame follow one another, and I shall certainly come to the gallows; then said he, I would strike upon my breast, and say, O wicked wretch! when wilt thou repent? and would answer myself as often, Never! never! never! except it be in a gaol, or at a gibbet.

"Then," said he, "I would weep and sigh, and look back a little upon my wretched life, the history of which would make the world amazed; but, alas! the prospect was so dark, and it filled me with so much terror, that I could not bear it: then I would fly to wine and company for relief; that wine brought on excess, and that company being always wicked like myself, brought on temptation, and then all reflection vanished, and I was the same devil as before."

He spoke this with so much affection, that his face was ever smiling when he talked of it, and yet his eyes had tears standing in them, at the same time, and all the time; for he had a delightful sorrow, if that be a proper expression in speaking of it.

This was a strange relation to me, and began to affect me after a manner that I did not understand. I loved to hear him talk of it, and yet it always left a kind of a dead lump behind it upon my heart, which I could give no reason for, nor imagine to what it tended. I had a heaviness on my soul, without being able to describe it, or to say what ailed me.

Well, he went on with his relation. "After this," says he, "I fell into the hands of a justice for a trifle, a piece of sport in our crime; and I, that for a hundred robberies, as well on the highway as otherwise, the particulars of which would fill a book to give an account of, ought, (when ever I was taken) to be hanged in chains, and who, if it had been public, could not have failed of having twenty people come in against me, was privately hurried into a country gaol, under a wrong name; tried for a small fact, within benefit of clergy, and in which I was not principally guilty, and by this means obtained the favour of being transported."

"And what think you," said he, "has most sensibly affected me, and brought on the blessed change that, I hope I may say, God has wrought in my soul? not the greatness of my crimes, but the wonders of that merciful Providence, which when it has mercy in store for a man, often brings him into the briers, into sorrow and misery for lesser sins, that men may be led to see how they are spared from the punishment due to them, for the greater guilt which they know lies upon them; do you think, that when I received the grant of transportation, I could be insensible what a miracle of divine goodness such a thing must be, to one who had so many ways deserved to be hanged, and must infallibly have died, if my true name had been known, or if the least notice had been given that it was such a notorious wretch as I that was in custody? There began the first motive of repentance; for certainly the goodness of our great Creator in sparing us, when we forfeit our lives to his justice, and his merciful bringing us out of the miseries which we plunge ourselves into, when we have no way to extricate ourselves; his bringing those very miseries to be the means of our deliverance, and working good to us out of evil, when we are working the very evil out of his good: I say, these things are certainly the strongest motives to repentance that are in the world; and the sparing thieves from the gallows, makes more penitents than the gallows itself."

"It is true," continued he, "that the terror of punishment works strongly upon the mind: in view of death, men are filled with horror of soul, and immediately they call that repentance, which I doubt is too often mistaken, being only a kind of anguish in the soul, which breeds a grief for the punishment that is to be suffered; an amazement founded upon the dreadful view of what is to follow: but the sense of mercy is quite another thing; this seizes all the passions, and all the affections, and works a sincere unfeigned abhorrence of the crime, as a crime; as an offence against our Benefactor, as an act of baseness and ingratitude to him who has given us life, and all the blessings and comforts of life; and who has conquered us by continuing to do us good, when he has been provoked to destroy us."

"This, sir," says he, "has been the fountain of that repentance which I so much rejoice in; this is the delightful sorrow," says he, "that I spoke of just now; and this makes smiles sit on my face, while tears run from my eyes, a joy that I cannot otherwise express, than by telling you, sir, that I never lived a happy day since I came to an age of acting in the world, till I landed in this country, and worked in your plantation, naked and hungry, weary and faint, oppressed with cold in one season, and heat in the other; then I began to see into my own ways, and see the difference between the hardships of the body, and the torment of the mind. Before, I revelled in fullness, and here I struggled with hard fare; then I wallowed in sloth and voluptuous ease; here I laboured till nature sometimes was just sinking under the load; but with this difference in the felicity of either case, namely, that there I had a hell in my soul, was filled with horror and confusion, was a daily terror to myself, and always expected a miserable end; whereas here I had a blessed calm of soul, an emblem and forerunner of heaven, thankful and humble, adoring that mercy that had snatched me out of the jaws of the devil; these took up my thoughts, and made my most weary hours pleasant to me, my labour light, and my heart cheerful; I never lay down on my hard lodging, but I praised God with the greatest excess of affection, not only that it was not the condemned hole, and that I was delivered from the death I had deserved; but that it was not Shooter's hill, that I was not still a robber, a terror to just and honest men, a plunderer of the innocent and the poor, a thief, and a villain, that ought to be rooted out from the earth, for the safety of others; but that I was delivered from the horrid temptation of sinning, to support my luxury, and making one vice necessary to another; and this, I bear witness, is sufficient to sweeten the bitterest sorrow, and make any man be thankful for Virginia, or a worse place, if that can be."

He then entertained me with an opinion of his, that if it were possible for the face of heaven and hell to be disclosed and laid open, and that men could be made capable of seeing distinctly and separately, the joys and glory and utmost felicity of one, and the horrors of the other, and to make a judgment of both according to the power of human reasoning, the first would have a stronger and more powerful effect to reform the world than the latter: but this we had further discourses about on many occasions.

If it should be inquired, how I was capable of hearing all this, and having no impressions made upon my mind by it, especially when it so many ways suited my own case, and the condition of the former part of my life, I shall answer that presently by itself: however, I took no notice of it to him, for he had quite other notions of me than I had of myself; nor did I, as is usual in such cases, enter into any confidence with him on my own story, only that I took sometimes the occasion to let him know, that I did not come over to Virginia in the capacity of a criminal, or that I was not transported; which, considering how many of the inhabitants there were so, who then lived in good circumstances, was needful enough to be done.

But as to myself, it was enough that I was in condition now; 'twas no matter to anybody what I had been; and as it was grown pretty much out of memory from what original disaster I came into the country, or that I was ever a servant, otherwise than voluntary, and that it was no business of mine to expose myself, so I kept that part close; but for all that, it was impossible for me to conceal the disorder I was in, as often as he talked of these things. I had hitherto gone on upon a notion of things founded only in their appearance, as they affected me with good or evil, esteeming the happy and unhappy part of life to be those that gave me ease or sorrow, without regarding, or indeed much understanding, how far those turns of life were influenced by the Giver of Life: or how far they were all directed by a sovereign God that governs the world, and all the creatures He had made.

As I had no education but as you have heard, so I had had no instruction, no knowledge of religion, or indeed of the meaning of it; and though I was now in a kind of search after religion, it was a mere looking, as it were, into the world to see what kind of a thing, or place, it was, and what had been done in it; but as to him that made it, there had truly been scarce a creature among all that he had made, with souls in them, that was so entirely without the knowledge of God as I was, and made so little inquiry about it.

But the serious, affectionate discourse of this young man began to have different effects upon me, and I began to say to myself, this man's reflections are certainly very just; but what a creature am I, and what have I been doing? I that never once did this in all my life; that never said so much as God, I thank thee, for all that I have been saved from, or all that I have been brought to in this world; and yet my life has been as full of variety, and I have been as miraculously delivered from dangers and mischiefs, and as many of them, as ever he has; and if it has all been brought to pass by an invisible hand in mercy to me, what have I been doing? and where have I lived? that I only should be the most thoughtless, and unthankful of all God's creatures!

This indeed began to grow upon me, and made me very melancholy; but as to religion, I understood so little about it, that if I had resolved upon any such thing as a new course of life, or to set about a religious change, I knew not at which end to begin, or what to do about it.

One day it happened that my tutor, for so I always called him, had the Bible in his hand, and was looking in it, as he generally did many times a day, though I knew not for what. Seeing the Bible, I took it out of his hands, and went to look into it, which I had done so little before, that I think I might safely say, I had never read a chapter in it all my life; he was talking of the Bible then as a book only, and where he had it, and how he brought it to Virginia, and in some ecstasy he took and kissed it; "this blessed book!" says he, "this was all the treasure I brought from out England with me, and a comfortable treasure it has been to me," added he; "I would not have been without it in my sorrows for any other treasure in the world," and so he went on at large.

I that had no notion of what he meant, only, as I have said above, some young infant thoughts about the works of Providence in the world, and its merciful dealings with me, took the book out of his hand, and went to look into it, and the book opened at the Acts, xxvi, v. 28, where Felix says to St Paul, 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.' "I think," says I, "here's a line hits me to a tittle, upon the long account you have given of yourself, and I must say them to you, as the governor here said;" and so I read the words to him. He blushed at the text, and returns, "I could answer you in the very words the apostle returned to him in the next verse, 'I would thou wert both, I wish almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds.'"

I was now more than 30 years old by my own account, and, as well as it was possible for me to keep a reckoning of my age, who had nobody left that ever knew my beginning; I was, I say, above 30 years old, and had gone through some variety in the world; but as I was perfectly abandoned in my infancy, and utterly without instruction in my youth, so I was entirely ignorant of everything that was worthy the name of religion in the world, and this was the first time that ever any notion of religious things entered into my heart. I was surprised at this man's talk, and that several ways, particularly, he talked so feelingly of his past circumstances, and they were so like my own, that every time he made a religious inference from his own condition, and argued from one condition of his to another, it struck into my thoughts like a bullet from a gun, that I had certainly as much to be thankful for, and to repent of, as he had, except only that I had no knowledge of better things to be thankful for, which he had; but, in return for that, I was delivered and set up in the world, made a master, and easy, and was in good circumstances, being raised from the very same low distressed condition as he was in, I mean a sold servant; but that he remained so still, so that if his sin had been greater than mine, so his distress was still greater.

This article of gratitude struck deep and lay heavy upon my mind; I remembered that I was grateful to the last degree to my old master, who had raised me from my low condition, and that I loved the very name of him, or, as might be said, the very ground he trod on; but I had not so much as once thought of any higher obligation, no, nor so much as, like the Pharisee, had said, "One God I thank thee," to him, for all the influence which his providence must have had in my whole affair.

It occurred to me presently, that if none of all these things befall us without the direction of a Divine Power, as my new instructor had told me at large, and that God had ordered every thing, the most minute and least transaction of life, inasmuch "that not a hair of our head shall fall to the ground without his permission:" I say, it occurred to me, that I had been a most unthankful dog to that Providence that had done so much for me; and the consequence of the reflection was immediately this, how justly may that power, so disobliged, take away again his wool and his flax with which I am now clothed, and reduce me to the misery of my first circumstances.

This perplexed me much, and I was very pensive and sad; in which, however, my new instructor was a constant comforter to me, and I learned every day something or other from him; upon which I told him one morning, that I thought he must leave off teaching me Latin, and teach me religion.

He spoke with a great deal of modesty of his being incapable of informing me of anything that I did not know, and proposed to me to read the scriptures every day, as the sure and only fund of instruction. I answered that, in the words of the eunuch to St Philip, when the apostle asked him if he understood what he read? "How can I, unless some one guide me?"

We talked frequently upon this subject, and I found so much reason to believe he was a sincere convert, that I can speak of him as no other in all I have to say of him. However, I cannot say my thoughts were yet ripened for an operation of that kind; I had some uneasiness about my past life, and I lived now, and had done so before I knew him, a very regular, sober life, always taken up in my business, and running into no excesses; but as to commencing penitent, as this man had done, I cannot say I had any convictions upon me sufficient to bring it on, nor had I a fund of religious knowledge to support me in it; so it wore off again gradually, as such things generally do, where the first impressions are not deep enough.

In the meantime, as he read over long lectures of his own disasters to me, and applied them all seriously to me, so our discourse was always very solid and weighty, and we had nothing of levity between us, even when we were not concerned in religious discourses. He read history to me; and, where books were wanting, he gave me ideas of those things which had not been recorded by our modern histories, or at least, that our number of books would not reach. By these things he raised an unquenchable thirst in me after seeing something that was doing in the world; and the more, because all the world was at that time engaged, more or less, in the great war wherein the French king might be said to be engaged with and against all the powers of Europe.

Now, I looked upon myself as one buried alive in a remote part of the world, where I could see nothing at all, and hear but a little of what was seen, and that little not till at least half a year after it was done, and sometimes a year or more; and, in a word, the old reproach often came in the way, namely, that even this was not yet the life of a gentleman.

It was true that this was much nearer to it than that of a pickpocket, and still nearer than that of a sold slave; but, in short, this would not do, and I could receive no satisfaction in it. I had now a second plantation, a very considerable one, and it went forward very well; I had on it almost 100 servants already of sundry sorts, and an overseer, that I had a great deal of reason to say I might depend upon, and but that I had a third in embryo, and newly begun, I had nothing to hinder me from going where I pleased.

However, I now began to frame my thoughts for a voyage to England; resolving then to act as I should see cause, but with a secret resolution to see more of the world if possible, and realize those things to my mind which I had hitherto only entertained remote ideas of, by the help of books.

Accordingly I pushed forward the settlement of my third plantation, in order to bring it to be in a posture either to be let to a tenant, or left in trust with an overseer, as I should find occasion.

Had I resolved to leave it to an overseer or steward, no man in the world could have been fit for it like my tutor; but I could not think of parting with him, who was the cause of my desire of travelling, and who I concluded to make my partner in my travels.

It was three years after this before I could get things in order, fit for my leaving the country; in this time I delivered my tutor from his bondage, and would have given him his liberty, but, to my great disappointment, I found that I could not empower him to go to England till his time was expired, according to the certificate of his transportation, which was registered: so I made him one of my overseers, and thereby raised him gradually to a prospect of living in the same manner, and by the like steps, that my good benefactor raised me, only that I did not assist him to enter upon planting for himself as I was assisted, neither was I upon the spot to do it; but this man's diligence and honest application, even unassisted, delivered himself, any farther, than, as I say, by making him an overseer, which was only a present ease and deliverance to him from the hard labour and fare which he endured as a servant.

However, in this trust he behaved so faithfully and so diligently, that it recommended him in the country; and, when I came back, I found him in circumstances very different from what I left him in, besides his being my principal manager for near twenty years, as you shall hear in its place.

I mention these things the more at large, that if any unhappy wretch, who may have the disaster to fall into such circumstances as these may come to see this account, they may learn the following short lessons from these examples:

I. That Virginia, and a state of transportation, may be the happiest place and condition they were ever in for this life, as, by a sincere repentance, and a diligent application to the business they are put to, they are effectually delivered from a life of flagrant wickedness, and put in a perfect new condition, in which they have no temptation to the crimes they formerly committed, and have a prospect of advantage for the future.

II. That in Virginia, the meanest and most despicable creature, after his time of servitude is expired, if he will but apply himself with diligence and industry to the business of the country, is sure (life and health supposed) both of living well and growing rich.

As this is a foundation which the most unfortunate wretch alive is entitled to, a transported felon is, in my opinion, a much happier man than the most prosperous untaken thief in the nation; nor are those poor young people so much in the wrong as some imagine them to be, that go voluntarily over to those countries; and, in order to get themselves carried over, and placed there, freely bind themselves there; especially if the persons into whose hands they fall, do anything honestly by them; for, as it is to be supposed that those poor people knew not what course to take before, or had miscarried in their conduct before, here they are sure to be immediately provided for, and, after the expiration of their time, to be put in a condition to provide for themselves. But I return to my own story, which now begins a new scene.

I was now making provision for my going to England, after having settled my plantation in such hands as was fully to my satisfaction. My first work was to furnish myself with such a stock of goods and money as might be sufficient for my occasions abroad, and particularly might allow me to make large returns to Maryland, for the use and supply of all my plantations; but when I came to look nearer into the voyage, it occurred to me that it would not be prudent to put my cargo all on board the same ship that I went in; so I shipped at several times 500 hogsheads of tobacco in several ships for England, giving notice to my correspondent in London that I would embark about such a time, to come over myself, and ordering him to ensure for a considerable sum, proportioned to the value of my cargo.

About two months after this I left the place and embarked for England, in a stout ship, carrying 24 guns, and about 600 hogsheads of tobacco, and we left the capes of Virginia on the 1st of August. We had a very sour and rough voyage for the first fortnight, though it was in a season so generally noted for good weather.

After we had been about eleven days at sea, having the wind most part of the time blowing very hard at west, or between the west and north-west, by which we were carried a great way farther to the eastward than they usually go in their course for England, we met with a furious tempest, which held us five days, blowing most of the time excessive hard, and by which we were obliged to run away afore the wind, as the seamen call it, wheresoever it was our lot to go. By this storm our ship was greatly damaged, and some leaks we had, but not so bad but that, by the diligence of the seamen, they were stopped: however the captain, after having beaten up again as well as he could against the weather, and the sea going very high, at length he resolved to go away for the Bermudas.

I was not seaman enough to understand what the reason of their disputes was, but in their running for the islands, it seems they overshot the latitude, and could never reach the islands of Bermudas again; the master and the mate differed to an extremity about this, their reckonings being more than usually wide of one another, the storm having driven them a little out of their knowledge. The master being a positive man, insulted the mate about it, and threatened to expose him for it when he came to England; the mate was an excellent sea artist, and an experienced sailor, but withal a modest man; and though he insisted upon his being right, did it in respectful terms, and as it became him; but after several days' dispute, when the weather came to abate, and the heavens to clear up, that they could take their observations and know where they were, it appeared that the mate's account was right, and the captain was mistaken, for they were then in the latitude of 29 degrees, and quite out of the wake of the Bermudas.

The mate made no indecent use of the discovery at all, and the captain being convinced, carried it civilly to him, and so the heats were over among them; but the next question was, what they should do next? Some were for going one way, some another, but all agreed they were not in a condition to go on the direct course for England, unless they could have a southerly or south-west wind, which had not been our fate since we came to sea.

Upon the whole, they resolved by consent to steer away to the Canaries, which was the nearest land they could make, except the Cape de Verd Islands, which were too much to the southward for us, if it could be avoided.

Upon this they stood away N. E., and the wind hanging still westerly, or to the northward of the west, we made good way, and in about 15 days sail we made the Pico Teneriffe, being a monstrous hill in one of the Canary islands. Here we refreshed ourselves, got fresh water, and some fresh provisions, and plenty of excellent wine, but no harbour to run into to take care of the ship, which was leaky and tender, having had so much very bad weather; so we were obliged to do as well as we could and put to sea again, after riding at the Canaries four days only.

From the Canaries we had tolerable weather and a smooth sea, till we came into the soundings, so they call the mouth of the British Channel, and the wind blowing hard at the N. and N. W. obliged us to keep a larger offing, as the seamen call it, at our entrance into the Channel, when, behold! in the grey of the morning a French cruizer or privateer of 26 guns appeared, and crowded after us with all the sail they could make. In short, our captain exchanged a broadside or two with them, which was terrible work to me, for I had never seen such before, the Frenchman's guns having raked us, and killed and wounded six of our best men.

In short, after a fight long enough to show us that if we would not be taken, we must resolve to sink by her side, for there was no room to expect deliverance, and a fight long enough to save the master's credit, we were taken, and the ship carried away to St Malo's.

I was not much concerned for the loss I had in the ship, because I knew I had sufficient in the world somewhere or other; but as I was effectually stripped of everything I had about me, and even almost my clothes from my back, I was in but a very indifferent condition; but somebody informed the captain of the privateer that I was a passenger and a merchant; he called for me and inquired into my circumstances, and coming to hear from myself how I had been used, obliged the seamen to give me a coat and hat, and a pair of shoes, which they had taken of me, and himself gave me a morning gown of his own, to wear while I was in his ship, and, to give him his due, treated me very well.

I had, however, besides my being taken, the mortification to be detained on board the cruizer, and seeing the ship I was in manned with Frenchmen, and sent away, as above, for St Malo's; and this was a great mortification to me afterwards, when, being brought into St Malo's, I heard that our ship was retaken, in her passage to St Malo's, by an English man-of-war, and carried to Portsmouth.

When our ship was sent away, the Rover cruized abroad again in the mouth of the Channel for some time, but met with no purchase; at last they made a sail, which proved to be one of their nation, and one of their own trade, from whom they learned (the news having been carried to England that some French privateers lay off and on in the soundings) that three English men-of-war were come out from Plymouth, on purpose to cruize in the Channel, and that they would certainly meet with us. Upon this intelligence, the Frenchman, a bold brave fellow, far from shrinking from his work, steers away N. E. for St George's Channel, and in the latitude of 48 and a half, unhappily enough, meets with a large and rich English ship, bound home from Jamaica; it was in the grey of the morning, and very clear, when a man on the round-top cried out, A la voile, a sail. I was in hopes, indeed, it had been the English man-of-war, and, by the hurry and clatter they were in to get all ready for a fight, I concluded it was so, and got out of my hammock, for I had no cabin to lie in, that I might see what it was; but I soon found that my hopes were vain, and it was on the wrong side; for that being on our larboard bow, the ship lying then northward to make the coast of Ireland, by the time I was turned out, I could perceive they had all their sails bent and full, having begun to chace, and making great way; on the other hand, it was evident the ship saw them too, and knew what they were, and to avoid them stretched away, with all the canvass they could lay on, for the coast of Ireland, to run in there for harbour.

Our privateer, it was plain, infinitely outsailed her, running two feet for her one, and towards evening came up with them; had they been able to have held it but six hours longer, they would have got into Limerick river, or somewhere under shore, so that we should not have ventured upon them; but we came up with them, and the captain, when he saw there was no remedy, bravely brought to and prepared to fight. She was a ship of 30 guns, but deep in the sea, cumbered between decks with goods, and could not run out her lower deck guns, the sea also going pretty high, though at last she ventured to open her gun-room ports, and fire with three guns on a side; but her worst fate was, she sailed heavy, being deep laden, and the Frenchman had run up by her side, and poured in his broadside, and was soon ready again; however, as she was well manned too, and that the English sailors bestirred themselves, they gave us their broadsides, too, very nimbly and heartily, and I found the Frenchman had a great many men killed at the first brush; but the next was worse, for the English ship, though she did not sail so well as the Frenchman, was a bigger ship, and strong built, and as we (the French) bore down upon them again, the English run boldly on board us, and laid thwart our house, lashing themselves fast to us; then it was that the English captain run out his lower tier of guns, and indeed tore the Frenchman so that, had he held it, the privateer would have had the worst of it. But the Frenchmen, with admirable readiness, indeed, and courage, the captain appearing everywhere with his sword in his hand, bestirred themselves, and loosing themselves from the English ship, thrusting her off with booms, and pouring their small shot so thick, that the other could not appear upon deck: I say, clearing themselves thus, they came to lie a broadside of each other, when, by long firing, the English ship was at length disabled, her mizenmast and bowsprit shot away, and, which was worst of all, her captain killed; so that, after a fight which held all night (for they fought in the dark) and part of the next day, they were obliged to strike.

I was civilly desired by the French captain to go down into the hold while the fight held, and, besides the civility of it, I found he was not willing I should be upon deck. Perhaps he thought I might have some opportunity to do hurt, though I know not how it could be: however, I was very ready to go down, for I had no mind to be killed, especially by my own friends; so I went down and sat by the surgeon, and had the opportunity to find, that the first broad-side the English fired, seven wounded men were brought down to the surgeon, and 33 more afterward; that is to say, when the English lay thwart their bow; and after they cleared themselves, there were about 11 more; so that they had 51 men wounded, and about 22 killed; the Englishman had 18 men killed and wounded, among whom was the captain.

The French captain, however, triumphed in this prize, for it was an exceeding rich ship, having abundance of silver on board; and after the ship was taken, and they had plundered all the great cabin afforded, which was very considerable, the mate promised the captain, that, if he would give him his liberty, he would discover 6,000 pieces of eight to him privately, which none of the men should know of. The captain engaged, and gave it under his hand to set him at liberty as soon as he came on shore: accordingly, in the night, after all was either turned in, as they call it, or employed on the duty of the watch, the captain and the mate of the prize went on board, and having faithfully discovered the money, which lay in a place made on purpose to conceal it, the captain resolved to let it lie till they arrived, and then he conveyed it on shore for his own use; so that the owners, nor the seamen, ever came to any share of it, which by the way was a fraud in the captain. But the mate paid his ransom by the discovery, and the captain gave him his liberty very punctually, as he had promised, and 200 pieces of eight to carry him to England, and to make good his losses.

When he had made this prize, the captain thought of nothing more than how to get safe to France with her; for she was a ship sufficient to enrich all his men, and his owners also. The account of her cargo, by the captain's books, of which I took a copy, was in general—

260 Hogsheads of sugar.
187 Smaller casks of sugar.
176 Barrels of indigo.
28 Casks of pimento.
42 Bags of cotton wool.
80 Cwt. of elephants' teeth.
60 Small casks of rum.
18,000 Pieces of eight, besides the 6,000 concealed.

Several parcels of drugs, tortoise-shell, sweet-meats, called succads, chocolate, lime-juice, and other things of considerable value.

This was a terrible loss among the English merchants, and a noble booty for the rogues that took it; but as it was in open war, and by fair fighting, as they call it, there was no objection to be made against them, and, to give them their due, they fought bravely for it.

CHAPTER XII.

WE LAND AT BOURDEAUX, IN FRANCE—I GET RID OF MY CAPTAIN WITHOUT PAYING RANSOM, AND ARRIVE AT GHENT, WHERE I JOIN THE ARMY—PROCEEDINGS THERE—I ARRIVE IN LONDON, AND HEAR NEWS OF MAJOR JACK—I FALL IN LOVE—MY MISTRESS'S ARTS TO ENTRAP ME INTO MATRIMONY—I MARRY, AND REPENT IT.

THE captain was not so bold as to meet the English men-of-war before, but he was as wary now; for, having a prize of such value in his hands, he was resolved not to lose her again, if he could help it; so he stood away to the southward, and that so far, that I once thought he was resolved to go into the Streights, and home by Marseilles. But having sailed to the latitude of 45, 3 qrs. or thereabouts, he steered away east, into the bottom of the Bay of Biscay, and carried us all into the river of Bourdeaux, where, on notice of his arrival with such a prize, his owners or principals came overland to see him, and where they consulted what to do with her; the money they secured to be sure, and some of the cargo; but the ships sailed afterwards along the coast to St Malo, taking the opportunity of some French men-of-war, which were cruising on the coast, to be their convoy as far as Ushant.

Here the captain rewarded and dismissed the English mate, as I have said, who got a passage from thence to Dieppe by sea, and after that into England, by the help of a passport, through Flanders to Ostend; the captain, it seems, the more willingly shipped him off, that he might not discover to others what he had discovered to him.

I was now at Bourdeaux, in France, and the captain asked me one morning what I intended to do? I did not understand him at first, but he soon gave me to understand, that I was now either to be delivered up to the state as an English prisoner, and so be carried to Dinant, in Brittany, or to find means to have myself exchanged, or to pay my ransom, and this ransom he told me at first was 300 crowns.

I knew not what to do, but desired he would give me time to write to England to my friends; for that I had a cargo of goods sent to them by me from Virginia, but I did not know but it might have fallen into such hands as his were, and if it was, I knew not what would be my fate. He readily granted that, so I wrote by the post, and had the satisfaction, in answer to it, to hear that the ship I was taken in had been retaken, and carried into Portsmouth, which I doubted would have made my new master more strict, and perhaps insolent, but he said nothing of it to me, nor I to him, though, as I afterwards understood, he had advice of it before.

However, this was a help to me, and served to more than pay my ransom to the captain; and my correspondent in London hearing of my being alive, and at Bourdeaux, immediately sent me a letter of credit upon an English merchant at Bourdeaux for whatever I might have occasion for. As soon as I received this, I went to the merchant, who honoured the letter of credit, and told me, I should have what money I pleased. But as I, who was before a mere stranger in the place, and knew not what course to take, had now, as it were, a friend to communicate my affairs to, and consult with; as soon as I told him my case, "Hold," says he, "if that be your case, I may perhaps find a way to get you off without a ransom."

There was, it seems, a ship bound home to France from Martinico, taken off Cape Finisterre, by an English man-of-war, and a merchant of Rochelle being a passenger, was taken on board, and brought into Plymouth. This man had made great solicitation by his friends to be exchanged, pleading poverty, and that he was unable to pay any ransom. My friend told me something of it, but not much, only bade me not be too forward to pay any money to the captain, but pretend I could not hear from England. This I did, till the captain appeared impatient.

After some time, the captain told me I had used him ill; that I had made him expect a ransom, and he had treated me courteously, and been at expence to subsist me, and that I held him in suspense, but that, in short, if I did not procure the money, he would send me to Dinant in ten days, to lie there as the king's prisoner till I should be exchanged. My merchant gave me my cue, and by his direction I answered, I was very sensible of his civility, and sorry he should lose what expences he had been at; but that I found my friends forgot me, and what to do I did not know, and that, rather than impose upon him, I must submit to go to Dinant, or where he thought fit to send me; but that if ever I obtained my liberty, and came into England, I would not fail to reimburse him what expence he had been at for my subsistence; and so, in short, made my case very bad in all my discourse. He shook his head, and said little, but the next day entered me in the list of English prisoners, to be at the king's charge, as appointed by the intendant of the place, and to be sent away into Brittany.

I was then out of the captain's power, and immediately the merchant, with two others, who were friends to the merchant prisoner at Plymouth, went to the intendant, and gained an order for the exchange, and my friend giving security for my being forthcoming, in case the other was not delivered, I had my liberty immediately, and went home with him to his house.

Thus we bilked the captain of his ransom money; but, however, my friend went to him, and letting him know that I was exchanged by the governor's order, paid him whatever he could say he was in disburse on my account; and it was not then in the captain's power to object, or to claim anything for a ransom.

I got passage from hence to Dunkirk, on board a French vessel; and, having a certificate of an exchanged prisoner from the intendant at Bourdeaux, I had a passport given me, to go into the Spanish Netherlands, and so whither I pleased.

Accordingly I came to Ghent, in April —, just as the armies were going to take the field; I had no dislike to the business of the army, but

I thought I was a little above it now, and had other things to look to; for that, in my opinion, nobody went into the field but those that could not live at home: and yet I resolved to see the manner of it a little too; so having made an acquaintance with an English officer, quartered at Ghent, I told him my intention, and he invited me to go with him, and offered me his protection as a volunteer, that I should quarter with him in his tent, and live as I would, and either carry arms or not, as I saw occasion.

The campaign was none of the hardest that had been, or were like to be; so that I had the diversion of seeing the service, as it was proper to call it, without much hazard; indeed, I did not see any considerable action, for there was not much fighting that campaign; as to the merit of the cause on either side, I knew nothing of it, nor had I suffered any of the disputes about it to enter into my thoughts. The Prince of Orange had been made king of England, and the English troops were all on his side; and I heard a great deal of swearing and damning for king William, among the soldiers; but as for fighting, I observed the French beat them several times, and particularly the regiment my friend belonged to, was surrounded in a village where they were posted, I knew not upon what occasion, and all taken prisoners. But by great good hap, I being not in service, and so not in command, was strolled away that day to see the country about; for it was my delight to see the strong towns, and observe the beauty of their fortifications; and while I diverted myself thus, I had the happy deliverance of not being taken by the French for that time.

When I came back I found the enemy possessed of the town, but as I was no soldier they did me no harm, and having my French passport in my pocket, they gave me leave to go to Nieuport, where I took the packet-boat, and came over to England, landing at Deal instead of Dover, the weather forcing us into the Downs, and thus my short campaign ended, and this was my second essay at the trade of soldiering.

When I came to London I was very well received by my friend to whom I had consigned my effects, and I found myself in very good circumstances; for all my goods, which, as above, by several ships, I had consigned to him, came safe to hand, and my overseers that I had left behind had shipped at several times 400 hhds. of tobacco to my correspondent in my absence, being the product of my plantation, or part of it, for the time of my being abroad; so that I had above a thousand pounds in my factor's hands, 200 hhds. of tobacco besides left in hand, not sold.

I had nothing to do now but entirely to conceal myself from all that had any knowledge of me before, and this was the easiest thing in the world to do, for I was grown out of everybody's knowledge, and most of those I had known were grown out of mine. My captain, who went with me, or, rather, who carried me away, I found by inquiring at the proper place, had been rambling about the world, came to London, fell into his own trade, which he could not forbear, and, growing an eminent highwayman, had made his exit at the gallows, after a life of fourteen years most exquisite and successful rogueries, the particulars of which would make (as I observed) an admirable history. My other brother Jack, whom I called Major, followed the like wicked trade, but was a man of more gallantry and generosity, and having committed innumerable depredations upon mankind, yet had always so much dexterity as to bring himself off, till at length he was laid fast in Newgate, and loaded with irons, and would certainly have gone the same way as the captain, but he was so dexterous a rogue that no gaol, no fetters, would hold him; and he, with two more, found means to knock off their irons, worked their way through the wall of the prison, and let themselves down on the outside in the night; so escaping, they found means to get into France, where he followed the same trade, and with so much success that he grew famous by the name of Anthony, and had the honour, with three of his comrades, who he had taught the English way of robbing generously (as they called it) without murdering or wounding, or ill-using those they robbed, I say, he had the honour to be broke upon the wheel at the Grève in Paris.

All these things I found means to be fully informed of, and to have a long account of the particulars of their conduct from some of their comrades who had the good fortune to escape, and whom I got the knowledge of without letting them so much as guess at who I was or upon what account I inquired.

I was now at the height of my good fortune; indeed, I was in very good circumstances, and being of a frugal temper from the beginning, I saved things together as they came, and yet lived very well too; particularly I had the reputation of a very considerable merchant, and one that came over vastly rich from Virginia; and as I frequently bought supplies for my several families and plantations there, as they wrote to me for them, so I passed, I say, for a great merchant.

I lived single, indeed, and in lodgings, but I began to be very well known, and though I had subscribed my name only Jack to my particular correspondent, yet the French, among whom I lived near a year (as I have said), not understanding what Jack meant, called me Monsieur Jacque, and Colonel Jacques, and so gradually Colonel Jacque; so I was called in the certificate of exchanging me with the other prisoner, so that I went so also into Flanders; upon which, and seeing my certificate of exchange (as above), I was called Colonel Jacques in England by my friend whom I called correspondent; and thus I passed for a foreigner and a Frenchman, and I was infinitely fond of having everybody take me for a Frenchman; and, as I spoke French very well, having learned it by continuing so long among them, so I went constantly to the French church in London, and spoke French upon all occasions, as much as I could; and, to complete the appearance of it, I got me a French servant to do my business, I mean as to my merchandise, which only consisted in receiving and disposing of tobacco, of which I had about 500 to 600 hhds. a year from my own plantations, and in supplying my people with necessaries as they wanted them.

In this private condition I continued about two years more, when the devil, owing me a spleen ever since I refused being a thief, paid me home, with my interest, by laying a snare in my way, which had almost ruined me.

There dwelt a lady in the house opposite to the house I lodged in, who made an extraordinary figure, indeed; she went very well dressed, and was a most beautiful person; she was well bred, sung admirably fine, and sometimes I could hear her very distinctly, the houses being over against one another, in a narrow court, not much unlike Three king court in Lombard street.

This lady put herself so often in my way that I could not in good manners forbear taking notice of her, and giving her the ceremony of my hat when I saw her at the window, or at the door, or when I passed her in the court, so that we became almost acquainted at a distance: Sometimes she also visited at the house I lodged at, and it was generally contrived that I should be introduced when she came, and thus by degrees we became more intimately acquainted, and often conversed together in the family, but always in public, at least for a great while.

I was a mere boy in the affair of love, and knew the least of what belonged to a woman of any man in Europe of my age; the thoughts of a wife, much less of a mistress, had never so much as taken the least hold of my head, and I had been till now as perfectly unacquainted with the sex, and as unconcerned about them as I was when I was ten years old, and lay in a heap of ashes at a glass-house.

But I know not by what witchcraft in the conversation of this woman, and her singling me out upon several occasions, I began to be ensnared, I knew not how, or to what end; and was on a sudden so embarrassed in my thoughts about her, that, like a charm, she had me always in her circle; if she had not been one of the subtlest women on earth, she could never have brought me to have given myself the least trouble about her; but I was drawn in by the magic of a genius capable to deceive a more wary capacity than mine, and it was impossible to resist her.

She attacked me without ceasing with the fineness of her conduct, and with arts, which were impossible to be ineffectual; she was ever, as it were, in my view, often in my company, and yet kept herself so on the reserve, so surrounded continually with obstructions, that for several months after she could perceive I sought an opportunity to speak to her, she rendered it impossible, nor could I ever break in upon her, she kept her guard so well.

This rigid behaviour was the greatest mystery that could be, considering, at the same time, that she never declined my seeing her, or conversing with me in public; but she held it on, she took care never to sit next me, that I might slip no paper into her hand, or speak softly to her; she kept somebody or other always between, that I could never come up to her; and thus, as if she was resolved really to have nothing to do with me, she held me at the bay several months.

All this while nothing was more certain than that she intended to have me, if she could catch, and it was indeed a kind of a catch, for she managed all by art, and drew me in by the most resolute backwardness, that it was almost impossible not to be deceived by it; on the other hand, she did not appear to be a woman despicable, neither was she poor, or in a condition that should require so much art to draw any man in; but the cheat was really on my side, for she was unhappily told that I was vastly rich, a great merchant, and that she would live like a queen, which I was not at all instrumental in putting upon her, neither did I know that she went upon that motive.

She was too cunning to let me perceive how easy she was to be had; on the contrary, she ran all the hazards of bringing me to neglect her entirely, that one would think any woman in the world could do; and I have often wondered since how it was possible it should fail of making me perfectly averse to her; for as I had a perfect indifference for the whole sex, and never till then entertained any notion of them, they were no more to me than a picture hanging up against a wall.

As we conversed freely together in public, so she took a great many occasions to rally the men, and the weakness they were guilty of, in letting the women insult them as they did; she thought if the men had not been fools, marriage had been only treaties of peace between two neighbours, or alliances offensive or defensive, which must necessarily have been carried on sometimes by interviews and personal treaties, but oftener by ambassadors, agents, and emissaries on both sides; but that the women had outwitted us, and brought us upon our knees, and made us whine after them and lower ourselves, so as we could never pretend to gain our equality again.

I told her I thought it was a decency to the ladies to give them the advantage of denying a little that they might be courted, and that I should not like a woman the worse for denying me. "I expect it, madam," says I, "when I wait on you to-morrow," intimating that I intended it. "You shan't be deceived, sir," says she, "for I'll deny now before you ask me the question."

I was dashed so effectually with so malicious, so devilish an answer, that I returned with a little sullenness, "I shan't trespass upon you yet, madam, and I shall be very careful not to offend you when I do."

"It is the greatest token of your respect, sir," says she, "that you are able to bestow upon me, and the most agreeable too, except one, which I will not be out of hopes of obtaining of you in a little time."

"What is in my power to oblige you in, madam," said I, "you may command me in at any time, especially the way we are talking of." This I spoke still with a resentment very sincere.

"It is only, sir, that you would promise to hate me with as much sincerity as I will endeavour to make you a suitable return."

"I granted that request, madam, seven years before you asked it," said I, "for I heartily hated the whole sex, and scarce know how I came to abate that good disposition in compliment to your conversation; but I assure you that abatement is so little that it does no injury to your proposal."

"There's some mystery in that, indeed, sir," said she, "for I desired to assist your aversion to women in a more particular manner, and hoped it should never abate under my management."

We said a thousand ill-natured things after this, but she outdid me, for she had such a stock of bitterness upon her tongue as no woman ever went beyond her, and yet all this while she was the pleasantest and most obliging creature in every part of our conversation that could possibly be, and meant not one word of what she said, no, not a word. But I must confess it no way answered her end, for it really cooled all my thoughts of her; and I, that had lived in so perfect an indifference to the sex all my days, was easily returned to that condition again, and began to grow very cold and negligent in my usual respects to her upon all occasions.

She soon found she had gone too far with me; and, in short, that she was extremely out in her politics; that she had to do with one that was not listed yet among the whining sort of lovers, and knew not what it was to adore a mistress in order to abuse her; and that it was not with me, as it was with the usual sort of men in love, that are warmed by the cold and rise in their passions as the ladies fall in their returns; on the contrary, she found that it was quite altered; I was civil to her as before, but not so forward; when I saw her at her chamber window I did not throw mine open, as I usually had done, to talk with her; when she sung in the parlour, where I could easily hear it, I did not listen; when she visited at the house where I lodged I did not always come down, or if I did, I had business which obliged me to go abroad; and yet all this while, when I did come into her company, I was as intimate as ever.

I could easily see that this madded her to the heart, and that she was perplexed to the last degree, for she found that she had all her game to play over again; that so absolute a reservedness, even to rudeness and ill-manners, was a little too much; but she was a mere posture mistress in love, and could put herself into what shapes she pleased.

She was too wise to show a fondness or forwardness that looked like kindness; she knew that was the meanest and last step a woman can take, and lays her under the foot of the man she pretends to; but she was not come to that neither. Thisameleon put on another colour, turned on a sudden the gravest, soberest, majestic madam, so that any one would have thought she was advanced in age in one week from two-and-twenty to fifty, and this she carried on with so much government of herself that it did not in the least look like art; but if it was a representation of nature only, it was so like nature itself, that nobody living can be able to distinguish; she sung very often in her parlour, as well by herself as with two young ladies who came often to see her; I could see by their books, and her guitar in her hand, that she was singing, but she never opened the window as she was wont to do. Upon my coming to my window she kept her own always shut; or if it was open, she would be sitting at work and not look up, it may be, once in half an hour.

If she saw me by accident all this while, she would smile and speak as cheerfully as ever, but it was but a word or two, and so make her honours and be gone; so that, in a word, we conversed just as we did after I had been there a week.

She tired me quite out at this work; for though

I began the strangeness indeed, yet I did not design the carrying it on so far; but she held it to the last, just in the same manner as she began it. She came to the house where I lodged as usual, and we were often together, supped together, played at cards together, danced together; for in France I accomplished myself with everything that was needful, to make me what I believed myself to be even from a boy, I mean a gentleman; I say we conversed together, as above, but she was so perfectly another thing to what she used to be in every part of her conversation, that it presently occurred to me that her former behaviour was a kind of a rant or fit; that either it was the effect of some extraordinary levity that had come upon her, or that it was done to mimic the coquets of the town, believing it might take with me, who she thought was a Frenchman, and that it was what I loved; but her new gravity was her real natural temper, and indeed it became her so much better, or, as I should say, she acted it so well, that it really brought me back to have, not as much only, but more mind to her, than ever I had before.

However it was a great while before I discovered myself, and I staid indeed to find out, if possible, whether this change was real or counterfeit; for I could not easily believe it was possible the gay humour she used to appear in could be a counterfeit; It was not, therefore, till a year and almost a quarter that I came to any resolution in my thoughts about her, when, on a mere accident, we came to a little conversation together.

She came to visit at our house as usual, and it happened all the ladies were gone abroad; but, as it fell out, I was in the passage, or entry of the house, going towards the stairs, when she knocked at the door; so stepping back, I opened the door, and she, without any ceremony, came in, and ran forward into the parlour, supposing the women had been there. I went in after her, as I could do no less, because she did not know that the family was abroad.

Upon my coming in, she asked for the ladies. I told her, I hoped she came to visit me now, for that the ladies were all gone abroad. "Are they?" said she, as if surprised (though I understood afterwards she knew it before, as also that I was at home), and then rises up to be gone. "No, madam," said I, "pray do not go; when ladies come to visit me, I do not use to tire them of my company so soon." "That's as ill-natured," says she, "as you could possibly talk; pray don't pretend I came to visit you; I am satisfied who I came to visit, and satisfied that you know it." "Yes, madam," said I, "but if I happen to be all of the family that's left at home, then you came to visit me."

"I never receive visits from those that I hate," says she.

"You have me there indeed," said I, "but you never gave me leave to tell you why I hated you; I hated you because you would never give me an opportunity to tell you I loved you; sure, you took me for some frightful creature, that you would never come near enough, so much as to let me whisper to you that I love you."

"I never care to hear anything so disagreeable," says she, "though it be spoken ever so softly."

We rallied thus for an hour; in short, she showed the abundance of her wit, and I an abundant deficiency of mine; for though three or four times she provoked me to the last degree, so that once I was going to tell her I had enough of her company, and, if she pleased, I would wait upon her to the door, yet she had always so much witchcraft on her tongue, that she brought herself off again; till, to make the story short, we came at last to talk seriously on both sides about matrimony, and she heard me freely propose it, and answered me directly upon many occasions. For example, she told me I would carry her away to France, or to Virginia, and that she could not think of leaving England, her native country; I told her, I hoped she did not take me for a kidnapper. By the way, I did not tell her how I had been kidnapped myself. She said no, but the consequence of my affairs, which were, it seems, mostly abroad, might oblige me to go, and she could never think of marrying any man that she could not be content to go all over the world with, if he had occasion to go himself. This was handsomely expressed indeed; I made her easy in that point, and thus we began the grand parley, which indeed she drew me into with the utmost art and subtilty, such as was peculiar to herself, but was infinitely her advantage in our treating of marriage: for she made me effectually court her, though at the same time in her design she courted me with the utmost skill, and such skill it was, that her design was perfectly impenetrable to the last moment.

In short, we came nearer and nearer every time we met, and after one casual visit more, in which I had the mighty favour of talking with her alone, I then waited on her every day at her own house, or lodgings rather, and so we set about the work to a purpose, and in about a month we gave the world the slip, and were privately married, to avoid ceremony and the public inconvenience of a wedding.

We soon found a house proper for our dwelling, and so went to housekeeping: we had not been long together, but I found that gay temper of my wife returned, and she threw off the mask of her gravity and good conduct, that I had so long fancied was her mere natural disposition, and now, having no more occasion for disguises, she resolved to seem nothing but what really she was, a wild, untamed colt, perfectly loose, and careless to conceal any part, no, not the worst of her conduct.

She carried on this air of levity to such an excess, that I could not but be dissatisfied at the expense of it, for she kept company that I did not like, lived beyond what I could support, and sometimes lost at play more than I cared to pay: upon which, one day, I took occasion to mention it, but lightly; and said to her, by way of railery, that we lived merrily, for as long as it would last; she turned very short upon me. "What do you mean?" says she; "why, you do not pretend to be uneasy, do ye?"—"No, no, madam, not I, by no means; it is no business of mine, you know," said I, "to inquire what my wife spends, or whether she spends more than I can afford, or less; I only desire the favour to know, as near as you can guess, how long you will please to take to dispatch me, for I would not be too long a dying."

"I do not know what you talk of," says she; "you may die as leisurely, or as hastily as you please, when your time comes; I an't a going to kill you, as I know of."

"But you are a going to starve me, madam," said I, "and hunger is as leisurely a death as breaking upon the wheel."

"I starve you! Why, are not you a great Virginia merchant, and did not I bring you 1,500*l.*? What would you have? Sure, you can maintain a wife out of that, can't you?"

"Yes, madam," says I, "I could maintain a wife, but not a gamester, though you had brought me 1,500*l.* a-year; no estate is big enough for a box and dice."

She took fire at that, and flew out in a passion, and, after a great many bitter words, told me, in short, that she saw no occasion to alter her conduct; and as for my not maintaining her, when I could not maintain her longer she would find some way or other to maintain herself.

Some time after the first rattle of this kind she vouchsafed to let me know that she was pleased to be with child; I was at first glad of it, in hopes it would help to abate her madness; but it was all one, and her being with child only added to the rest, for she made such preparations for her lying-in, and the other appendices of a child's being born, that, in short, I found she would be downright distracted; and I took the liberty to tell her one day that she would soon bring herself and me to destruction, and entreated her to consider that such figures as those were quite above us, and out of our circle; and, in short, that I neither could nor would allow such expenses; that, at this rate, two or three children would effectually ruin me, and that I desired her to consider what she was doing.

She told me, with an air of disdain, that it was none of her business to consider anything of that matter; that if I could not allow it, she would allow it herself, and I might do my worst.

I begged her to consider things for all that, and not drive me to extremities; that I married her to love and cherish her, and use her as a good wife ought to be used, but not to be ruined and undone by her. In a word, nothing could mollify her, nor any argument persuade her to moderation, but withal she took it so heinously that I should pretend to restrain her that she told me in so many words she would drop her burthen with me, and then, if I did not like it, she would take care of herself, she would not live with me an hour; for she would not be restrained, not she, and talked a long while at that rate.

I told her, as to her child, which she called her burthen, it should be no burthen to me, as to the rest, she might do as she pleased; it might however do me this favour, that I should have no more lyings-in at the rate of 136*l.* at a time, as I found she intended it should be now. She told me she could not tell that; if she had no more by me, she hoped she should by somebody else. "Say you so, madam?" said I, "then they that get them shall keep them." She did not know that neither, she said, and so turned it off jeering, and, as it were, laughing at me.

This last discourse nettled me, I must confess, and the more, because I had a great deal of it, and very often, till, in short, we began at length to enter into a friendly treaty about parting.

Nothing could be more criminal than the several discourses we had upon this subject; she demanded a separate maintenance, and, in particular, at the rate of 300*l.* a year, and I demanded security of her that she should not run me in debt; she demanded the keeping of the child, with an allowance of 100*l.* a year for that, and I demanded that I should be secured from being charged for keeping any she might have by some body else, as she had threatened me.

In the interval, and during these contests, she dropped her burthen (as she called it) and brought me a son, a very fine child.

She was content, during her lying-in, to abate a little, though it was but a very little indeed, of the great expense she had intended; and, with some difficulty and persuasion, was content with a suit of child-bed linen of 15*l.* instead of one she had intended of threescore; and this she magnified as a particular testimony of her condescension, and a yielding to my avaricious temper, as she called it.

But after she was up again, it was the same thing, and she went on with her humour to that degree, that in a little time she began to carry it on to other excesses, and to have a sort of fellows come to visit her, which I did not like, and once, in particular, staid abroad all night. The next day, when she came home, she began to cry out first; told me where (as she said) she lay, and that the occasion was a christening, where the company had a feast, and staid too late; that if I was dissatisfied, I might inform myself there of all the particulars, where she lay, and the like. I told her coldly, "Madam, you do well to suggest my being dissatisfied, for you may be sure I am, and you could expect no other; as to going to your haunts to inform myself, that is not my business; it is your business to bring testimonies of your behaviour, and to prove where you lay, and in what company; it is enough for me that you lay out of your own house, without your husband's knowledge or consent, and before you and I converse again I must have some satisfaction of the particulars."

She answered, with all her heart, she was as indifferent as I, and since I took so ill her lying at a friend's house on an extraordinary occasion, she gave me to understand that it was what she would have me expect, and what she would have the liberty to do when she thought fit.

"Well, madam," said I, "if I must expect what I cannot allow, you must expect I shall shut my doors by day against those that keep out of them at night."

She would try me, she said, very speedily, and if I shut the doors against her she would find a way to make me open them.

"Well, madam," says I, "you threaten me hard, but I would advise you to consider before you take such measures, for I shall be as good as my word. However, it was not long that we could live together upon these terms; for I found very quickly what company she kept, and that she took a course which I ought not to bear; so I began the separation first, and refused her my bed: we had indeed refrained all converse as husband and wife for about two months before, for I told her very plainly I would father no brats that were not of my own getting; and matters coming thus gradually to an extremity, too great to continue as it was, she went off one afternoon and left me a line in writing, signifying that affairs were come to such a pass between us, that she did not think fit to give me the opportunity of shutting her out of doors, and that therefore she had retired herself to such a place, naming a relation of her own, as scandalous as herself; and that she hoped I would not give her the trouble to sue for her support in the ordinary course of law. but that, as her occasions required, she should draw bills upon me, which she expected I would not refuse.

CHAPTER XIII.

PART FROM MY WIFE—I AM INSULTED BY ONE OF HER EMISSARIES—WALKING OUT IN THE EVENING I AM WAYLAID AND WOUNDED—I OBTAIN A COMPANY IN A REGIMENT AND GO OVER TO FRANCE—ADVENTURES THERE.

I WAS extremely satisfied with this proceeding, and took care to let her hear of it, though I gave no answer at all to her letter, and as I had taken care before that whenever she played such a prank as this, she should not be able to carry much with her, so after she was gone I immediately broke up housekeeping, sold my furniture by public outcry, and in it everything in particular that was her own, and set a bill upon my door, giving her to understand by it that she had passed the Rubicon, that as she had taken such a step of her own accord, so there was no room left her ever to think of coming back again.

This was what any one may believe I should not have done if I had seen any room for a reformation; but she had given me such testimonies of a mind alienated from her husband in particular, espousing her own insufferable levity, that there was indeed no possibility of our coming afterwards to any terms again.

However I kept a couple of trusty agents so near her that I failed not to have a full account of her conduct, though I never let her know any thing of me but that I was gone over to France; as to her bills which she said she would draw upon me, she was as good as her word in drawing one of 30*l.* which I refused to accept, and never gave her leave to trouble me with another.

It is true, and I must acknowledge it, that all this was a very melancholy scene of life to me, and but that she took care by carrying herself to the last degree provoking, and continuing to insult me, I could never have gone on to the parting with so much resolution, for I really loved her very sincerely, and could have been anything but a beggar and a cuckold with her, but those were intolerable to me, especially as they were put upon me with so much insult and rudeness.

But my wife carried it at last to a point that made all things light and easy to me, for after above a year's separation, and keeping such company as she thought fit, she was pleased to be with child again, in which she had however so much honesty as not to pretend that she had had anything to do with me; what a wretched life she led after this, and how she brought herself to the utmost extremity of misery and distress, I may speak of hereafter.

I had found, soon after our parting, that I had a great deal of reason to put myself into a posture at first, not to be imposed upon by her; for I found very quickly that she had run herself into debt in several places very considerably; and that it was upon a supposition that I was liable to those debts: but I was gone, and it was absolutely necessary I should do so, upon which she found herself obliged, out of her wicked gains, however, whatever she made of them, to discharge most of those debts herself.

As soon as she was delivered of her child, in which my intelligence was so good that I had gotten sufficient proof of it, I sued her in the ecclesiastical court in order to obtain a divorce; and, as she found it impossible to avoid it, so she declined the defence, and I gained a legal decree, or what they call it, of divorce, in the usual time of such process, and now I thought myself a freeman once again, and began to be sick of wedlock with all my heart.

I lived retired, because I knew she had contracted debts which I should be obliged to pay, and I was resolved to be gone out of her reach with what speed I could; but it was necessary that I should stay till the Virginia fleet came in, because I looked for at least 300 hhds. of tobacco from thence, which I knew would heal all my breaches; for, indeed, the extravagance of three years with this lady had sunk me most effectually, even far beyond her own fortune, which was considerable, though not quite 1,500*l.*, as she had called it.

But all the mischiefs I met with on account of this match were not over yet; for, when I had been parted with her about three months, and had refused to accept her bill of 30*l.*, which I mentioned above, though I was removed from my first lodgings too, and thought I had effectually secured myself from being found out, yet there came a gentleman well dressed to my lodgings one day, and was let in before I knew of it, or else I should scarce have admitted him.

He was led into a parlour, and I came down to him in my gown and slippers. When I came into the room, he called me as familiarly by my name as if he had known me twenty years, and pulling out a pocket-book, he shows me a bill upon me, drawn by my wife, which was the same bill for 30*l.* that I had refused before.

"Sir," says I, "this bill has been presented before, and I gave my answer to it then."

"Answer! sir," says he, with a kind of jeering, taunting air; "I do not understand what you mean by an answer; it is not a question, sir, it is a bill to be paid."

"Well, sir," says I, "it is a bill, I know that, and I gave my answer to it before."

"Sir, sir," says he, very saucily, "your answer! there is no answer to a bill, it must be paid; bills are to be paid, not to be answered; they say you are a merchant, sir, merchants always pay their bills."

I began to be angry too a little, but I did not like my man, for I found he began to be quarrelsome; however, I said, "Sir, I perceive you are not much used to presenting bills; sir, a bill is always first presented, and presenting is a question, it is asking if I will accept, or pay the bill, and then whether I say yes or no, it is an answer one way or other; after it is accepted it indeed requires no more answer but payment when it is due: if you please to inform yourself, this is the usage which all merchants or tradesmen of any kind, who have bills drawn upon them, act by."

"Well, sir," says he, "and what then? What is this to the paying me the 30*l*.?"

"Why, sir," says I, "it is this to it, that I told the person that brought it I should not pay it."

"Not pay it!" says he, "but you shall pay it; ay, ay, you will pay it."

"She that draws it has no reason to draw any bills upon me, I am sure," said I, "and I shall pay no bills she draws, I assure you."

Upon this, he turns short upon me; "Sir, she that draws this bill is a person of too much honour to draw any bill without reason, and it is an affront to say so of her, and I shall expect satisfaction of you for that by itself; but first the bill, sir, the bill, you must pay the bill, sir."

I returned as short; "Sir, I affront nobody, I know the person as well as you I hope, and what I have said of her is no affront; she can have no reason to draw bills upon me, for I owe her nothing."

I omit intermingling the oaths he laced his speech with, as too foul for my paper, but he told me he would make me know she had friends to stand by her, that I had abused her, and he would let me know it, and do her justice; but first, I must pay his bill.

I answered, in short, I would not pay the bill, nor any bills she should draw.

With that he steps to the door and shuts it, and swore by G—d he would make me pay the bill before we parted, and laid his hand upon his sword, but did not draw it out.

I confess I was frightened to the last degree, for I had no sword, and if I had, I must own that, though I had learned a great many good things in France to make me look like a gentleman, I had forgot the main article of learning how to use a sword, a thing so universally practised there; and, to say more, I had been perfectly unacquainted with quarrels of this nature; so that I was perfectly surprised when he shut the door, and knew not what to say or do.

However, as it happened, the people of the house hearing us pretty loud, came near the door, and made a noise in the entry, to let me know they were at hand, and one of the servants going to open the door, and finding it locked, called out to me, "Sir, for God's sake open the door! what is the matter? shall we fetch a constable?" I made no answer, but it gave me courage, so I sat down composed in one of the chairs, and said to him, "Sir, this is not the way to make me pay the bill, you had much better be easy, and take your satisfaction another way."

He understood me of fighting, which, upon my word, was not in my thoughts, but I meant that he had better take his course at law.

"With all my heart," says he, "they say you are a gentleman, and they call you colonel; now, if you are a gentleman I accept your challenge, sir, and if you will walk out with me I will take it for full payment of the bill, and will decide it as gentlemen ought to do."

"I challenge you, sir!" said I, "not I; I made no challenge, I said this is not the way to make me pay a bill that I have not accepted, that is, that you had better seek your satisfaction at law."

"Law!" says he, "law! gentleman's law is my law; in short, sir, you shall pay me or fight me;" and then, as if he had mistaken, he turns short upon me, "nay," says he, "you shall both fight me and pay me, for I will maintain her honour;" and in saying this he bestowed six or seven dammes and oaths, by way of parenthesis.

This interval delivered me effectually, for just at the word fights me, for I will maintain her honour, the maid had brought in a constable, with three or four neighbours to assist him.

He heard them come in, and began to be a little in a rage, and asked me if I intended to mob him instead of paying, and laying his hand on his sword, told me, if any man offered to break in upon him, he would run me through the first moment, that he might have the fewer to deal with afterwards.

I told him he knew I had called for no help, believing he could not be in earnest in what he had said, and that if anybody attempted to come in upon us, it was to prevent the mischief he threatened, and which he might see I had no weapons to resist.

Upon this the constable called, and charged us both in the king's name to open the door; I was sitting in a chair, and offered to rise; he made a motion as if he would draw, upon which I sat down again, and the door not being opened, the constable set his foot against it and came in.

"Well, sir," says my gentleman, "and what now? What is your business here?"—"Nay, sir," says the constable, "you see my business; I am a peace officer, all I have to do is to keep the peace, and I find the people of the house frightened for fear of mischief between you, and they have fetched me to prevent it."—"What mischief have they supposed you should find?" says he.—"I suppose," says the constable, "they were afraid you should fight."—"That is, because they did not know this fellow here, he never fights; they call him colonel," says he; "I suppose he might be born a colonel, for I dare say he was born a coward; he never fights, he dares not see a man; if he would have fought he would have walked out with me, but he scorns to be brave; they would never have talked to you of fighting if they had known him: I tell you, Mr Constable, he is a coward, and a coward is a rascal;" and with that he came to me and stroked his finger down my nose pretty hard, and laughed and mocked most horridly, as if I was a coward; now for ought I knew it might be true, but I was now what they call a coward made desperate, which is one of the worst of men in the world to encounter with, for being in a fury I threw my head in his face, and closing with him, threw him fairly on his back by main strength, and had not the constable stepped in and taken me off, I had certainly stamped him to death with my feet, for my blood was now all in a flame, and the people of the house were frightened now as much the other way last I should kill him, though I had no weapon at all in my hand.

The constable, too, reproved me in his turn ; but I said to him, "Mr Constable, do not you think I am sufficiently provoked? Can any man bear such things as these? I desire to know who this man is, and who sent him hither?"

"I am," says he, "a gentleman, and come with a bill to him for money, and he refuses to pay it."—"Well," says the constable very prudently, "that is none of my business, I am no justice of peace to hear the cause, be that among yourselves, but keep your hands off one another, and that is as much as I desire ; and therefore, sir," says the constable to him, "if I may advise you, seeing he will not pay the bill, and that must be decided between you as the law directs, I would have you leave it for the present, and go quietly away."

He made many impertinent harangues about the bill, and insisted that it was drawn by my own wife ; I said angrily, then it was drawn by a w—— ; he bullied me upon that, told me I durst not tell him so anywhere else ; so I answered, I would very soon publish her for a w—— to all the world, and cry her down, and thus we scolded for near half an hour, for I took courage when the constable was there, for I knew that he would keep us from fighting, which indeed I had no mind to, and so at length I got rid of him.

I was heartily vexed at this rencontre, and the more because I had been found out in my lodging, which I thought I had effectually concealed ; however I resolved to remove the next day, and in the meantime I kept within doors all that day till the evening, and then I went out in order not to return thither any more.

Being come out into Gracechurch street, I observed a man follow me, with one of his legs tied up in a string, and hopping along with the other, and two crutches ; he begged for a farthing, but I inclining not to give him anything, the fellow followed me still till I came to a court, when I answered hastily to him, "I have nothing for you. Pray do not be so troublesome ;" with which words he knocked me down with his crutches.

Being stunned with the blow, I knew nothing what was done to me afterwards ; but coming to myself again, I found I was wounded very frightfully in several places, and that among the rest my nose was slit upwards, one of my ears almost cut off, and a great cut with a sword on the side of the forehead, also a stab in the body, though not dangerous.

Who had been near me, or struck me, besides the cripple that struck me with his crutch I knew not, nor do I know to this hour, but I was terribly wounded, and lay bleeding on the ground some time, till coming to myself I got strength to cry out for help, and people coming about me, I got some hands to carry me to my lodging, where I lay by it more than two months before I was well enough to go out of doors, and when I did go out I had reason to believe that I was waited for by some rogues, who watched an opportunity to repeat the injury I had met with before.

This made me very uneasy, and I resolved to get myself out of danger if possible, and to go over to France, or home, as I called it, to Virginia ; so to be out of the way of villains and assassinations, for every time I stirred out here, I thought I went in danger of my life, and therefore, as before, I went out at night, thinking to be concealed, so now I never went out but in open day that I might be safe, and never without one or two servants to be my life-guard.

But I must do my wife a piece of justice here too, and that was, that hearing of what had befallen me, she wrote me a letter, in which she treated me more decently than she had been wont to do ; she said she was very sorry to hear how I had been used, and the rather because she understood it was on presenting her bill to me ; she said she hoped I could not in my worst dispositions think so hardly of her as to believe it was done by her knowledge or consent, much less by her order or direction ; that she abhorred such things, and protested, if she had the least knowledge or so much as a guess at the villains concerned, she would discover them to me ; she let me know the person's name to whom she gave the bill, and where he lived, and left it to me to oblige him to discover the person who had brought it, and used me so ill, and wished I might find him and bring him to justice, and have him punished with the utmost severity of the law.

I took this so kindly of my wife, that I think in my conscience had she come after it herself, to see how I did, I had certainly taken her again ; but she satisfied herself with the civility of another letter, and desiring me to let her know as often as I could how I was, adding that it would be infinitely to her satisfaction to hear I was recovered of the hurt I had received, and that he was hanged at Tyburn who had done it.

She used some expressions, signifying, as I understood them, her affliction at our parting, and her continued respect for me, but did not make any motion towards returning ; then she used some arguments to move me to pay her bills, intimating that she had brought me a large fortune, and now had nothing to subsist on, which was very severe.

I wrote her an answer to this letter, though I had not to the other, letting her know how I had been used ; that I was satisfied upon her letter that she had no hand in it, that it was not in her nature to treat me so, who had never injured her, used any violence with her, or been the cause or desire of our parting ; that, as to her bill, she could not but know how much her expensive way of living had straitened and reduced me, and would, if continued, have ruined me ; that she had, in less than three years, spent more than as much as she brought to me, and would not abate her expensive way, though calmly entreated by me with protestations that I could not support so great an expense, but chose rather to break up her family and go from me, than to restrain herself to reasonable limits, though I used no violence with her, but entreaties and earnest persuasions, backed with good reason ; letting her know how my estate was, and convincing her that it must reduce us to poverty at last ; that, however, if she would recal her bill, I would send her 30*l.*, which was the sum mentioned in her bill, and, according to my ability, would not let her want, if she pleased to live within due bounds ; but then I let her know also that I had a very bad account of her conduct, and that she kept company with a scandalous fellow, whom I named to her ; that I was loth to believe such things of her, but that, to put an entire end to the report, and restore her reputation, I let her know that still, after all I had heard, if she would resolve to live without restraints, within the reasonable bounds of my capacity, and treat me with the same kindness, affection, and tenderness as I always had treated her, and ever would, I was willing to receive her again, and would forget all that was past; but that, if she declined me now, it would be for ever; for if she did not accept my offer, I was resolved to stay here no longer, where I had been so ill-treated on many occasions, but was preparing to go into my own country, where I would spend my days in quiet, and in a retreat from the world.

She did not give such an answer to this as I expected; for though she thanked me for the 30*l.*, yet she insisted upon her justification in all other points; and, though she did not refuse to return to me, yet she did not say she accepted it, and, in short, said little or nothing to it, only a kind of claim to a reparation of her injured reputation and the like.

This gave me some surprise at first, for I thought, indeed, any woman in her circumstances would have been very willing to have put an end to all her miseries, and to the reproach which was upon her, by a reconciliation; especially, considering she subsisted at that time but very meanly. But there was a particular reason which prevented her return, and which she could not plead to in her letter, yet was a good reason against accepting an offer which she would otherwise have been glad of, and this was, that, as I have mentioned above, she had fallen into bad company, and had prostituted her virtue to some of her flatterers, and, in short, was with child; so that she durst not venture to accept my offer.

However, as I observed above, she did not absolutely refuse it, intending (as I understood afterwards) to keep the treaty of it on foot till she could drop her burthen, as she called it before; and, having been delivered privately, have accepted my proposal afterwards; and, indeed, this was the most prudent step she could take, or, as we may say, the only step she had left to take. But I was too many for her here too, my intelligence about her was too good for her to conceal such an affair from me, unless she had gone away before she was visibly big, and unless she had gone further off too than she did, for I had an account to a tittle of the time when, and place where, and the creature of which she was delivered, and then my offers of taking her again were at an end, though she wrote me several penitent letters, acknowledging her crime, and begging me to forgive her; but my spirit was above all that now, nor could I ever bear the thoughts of her after that, but pursued a divorce, and accordingly obtained it, as I have mentioned already.

Things being at this pass, I resolved, as I have observed above, to go over to France, after I had received my effects from Virginia, and accordingly I came to Dunkirk in the year 1700, and here I fell into company with some Irish officers of the regiment of Dillon, who, by little and little, entered me into the army, and, by the help of Lieutenant General Connor, an Irishman, and some money, I obtained a company in his regiment and so went into the army directly.

I was exceedingly pleased with my new circumstances, and now I used to say to myself, I was come to what I was born to, and that I had never till now lived the life of a gentleman.

Our regiment, after I had been some time in it, was commanded into Italy, and one of the most considerable actions that I was in, was the famous attack upon Cremona, in the Milanese, where the Germans being privately, and by treachery, let into the town in the night through a kind of common sewer, surprised the town, and got possession of the greatest part of it, surprising the Mareschal Duke de Villeroy, and taking him prisoner as he came out of his quarters, and beating the few French troops which were left in the citadel; but were in the middle of their victory so boldly and resolutely attacked by two Irish regiments, who were quartered in the street leading to the river Po, and who kept possession of the water-gate, or Po gate, of the town, by which the German reinforcements should have come in, that, after a most desperate fight, the Germans had their victory wrung out of their hands, and not being able to break through us to let in their friends, were obliged at length to quit the town again, to the eternal honour of those Irish regiments, and indeed of their whole nation, and for which we had a very handsome compliment from the King of France.

I now had the satisfaction of knowing, and that for the first time too, that I was not that cowardly low-spirited wretch that I was when the fellow bullied me in my lodging about the bill of 30*l.*; had he attacked me now, though in the very same condition, I should, naked and unarmed as I was, have flown in the face of him, and trampled him under my feet; but men never know themselves till they are tried, and courage is acquired by time and experience of things.

Philip de Comines tells us, that, after the battle of Montlheri, the Count de Charolois, who till then had an utter aversion to war, and abhorred it, and every thing that belonged to it, was so changed by the glory he obtained in that action, and by the flattery of those about him, that afterwards the army was his mistress, and the fatigues of the war his chief delight; it is too great an example for me to bring in my own case, but so it was, that they flattered me so with my bravery, as they called it, on the occasion of this action, that I fancied myself brave, whether I was so or not, and the pride of it made me bold and daring to the last degree on all occasions; but what added to it was, that somebody gave a particular account to the court of my being instrumental to the saving the city, and the whole Cremonese, by my extraordinary defence of the Po gate, and by my managing that defence after the lieutenant-colonel, who commanded the party where I was posted, was killed; upon which the king sent me a public testimony of his accepting my service, and sent me a brevet to be a lieutenant-colonel, and the next courier brought me actually a commission for lieutenant-colonel in the regiment of —.

I was in several skirmishes and petty encounters before this, by which I gained the reputation of a good officer, but I happened to be in some particular posts too, by which I got somewhat that I liked much better, and that was a good deal of money.

Our regiment was sent from France to Italy by sea; we embarked at Toulon, and landed at Savona, in the territory of Genoa, and marched from thence to the duchy of Milan. At the first town we were sent to take possession of, which was Alexandria, the citizens rose upon our men in a most furious manner, and drove the whole garrison, which consisted of eight hundred men, that is, French, and soldiers in the French service, quite out of the town.

I was quartered in a burgher's house, just by one of the ports, with eight of my men and a servant, where, calling a short council with my men, we were resolved to maintain the house we were in, whatever it cost, till we received orders to quit it from the commanding officer: upon this, when I saw our men could not stand their ground in the street, being pressed hard by the citizens, I turned out of doors all the family, and kept the house as a castle, which I was governor in; and as the house joined to the city gate, I resolved to maintain it, so as to be the last that should quit the place, my own retreat being secured by being so near the port.

Having thus emptied the house of the inhabitants, we made no scruple of filling our pockets with whatever we could find there; in a word, we left nothing we could carry away, among which it came to my lot to dip into the burgher's cabinet, whose house it was where we were, and there I took about the quantity of two hundred pistoles in money and plate, and other things of value. There was great complaint made to Prince Vaudemont, who was then governor of the Milanese, of this violence; but as the repulse the citizens gave us was contrary to his order, and to the general design of the prince, who was then wholly in the interest of king Philip, the citizens could obtain nothing, and I found, that if we had plundered the whole city, it would have been the same thing; for the governor had orders to take our regiment in, and it was an act of open rebellion to resist us as they did: however, we had orders not to fire upon the burghers, unless constrained to it by evident necessity, and we rather chose to quit the place as we did, than dispute it with a desperate body of fellows, who wanted no advantage of us except only that of having possession of two bastions, and one port of our retreat; first, they were treble our number, for the burghers, being joined by seven companies of the regular troops, made up above one thousand six hundred men, besides rabble, which were many more, whereas we were about eight hundred in all; they also had the citadel, and several pieces of cannon, so that we could have made nothing of it, if we had attacked them; but they submitted three or four days after to other forces, the soldiers within turning upon them, and taking the citadel from them.

After this, we lay still in quarters eight months, for the prince having secured the whole Milanese for king Philip, and no enemy appearing for some time, had nothing to do but to receive the auxiliary troops of France; and as they came, extend himself every way as he could, in order to keep the imperialists (who were preparing to fall into Italy with a great army) as much at a distance as possible, which he did, by taking possession of the city of Mantua, and of most of the towns on that side, as far as the lake De la Garda and the river Adige.

We lay in Mantua some time, but were afterwards drawn out, by order of the Count de Tesse, (afterwards Marshal of France,) to form the French army, till the arrival of the Duke de Vendôme, who was to command in chief. Here we had a severe campaign, anno 1701, having Prince Eugene of Savoy, and an army of forty thousand Germans, all old soldiers, to deal with; and though the French army was more numerous than the enemy by twenty-five thousand men, yet, being on the defensive, and having so many posts to cover, not knowing exactly where the Prince of Savoy, who commanded the imperial army, would attack us, it obliged the French to keep their troops so divided, and so remote from one another, that the Germans pushed on their design with great success, as the histories of those times more fully relate.

I was at the action at Carpi, July 1701, where we were worsted by the Germans indeed, were forced to quit our encampment, and give up to the prince the whole river of Adige, and where our regiment sustained some loss; but the enemies got little by us, and Monsieur Catinat, who commanded at that time, drew up in order of battle the next day in sight of the German army, and gave them a defiance, but they would not stir, though we offered them battle two days together; for, having gained the passage over the Adige, by our quitting Rivoli, which was then useless to us, their business was done.

Finding they declined a decisive action, our generals pressed them in their quarters, and made them fight for every inch of ground they gained, and at length, in the September following, we attacked them in their entrenched posts of Chiar. Here we broke into the very heart of their camp, where we made a very terrible slaughter; but I know not by what mistake among our generals, or defect in the execution of their orders, the brigade of Normandy and our Irish brigade, who had so bravely entered the German entrenchments, were not supported as we should have been, so that we were obliged to sustain the shock of the whole German army, and at last to quit the advantage we had gained, and that not without loss; but, being timely reinforced by a great body of horse, the enemy were in their turn beaten off too, and driven back into their very camp: the Germans boasted of having a great victory here, and indeed in repulsing us after we had gained their camp: they had the advantage, but had Monsieur de Tesse succoured us in time, as old Catinat said he ought to have done, with twelve thousand foot which he had with him, that day's action had put an end to the war, and Prince Eugene must have been glad to have gone back to Germany in more haste than he came, if, perhaps, we had not cut him short by the way.

But the fate of things went another way, and the Germans continued all that campaign to push forward and advance one post after another, till they beat us quite out of the Milanese.

The latter part of this campaign we made only a party war, the French, according to their volatile temper, being every day abroad, either foraging or surprising the enemy's foragers, plundering or circumventing the plunders of the other side; but they very often came short home; for the Germans had the better of them on several occasions, and indeed so many lost their lives upon these petty encounters, that I think, including those who died of distempers gotten by hard service, and bad quarters, lying in the field even till the middle of December, among rivers and bogs, in a country so full of canals and rivers, as that part of Italy is known to be, I say, we lost more men, and so did the enemy also, than would have been lost in a general decisive battle.

The Duke of Savoy, to give him his due, pressed earnestly to put it to a day, and come to a battle with Prince Eugene; but the Duke de Villeroy, Monsieur Catinat, and the Count de Tesse, were all against it, and the principal reason was, that they knew the weakness of the troops who had suffered so much on so many occasions, that they were in no condition to give battle to the Germans; so after, as I say, about three months harassing one another with parties, we went into winter quarters.

Before we marched out of the field, our regiment, with a detachment of dragoons of 600, and about 250 horse, went out with a design to intercept Prince Commercy, a general of note under Prince Eugene of Savoy; the detachment was intended to be only horse and dragoons; but because it was the imperialists' good luck to beat many of our parties, and, as was given out, many more than we beat of theirs; and because it was believed that the prince, who was an officer of good note among them, would not go abroad, but in very little company, the Irish regiment of foot was ordered to be added, that if possible, they might meet with their match.

I was commanded, about two hours before, to pass about 200 foot and 50 dragoons at a small wood, where our general had intelligence that that prince would post some men to secure his passage, which accordingly I did; but Count Tesse, not thinking our party strong enough, had marched himself with 1000 horse and 300 grenadiers to support us, and it was very well he did so, for Prince Commercy having intelligence of the first party, came forward sooner than they expected, and fell upon them, and had entirely routed them had not the count (hearing the firing) advanced with the thousand horse he had, with such expedition as to support his men in the very heat of the action, by which means the Germans were defeated and forced to retire; but the prince made a pretty good retreat, and, after the action, came on to the wood where I was posted, but the surprise of his defeat had prevented his sending a detachment to secure the pass at the wood, as he intended.

The Count de Tesse, understanding that we were sent (as above) to the wood, followed them close at the heels to prevent our being cut off, and, if it were possible that we should give them any check at the wood, to fall in and have another brush with them; it was near night before they came to the wood, by which means they could not discern our number; but when they came up to the wood 50 dragoons advanced to discover the pass and see if all was clear; these we suffered to pass a great way into the defile or lane that went through the wood, and then clapping in between them and the entrance, cut off their retreat so effectually, that when they discovered us and fired, they were instantly surrounded and cut in pieces; the officers who commanded them and eight dragoons only being made prisoners.

This made the prince halt, not knowing what the case was, or how strong we were; and, to get better intelligence, sent 200 horse to surround or skirt the wood and beat up our quarter, and in the interim, the Count de Tesse appeared in his rear: we found the strait he was in by the noise of our own troops at a distance, so we resolved to engage the 200 horse immediately; accordingly, our little troop of horse drew up in the entrance of the lane and offered to skirmish, and our foot lying behind the hedge, which went round the wood, stood ready to act as occasion should offer; the horse being attacked, gave way, and retired into the lane; but the Germans were too old for us there; they contented themselves to push us to the entrance, but would not be drawn into a narrow pass without knowing whether the hedges were lined or no.

But the prince finding the French in his rear, and not being strong enough to engage again, resolved to force his way through, and commanded his dragoons to alight, and enter the wood to clear the hedges on either side the lane, that he might pass with his cavalry; this they did so vigorously, and were so much too strong for us, that though we made good our ground a long time, yet our men were almost half of them cut in pieces. However, we gave time to the French cavalry to come up, and to fall on the prince's troops, and cut them off and take a great many prisoners, and then retreated in our turn, opening a gap for our own horse to break in; 300 of the dragoons were killed and 200 of them taken prisoners.

In the first heat of this action, a German officer of dragoons, well followed, had knocked down three men that stood next me; and offering me quarter, I was obliged to accept it, and gave him my sword, for our men were upon the point of quitting their post, and shifting every one as they could; but the scale was turned, for our cavalry breaking in (as above), the dragoons went to wreck, and the officer who had me prisoner, turning to me, said, "We are lost." I asked him if I could serve him? "Stand still a little," says he; for his men fought most desperately indeed, but about 200 French horse appearing in his rear too, he said to me in French, "I will be your prisoner," and returning me my sword, gave me also his own; a dragoon that stood near him was just going to do the like, when he was shot dead, and the horse coming up, the field was cleared in an instant; but Prince Commercy went off with the rest of his party, and was pursued no farther.

There were 16 or 17 of our men released, as I was, from being taken, but they had not the luck I had, to take the officer that had them in keeping; he had been so generous to me, as not to ask what money I had about me, though I had not much, if he had; but I lost by his civility, for then I could not have the assurance to ask him for his money, though I understood he had near a hundred pistoles about him; but he very handsomely at night, when we came to our tents, made me a present of twenty pistoles, and in return, I obtained leave for him to go to Prince Eugene's camp upon his parole, which he did, and so got himself exchanged.

It was after this campaign that I was quartered at Cremona, when the action happened there, of which I have spoken already, and where our Irish regiment did such service that they saved the town from being really surprised, and indeed beat the Germans out again, after they had been masters of three quarters of the town six hours, and by which they gained a very great reputation.

CHAPTER XIV.

FURTHER OPERATIONS OF THE CAMPAIGN.—I AM QUARTERED AT TRENT, AND MARRY MY LANDLORD'S DAUGHTER.—I SELL MY COMPANY, AND EMBARK IN THE FRENCH FLEET.—PARTICULARS OF THEIR EXPEDITION.—I RETURN UNEXPECTEDLY TO PARIS, AND MAKE A DISAGREEABLE DISCOVERY RELATING TO MY WIFE.—I CHALLENGE AND WOUND HER GALLANT.

BUT I hasten on to my own history, for I am not writing a journal of the wars, in which I had no long share.

The summer after this our two Irish regiments were drawn out into the field, and had many a sore brush with the Germans; for Prince Eugene, a vigilant general, gave us little rest, and gained many advantages by his continual moving up and down, harassing his own men and ours too; and whoever will do the French justice, and knew how they behaved, must acknowledge they never declined the Germans, but fought them upon all occasions, with the utmost resolution and courage; and though it cost the blood of an infinite number of fine gentlemen, as well as private soldiers, yet the Duke de Vendôme, who now commanded, though King Philip was himself in the army this campaign, made the Prince of Savoy a full return in his own kind, and drove him from post to post, till he was just at the point of quitting the whole country of Italy; all that gallant army Prince Eugene brought with him into Italy, which was the best without doubt, for the goodness of the troops, that ever were there, laid their bones in that country, and many thousands more after them; till the affairs of France declining in other places, they were forced in their turn to give way to their fate, as may be seen in the histories of those times, as above; but it is none of my business.

The part that I bore in these affairs was but short and sharp; we took the field about the beginning of July, 1702, and the Duke de Vendôme ordered the whole army to draw the sooner together, in order to relieve the city of Mantua, which was blocked up by the imperialists.

Prince Eugene was a politic, and indeed a fortunate prince, and had the year before pushed our army upon many occasions; but his good fortune began to fail him a little this year, for our army was not only more numerous than his, but the duke was in the field before him; and as the prince had held Mantua closely blocked up all the winter, the duke resolved to relieve the town, cost what it would: as I said, the duke was first in the field, the prince was in no condition to prevent his raising the blockade by force; so he drew off his troops, and leaving several strong bodies of troops to protect Bersello, which the Duke de Vendôme threatened, and Borgo-Forte, where his magazine lay, he drew all the rest of his forces together, to make head against us; by this time the King of Spain was come into the army, and the Duke de Vendôme lay, with about thirty-five thousand men, near Luzara, which he had resolved to attack, to bring Prince Eugene to a battle: the Prince of Vaudemont lay entrenched with twenty thousand more at Rivalto, behind Mantua, to cover the frontiers of Milan, and there were near twelve thousand in Mantua itself; and Monsieur Pracental lay with ten thousand men just under the cannon of one of the forts which guard the causeway which leads into the city of Mantua: so that had all these joined, as they could have done in a few days more, the prince must have been put to his shifts, and would have had enough to do to have maintained himself in Italy; for he was master of no one place in the country that could have held out a formal siege of fifteen days, and he knew all this very well; and therefore, it seems, while the Duke of Vendôme resolved, if possible, to bring him to a battle, and to that end made dispositions to attack Luzara; we were surprised to find, the 15th of June, 1702, the whole imperial army appeared in Bataalia, and in full march to attack us.

As it happened, our army was all marching in columns towards them, as we had done for two days before, and I should have told you, that three days before, the duke having notice that General Visconti, with three imperial regiments of horse, and one of dragoons, was posted at San-Victoria, on the Tessona; he resolved to attack them, and this design was carried so secretly, that while Monsieur Visconti, though our army was three leagues another way, was passing towards the Modenese, he found himself unexpectedly attacked by six thousand horse and dragoons of the French army: he defended himself very bravely for near an hour; when being overpowered, and finding he should be forced into disorder, he sounded a retreat; but the squadrons had not faced about to make their retreat scarce a quarter of an hour, when they found themselves surrounded by a great body of infantry, who had entirely cut off their retreat, except over the bridge of Tessona, which being thronged with their baggage, they could neither get backward nor forward; so they thrust and tumbled over one another, in such a manner, that they could preserve no kind of order; but abundance fell into the river, and were drowned, many were killed, and more taken prisoners; so that, in a word, the whole three regiments of horse, and one of dragoons, were entirely defeated.

This was a great blow to the prince, because they were some of the choicest troops of his whole army: we took about four hundred prisoners, and all their baggage, which was a very considerable booty, and about eight hundred horses; and no doubt these troops were very much wanted in the battle that ensued on the 15th, as I have said: our army being in full march (as above) to attack Luzara, a party of Germans appeared, being about six hundred horse, and in less than an hour more, their whole army in order of battle.

Our army formed immediately, and the duke posted the regiments as they came up, so much to their advantage, that Prince Eugene was obliged to alter his dispositions, and had this particular inconvenience upon his hands, viz. to attack an army superior to his own, in all their most advantageous posts; whereas, had he thought fit to have waited but one day, we should have met him half way; but this was owing to the pride of the German generals, and their being so opinionated of the goodness of their troops; the royal army was posted with the left to the great river Po, on the other side of which the Prince of Vaudemont's army lay, cannonading the entrenchments which the imperialists had made at Borgo-Forte; and hearing that there was like to be a general battle, he detached twelve battalions, and about one thousand horse, to reinforce the royal army; all which, to our great encouragement, had time to join the army, while Prince Eugene was making his new dispositions for the attack; and yet it was the coming of these troops which caused Prince Eugene to resolve to begin the fight, expecting to have come to an action before they could come up, but he was disappointed in the reason of fighting, and yet was obliged to fight too, which was an error in the prince, that it was too late to retrieve.

It was five o'clock in the evening before he could bring up his whole line to engage; and then, after having cannonaded us to no great purpose for half an hour, his right, commanded by the Prince de Commercy, attacked our left wing with great fury: our men received them so well, and seconded one another so punctually, that they were repulsed with a very great slaughter, and the Prince de Commercy being (unhappily for them) killed in the first onset, the regiments, for want of orders, and surprised with the fall of so great a man, were pushed into disorder, and one whole brigade was entirely broke.

But their second line advancing, under General Herbeville, restored things in the first; the battalions rallied, and they came boldly on to charge a second time, and being seconded with new reinforcements from their main body, our men had their turn, and were pushed to a canal, which lay on their left flank, between them and the Po, behind which they rallied, and being supported by new troops, as well horse as foot, they fought on both sides with the utmost obstinacy, and with such courage and skill, that it was not possible to judge who should have had the better, could they have been able to have fought it out.

On the right of the royal army was posted the flower of the French cavalry; namely, the gens-d'armes, the royal carabineers, and the queen's horse-guards, with four hundred horse more, and next them the infantry, among which were our brigade; the horse advanced first to charge, and they carried all before them sword in hand, receiving the fire of two imperial regiments of cuirassiers, without firing a shot, and falling in among them, bore them down by the strength of their horses, putting them into confusion, and left so clear a field for us to follow, that the first line of our infantry stood drawn up upon the ground which the enemy at first possessed.

In this first attack the Marquis de Crequi, who commanded the whole right wing, was killed; a loss which fully balanced the death of the Prince de Commercy, on the side of the Germans; after we had thus pushed the enemy's cavalry (as above), their troops, being rallied by the dexterity of their generals, and supported by three imperial regiments of foot, came on again to the charge with such fury that nothing could withstand them; and here two battalions of our Irish regiments were put into disorder, and abundance of our men killed; and here also I had the misfortune to receive a musquet-shot, which broke my left arm; and that was not all, for I was knocked down by a giant-like German soldier, who, when he thought he had killed me, set his foot upon me, but was immediately shot dead by one of my men, and fell just upon me, which, my arm being broken, was a very great mischief to me; for the very weight of the fellow, who was almost as big as a horse, was such that I was not able to stir.

Our men were beaten back after this from the place where they stood, and so I was left in possession of the enemy, but was not their prisoner (that is to say, was not found) till the next morning, when a party being sent, as usual, with surgeons to look after the wounded men, among the dead found me, almost smothered with the dead Germans, and others that lay near me; however, to do them justice, they used me with humanity, and the surgeons set my arm very skilfully and well; and after four or five days I had liberty to go to Parma upon my parole.

Both the armies continued fighting, especially on our left, till it was so dark that it was impossible to know who they fired at, or for the generals to see what they did; so they abated firing gradually, and, as it may be truly said, the night parted them.

Both sides claimed the victory, and both concealed their losses as much as was possible; but it is certain, that never battle was fought with greater bravery and obstinacy than this was; and had there been day-light to have fought it out, doubtless there would have been many thousand more men killed on both sides.

All the Germans had to entitle them to the victory was, that they made our left retire, as I have said, to the canal, and to the high banks or mounds on the edge of the Po; but they had so much advantage in the retreat—they fired from thence among the thickest of the enemy, and could never be forced from their posts.

The best testimony the royal army had of the victory, and which was certainly the better of the two, was, that two days after the fight they attacked Guastalla, as it were in view of the German army, and forced the garrison to surrender, and to swear not to serve again for six months, which, they being one thousand five hundred men, was a great loss to the Germans, and yet Prince Eugene did not offer to relieve it; and after that we took several other posts which the imperialists had possession of, but were obliged to quit them upon the approach of the French army, not being in a condition to fight another battle that year.

My campaign was now at an end, and though I came off lame, I came off much better than abundance of gentlemen; for in that bloody battle we had above four hundred officers killed or wounded, whereof three were general officers.

The campaign held on till December, and the Duke de Vendôme took Borgo-Forte, and several other places, from the Germans, who, in short, lost ground every day in Italy; I was a prisoner a great while, and there being no cartel settled, Prince Eugene ordered the French prisoners to be sent into Hungary, which was a cruelty that could not be reasonably exercised on them; however, a great many, by that banishment, found means to make their escape to the Turks, by whom they were kindly received, and the French ambassador at Constantinople took care of them, and shipped them back again into Italy at the king's charge.

But the Duke de Vendôme now took so many German prisoners, that Prince Eugene was tired of sending his prisoners to Hungary, and was obliged to be at the charge of bringing some of them back again whom he had sent thither, and come to agree to a general exchange of prisoners.

I was, as I have said, allowed for a time to go to Parma, upon my parole, where I continued, for the recovery of my wound and broken arm, forty days, and was then obliged to render myself to the commanding officer at Ferrara, where Prince Eugene coming soon after, I was, with several other prisoners of war, sent away into the Milanese, to be kept for an exchange of prisoners.

It was in the city of Trent that I continued about eight months; the man in whose house I quartered was exceedingly civil to me, and took a great deal of care of me, and I lived very easy. Here I contracted a kind of familiarity, perfectly undesigned by me, with the daughter of the burgher, at whose house I had lodged, and I know not by what fatality that was upon me, I was prevailed with afterward to marry her: this was a piece of honesty on my side which I must acknowledge I never intended to be guilty of; but the girl was too cunning for me; for she found means to get some wine into my head more than I used to drink, and though I was not so disordered with it but that I knew very well what I did, yet in an unusual height of good humour I consented to be married. This impolitic piece of honesty put me to many inconveniences, for I knew not what to do with this new clog which I had loaded myself with; I could neither stay with her, nor take her with me, so that I was exceedingly perplexed.

The time came soon after that I was released by the cartel, and so was obliged to go to the regiment, which then was in quarters in the Milanese, and from thence I got leave to go to Paris, upon my promise to raise some recruits in England for the Irish regiments, by the help of my correspondents there. Having thus leave to go to Paris, I took a passport from the enemy's army, to go to Trent, and making a long circuit, I went back thither, and very honestly packed up my baggage, wife and all, and brought her away through Tyrol, into Bavaria, and so through Suabia, and the Black Forest, into Alsace, from thence I came into Lorraine, and so to Paris.

I had now a secret design to quit the war, for I really had had enough of fighting; but it was counted so dishonourable a thing to quit while the army was in the field, that I could not dispense with it; but an intervening accident made that part easy to me: the war was now renewed between France, and England, and Holland, just as it was before; and the French king meditating nothing more than how to give the English a diversion, fitted out a strong squadron of men of war and frigates, at Dunkirk, on board of which he embarked a body of troops, of about six thousand five hundred men, besides volunteers; and the new king, as we called him, though more generally he was called the Chevalier de St George, was shipped along with them, and all for Scotland.

I pretended a great deal of zeal for this service, and that if I might be permitted to sell my company in the Irish regiment I was in, and have the chevalier's brevet for a colonel, in case of raising troops for him in Great Britain, after his arrival, I would embark volunteer and serve at my own expense: the latter gave me a great advantage with the chevalier; for now I was esteemed as a man of consideration, and one that must have a considerable interest in my own country; so I obtained leave to sell my company, and having had a good round sum of money remitted me from London, by the way of Holland, I prepared a very handsome equipage, and away I went to Dunkirk to embark.

I was very well received by the chevalier; and, as he had an account that I was an officer in the Irish brigade, and had served in Italy, and consequently was an old soldier, all this added to the character which I had before, and made me have a great deal of honour paid me, though at the same time I had no particular attachment to his person or to his cause; nor indeed did I much consider the cause of one side or other; if I had, I should hardly have risked, not my life only, but effects too, which were all, as I might say, from that moment, forfeited to the English government, and were too evidently in their power to confiscate at their pleasure.

However, having just received a remittance from London, of 300*l.* sterling, and sold my company in the Irish regiment for very near as much, I was not only insensibly drawn in, but was perfectly volunteer in that dull cause, and away I went with them at all hazards; it belongs very little to my history to give an account of that fruitless expedition, only to tell you, that, being so closely and effectually chased by the English fleet, which was superior in force to the French, I may say, that in escaping them I escaped being hanged.

It was the good fortune of the French that they overshot the port they aimed at, and intending for the frith of Forth, or, as it is called, the frith of Edinburgh, the first land they made was as far north as a place called Montrose, where it was not their business to land, and so they were obliged to come back to the frith, and were gotten to the entrance of it, and came to an anchor for the tide; but this delay or hinderance gave time to the English, under Sir George Byng, to come to the frith, and they came to an anchor just as we did, only waiting to go up the frith with the flood.

Had we not overshot the port, as above, all our squadron had been destroyed in two days, and all we could have done had been to have gotten into the pier or haven at Leith, with the smaller frigates, and have landed the troops and ammunition; but we must have set fire to the men of war, for the English squadron was not above 24 hours behind us, or thereabouts.

Upon this surprise the French admiral set sail from the north point of the frith where we lay, and crowding away to the north, got the start of the English fleet, and made their escape with the loss of one ship only, which being behind the rest, could not get away. When we were satisfied the English left chasing us, which was not till the third night, when we altered our course, and lost sight of them, we stood over to the coast of Norway, and keeping that shore on board all the way to the mouth of the Baltic, we came to an anchor again, and sent two scouts abroad to learn news, to see if the sea was clear, and being satisfied that the enemy did not chase us, we kept on with an easier sail, and came all back again to Dunkirk, and glad I was to set my foot on shore again; for all the while we were thus flying for our lives, I was under the greatest terror imaginable, and nothing but halters and gibbets run in my head, concluding that if I had been taken I should certainly have been hanged.

But the care was now over, I took my leave of the chevalier and of the army, and made haste to Paris: I came so unexpectedly to Paris, and to my own lodgings, that it was my misfortune to make a discovery relating to my wife which was not at all to my satisfaction; for I found her ladyship had kept some company that I had reason to believe were not such as an honest woman ought to have conversed with, and as I knew her temper, by what I had found of her myself, I grew very jealous and uneasy about her; I must own it touched me very nearly, for I began to have an extraordinary value for her, and her behaviour was very taking, especially after I had brought her into France; but having a vein of levity, it was impossible to prevent her running into such things in a town so full of what they call gallantry as Paris.

It vexed me also to think that it should be my fate to be a cuckold both abroad and at home, and sometimes I would be in such a rage about it that I had no government of myself when I thought of it; whole days, and, I may say, sometimes whole nights, I spent musing and considering what I should do to her, and especially what I should do to the villain, whoever he was, that had thus abused and supplanted me: here indeed I committed murder more than once, or indeed than a hundred times, in my imagination; and as the devil is certainly an apparent prompter to wickedness, if he is not the first mover of it in our minds, he seized me night and day, with proposals to kill my wife.

This horrid project he carried up so high, by raising fierce thoughts, and fomenting the blood upon my contemplation of the word cuckold, that, in short, I left debating whether I should murder her or no, as a thing out of the question and determined; and my thoughts were then taken up only with the management how I should kill her, and how to make my escape after I had done it.

All this while I had no sufficient evidence of her guilt, neither had I so much as charged her with it, or let her know I suspected her, otherwise than as she might perceive it in my conduct and in the change of my behaviour to her, which was such, that she could not but perceive that something troubled me, yet she took no notice of it to me, but received me very well, and showed herself to be glad of my return; nor did I find she had been extravagant in her expenses while I was abroad; but jealousy, as the wise man says, is the wrath of a man; her being so good a housewife of what money I had left her gave my distempered fancy an opinion that she had been maintained by other people, and so had had no occasion to spend.

I must confess she had a difficult point here upon her, though she had been really honest; for as my head was prepossessed of her dishonesty, if she had been lavish, I should have said she had spent it upon her gentlemen; and as she had been frugal, I said, she had been maintained by them: thus, I say, my head was distempered; I believed myself abused, and nothing could put it out of my thoughts night or day.

All this while, it was not visibly broken out between us; but I was so fully possessed with the belief of it, that I seemed to want no evidence, and I looked with an evil eye upon everybody that came near her, or that she conversed with: there was an officer of the garde du corps, that lodged in the same house with us, a very honest gentleman and a man of quality; I happened to be in a little drawing-room adjoining to a parlour where my wife sat at that time, and this gentleman came into the parlour, which, as he was one of the family, he might have done without offence, but he not knowing that I was in the drawing-room, sat down and talked with my wife; I heard every word they said, for the door between us was open, nor could I say that there passed anything between them but cursory discourse; they talked of casual things, of a young lady, a burgher's daughter of nineteen, that had been married the week before to an advocate in the parliament of Paris, vastly rich, and about thirty-six: and of another, a widow lady of fortune in Paris, that had married her deceased husband's valet de chambre, and of such casual matters, that I could find no fault with her now at all.

But it filled my head with jealous thoughts, and fired my temper; now I fancied he used too much freedom with her, then that she used too much freedom to him, and once or twice I was upon the point of breaking in upon them, and affronting them both, but I restrained myself; at length he talked something merrily of the lady throwing away her maidenhead, as I understood it, upon an old man; but still it was nothing indecent; but I, who was all on fire already, could bear it no longer, but started up, and came into the room, and catching at my wife's words, "Say you so, madam," said I; "was he too old for her?" and giving the officer a look that I fancy was something akin to the face on the sign called the Bull and Mouth, within Aldersgate, I went out into the street.

The marquis, so he was styled, a man of honour and of spirit too, took it as I meant it, and followed me in a moment, and hemm'd after me in the street; upon which I stopped, and he came up to me. "Sir," said he, "our circumstances are very unhappy in France, that we cannot do ourselves justice here without the most severe treatment in the world; but, come on it what will, you must explain yourself to me on the subject of your behaviour just now."

I was a little cooled as to the point of my conduct to him in the very few moments that had passed, and was very sensible that I was wrong to him, and I said, therefore, to him, very frankly, "Sir, you are a gentleman, whom I know very well, and I have a very great respect for you; but I had been disturbed a little about the conduct of my wife, and, were it your own case, what would you have done less?"

"I am sorry for any dislike between you and your wife," says he; "but what is that to me? Can you charge me with any indecency to her, except my talking so and so (at which he repeated the words), and, as I knew you were in the next room, and heard every word, and that all the doors were open, I thought no man could have taken amiss so innocent an expression."

"I could no otherwise take it amiss," said I, "than as I thought it implied a farther familiarity, and that you cannot expect should be borne by any man of honour; however, sir," said I, "I spoke only to my wife; I said nothing to you, but gave you my hat as I passed you."

"Yes," said he, "and a look as full of rage as the devil; are there no words in such looks?"

"I can say nothing to that," said I, "for I cannot see my own countenance; but my rage, as you call it, was at my wife, not at you."

"But hark you, sir," said he (growing warm as I grew calm), "your anger at your wife was for her discourse with me, and I think that concerns me too, and I ought to resent it."

"I think not, sir," said I; "nor, had I found you in bed with my wife, would I have quarrelled with you; for if my wife will let you lie with her, it is she is the offender, what have I to do with you? You could not lie with her if she was not willing, and if she is willing to be a w—e, I ought to punish her; but I should have no quarrel with you; I will lie with your wife if I can, and then I am even with you."

I spoke this all in good-humour, and in order to pacify him, but it would not do; but he would have me give him satisfaction, as he called it. I told him I was a stranger in the country, and perhaps should find little mercy in their course of justice; that it was not my business to fight any man in his vindicating his keeping company with my wife, for that the injury was mine, in having a bad woman to deal with; that there was no reason in the thing, that after any man should have found the way into my bed, I, who am injured, should go and stake my life upon an equal hazard against the man who has abused me.

Nothing would prevail with this person to be quiet for all this; but I had affronted him, and no satisfaction could be made him but that at the point of the sword; so we agreed to go away together to Lisle in Flanders. I was now soldier enough not to be afraid to look a man in the face, and as the rage at my wife inspired me with courage, so he let fall a word that fired and provoked me beyond all patience; for, speaking of the distrust I had of my wife, he said, unless I had good information I ought not to suspect my wife: I told him, if I had good information, I should be past suspicion; he replied, if he was the happy man that had so much of her favour, he would take care then to put me past the suspicion; I gave him as rough an answer as he could desire, and he returned in French, nous verrons à Lisle, that is to say, we will talk further of it at Lisle.

I told him I did not see the benefit either to him or me of going so far as Lisle to decide this quarrel, since now I perceived he was the man I wanted, that we might decide this quarrel, au champ, upon the spot, and whoever had the fortune to fell the other, might make his escape to Lisle, as well afterwards as before.

Thus we walked on, talking very ill-naturedly on both sides, and yet very mannerly, till we came clear of the suburbs of Paris, and on the way to Charenton; when, seeing the way clear, I told him, under those trees was a very fit place for us, pointing to a row of trees adjoining to Monsieur —'s garden wall; so we went thither, and fell to work immediately; after some fencing, he made a home thrust at me, and run me, into my arm, a long slanting wound, but at the same time received my point into his body, and soon after fell; he spoke some words before he dropped; first, he told me I had killed him; then he said, he had indeed wronged me, and as he knew it, he ought not to have fought me; he desired I would make my escape immediately, which I did into the city, but no farther, nobody as I thought, having seen us together. In the afternoon, about six hours after the action, messengers brought news, one on the heels of another, that the marquis was mortally wounded, and carried into a house at Charenton; that account, saying he was not dead, surprised me a little, not doubting but that, concluding I had made my escape, he would own who it was; however, I discovered nothing of my concern, but going up into my chamber, I took out of a cabinet there what money I had, which indeed was so much as I thought would be sufficient for my expenses; but having an accepted bill for 2,000 livres, I walked sedately to a merchant who knew me, and got 50 pistoles of him upon my bill, letting him know my business called me to England and I would take the rest of him when he had received it.

CHAPTER XV.

DISTRESS OF MY WIFE—I CAST HER OFF, AND TAKE HORSE FOR LORRAINE—I ARRIVE SAFELY IN LONDON—NEWS OF MY WIFE, TO WHOM I SEND A SMALL SUM OF MONEY—HER GALLANT RECOVERS, AND CLEARS MY HANDS OF HER—I MEET WITH A YOUNG WIDOW IN A STAGE COACH, WITH WHOM I FALL IN FANCY, AND MARRY WITH EVERY PROSPECT OF HAPPINESS—SHE TAKES TO DRINKING AND DIES.

HAVING furnished myself thus, I provided me a horse for my servant, for I had a very good one of my own, and once more ventured home to my lodging, where I heard again that the marquis was not dead. My wife all this while covered her concern for the marquis so well, that she gave me no room to make any remark upon her; but she saw evidently the marks of rage and deep resentment in my behaviour after some little stay, and perceiving me making preparations for a journey, she said to me, "Are you going out of town?"—"Yes, madam," says I, "that you may have room to mourn for your friend the marquis;" at which she started, and showed she was indeed in a most terrible fright, and making a thousand crosses about herself, with a great many callings upon the Blessed Virgin, and her country saints, she burst out at last, "Is it possible! Are you the man that killed the marquis? Then you are undone, and I too."

"You may, madam, be a loser by the marquis being killed, but I'll take care to be as little a loser by you as I can; it is enough the marquis has honestly confessed your guilt, and I have done with you;" she would have thrown herself into my arms, protesting her innocence, and told me she would fly with me, and would convince me of her fidelity by such testimonies as I could not but be satisfied with, but I thrust her violently from me; "allez infame!" said I, "go, infamous creature, and take from me the necessity I should be under if I stayed, of sending you to keep company with your dear friend the marquis." I thrust her away with such force, that she fell backward upon the floor and cried out most terribly, and indeed she had reason, for she was very much hurt.

It grieved me indeed to have thrust her away with such force, but you must consider me now in the circumstances of a man enraged, and, as it were, out of himself, furious and mad. However, I took her up from the floor and laid her on the bed, and calling up her maid, bid her go and take care of her mistress: and going soon after out of doors, I took horse and made the best of my way, not towards Calais or Dunkirk, or towards Flanders, whither it might be suggested I was fled, and whither they did pursue me the same evening, but I took the direct road for Lorraine, and riding all night, and very hard, I passed the Maine the next day at night at Chalons, and came safe into the Duke of Lorraine's dominions the third day, where I rested one day, only to consider what course to take, for it was still a most difficult thing to pass any way, but that I should either be in the King of France's dominions, or be taken by the French allies as a subject of France; but getting good advice from a priest at Bar-le-Duc, who, though I did not tell him the particulars of my case, yet guessed how it was, it being, as he said, very usual for gentlemen in my circumstances to fly that way. Upon this supposition, this kind padre got me a church pass, that is to say, he made me a purveyor for the abbey of —, and, as such, got me a passport to go to Deux-ponts, which belonged to the King of Sweden. Having such authority there, and the priest's recommendation to an ecclesiastic in the place, I got passports from thence in the King of Sweden's name to Cologne, and then I was thoroughly safe; so making my way to the Netherlands, without any difficulty I came to the Hague, and from thence, though very privately, and by several names, I came to England; and thus I got clear of my Italian wife, w—e I should have called her; for, after I had made her so myself, how should I expect any other of her?

Being arrived at London, I wrote to my friend at Paris, but dated my letter from the Hague, where I ordered him to direct his answers; the chief business of my writing was, to know if my bill was paid him, to inquire if any pursuit was made after me, and what other news he had about me, or my wife, and particularly how it had fared with the marquis.

I received an answer in a few days, importing that he had received the money on my bill, which he was ready to pay as I should direct; that the marquis was not dead, "but," said he, "you have killed him another way, for he has lost his commission in the guards, which was worth to him 20,000 livres, and he is yet a close prisoner in the Bastile;" that pursuit was ordered after me upon suspicion; that they had followed me to Amiens, on the road to Dunkirk, and to Chateau de Cambresis, on the way to Flanders; but, missing me that way, had given it over; that the marquis had been too well instructed to own that he had fought with me, but said that he was assaulted on the road, and, unless I could be taken, he would take his trial and come off for want of proof; that my flying was a circumstance indeed that moved strongly against him, because it was known that we had had some words that day, and were seen to walk together; but that nothing being proved on either side, he would come off with the loss of his commission, which, however, being very rich, he could bear well enough.

As to my wife, he wrote me word she was inconsolable, and had cried herself to death almost; but he added (very ill-natured indeed), and whether it was for me, or for the marquis, that he could not determine; he likewise told me she was in very bad circumstances, and very low, so that if I did not take some care of her, she would come to be in very great distress.

The latter part of this story moved me indeed, for I thought, however it was, I ought not to let her starve; and besides, poverty was a temptation which a woman could not easily withstand, and I ought not to be the instrument to drive her to a horrid necessity of crime, if I could prevent it.

Upon this I wrote to him again, to go to her, and talk with her, and learn as much as he could of her particular circumstances; and that, if he found she was really in want, and particularly, that she did not live a scandalous life, he should give her twenty pistoles, and tell her, if she would engage to live retired and honestly, she should have so much annually, which was enough to subsist her.

She took the first twenty pistoles, but bade him tell me that I had wronged her, and unjustly charged her, and I ought to do her justice; and I had ruined her by exposing her in such a manner as I had, having no proof of my charge, or ground for any suspicion; that, as to twenty pistoles a-year, it was a mean allowance to a wife that had travelled over the world as she had done with me, and the like; and so expostulated with him to obtain forty pistoles a-year of me, which I consented to; but she never gave me the trouble of paying above one year; for, after that, the marquis was so fond of her again, that he took her away to himself; and, as my friend wrote me word, had settled 400 crowns a-year on her, and I never heard any more of her.

I was now in London, but was obliged to be very retired, and change my name, letting nobody in the nation know who I was, except my merchant, by whom I corresponded with my people in Virginia; and particularly, that my tutor, who was now become the head manager of my affairs, and was in very good circumstances himself also by my means, but he deserved all I did, or could do for him, for he was a most faithful friend, as well as servant, as ever man had, in that country at least.

I was not the easiest man alive in the retired solitary manner I now lived in; and I experienced the truth of the text, that it is not good for man to be alone, for I was extremely melancholy and heavy, and indeed knew not what to do with myself, particularly, because I was under some restraint, that I was, too, afraid to go abroad; at last I resolved to go quite away, and go to Virginia again, and there live retired as I could.

But when I came to consider that part more narrowly, I could not prevail with myself to live a private life; I had got a wandering kind of taste, and knowledge of things begat a desire of increasing it, and an exceeding delight I had in it, though I had nothing to do in the armies or in war, and did not design ever to meddle with it again; yet I could not live in the world, and not inquire what was doing in it, nor could I think of living in Virginia, where I was to hear my news twice a-year, and read the public accounts of what was just then upon the stocks, as the history of things past.

This was my notion; I was now in my native country, where my circumstances were easy; and, though I had ill luck abroad, for I brought little money home with me, yet, by a little good management, I might soon have money by me. I had nobody to keep but myself, and my plantations in Virginia generally returned me from 400*l.* to 600*l.* a-year, one year above 700*l.*, and to go thither, I concluded, was to be buried alive; so I put off all thoughts of it, and resolved to settle somewhere in England, where I might know everybody, and nobody know me. I was not long in concluding where to pitch, for, as I spoke the French tongue perfectly well, having been so many years among them, it was easy for me to pass for a Frenchman; so I went to Canterbury, called myself an Englishman among the French, and a Frenchman among the English; and on that score was the more perfectly concealed, going by the name of Monsieur Charnot with the English, and Mr Charnock among the French.

Here indeed I lived perfectly incog.; I made no particular acquaintance so as to be intimate, and yet I knew everybody, and everybody knew me; I discoursed in common, talked French with the Walloons, and English with the English; lived retired and sober, and was well enough received by all sorts; but, as I meddled with nobody's business, so nobody meddled with mine; I thought I lived pretty well.

But I was not fully satisfied; a settled family life was the thing I loved; I had made two pushes at it as you have heard, but with ill success; yet the miscarriage of what was passed did not discourage me at all, but I resolved to marry; I looked out for a woman as suitable as I could, but always found something or other to shock my fancy, except once a gentleman's daughter of good fashion, but I met with so many repulses of one kind or another, that I was forced to give it over, and indeed, though I might be said to be a lover in this suit, and had managed myself so well with the young lady that I had no difficulty left but what would soon have been adjusted; yet her father was so difficult, made so many objections, was to-day not pleased one way, to-morrow another, that he would stand by nothing that he himself had proposed, nor could he ever be brought to be of the same mind two days together; so that we at last put an end to the pretensions, for she would not marry without her father's consent, and I would not steal her, and so that affair ended.

I cannot say but I was a little vexed at the disappointment of this, so I left the city of Canterbury, and went to London in the stage coach; here I had an odd scene presented as ever happened of its kind.

There was in the stage coach a young woman and her maid; she was sitting in a very melancholy posture, for she was in the coach before me, and sighed most dreadfully all the way, and whenever her maid spoke to her, she burst out into tears; I was not long in the coach with her before, seeing she made such a dismal figure, I offered to comfort her a little, and inquired into the occasion of her affliction, but she would not speak a word; but her maid, with a force of crying too, said her master was dead, at which word the lady burst out again into a passion of crying, and, between mistress and maid, this was all I could get for the morning part of that day. When we came to dine, I offered the lady, that seeing, I supposed, she would not dine with the company, if she would please to dine with me I would dine in a separate room, for the rest of the company were foreigners: her maid thanked me in her mistress's name, but her mistress could eat nothing, and desired to be private.

Here, however, I had some discourse with the maid, from whom I learned that the lady was wife to a captain of a ship, who was outward bound to somewhere in the Streights, I think it was to Zante and Venice; that, being gone no farther than the Downs, he was taken sick, and, after about ten days' illness, had died at Deal; that his wife, hearing of his sickness, had gone to Deal to see him, and had come but just time enough to see him die; had stayed there to bury him, and was now coming to London in a sad disconsolate condition indeed.

I heartily pitied the young gentlewoman indeed, and said some things to her in the coach to let her know I did so, which she gave no answer to, but, in civility, now and then made a bow, but never gave me the least opportunity to see her face, or so much as to know whether she had a face or no, much less to guess what form of a face it was; it was winter time, and the coach put up at Rochester, not going through in a day, as was usual in summer; and a little before we came to Rochester I told the lady I understood she had eat nothing to-day, that such a course would but make her sick, and, doing her harm, could do her deceased husband no good; and therefore I entreated her, that, as I was a stranger, and only offered a civility to her, in order to abate her severely afflicting herself, she would yield so far to matters of ceremony as let us sup together as passengers; for as to the strangers, they did not seem to understand the custom, or to desire it.

She bowed, but gave no answer; only after pressing her by arguments, which she could not deny was very civil and kind, she returned, she gave me thanks, but she could not eat. "Well, madam," said I, "do but sit down, though you think you cannot eat, perhaps you may eat a bit; indeed you must eat, or you will destroy yourself at this rate of living, and upon the road too: in a word, you will be sick indeed." I argued with her; the maid put in a word, and said, "Do, madam, pray try to divert yourself a little." I pressed her again, and she bowed to me very respectfully, but still said no, and she could not eat; the maid continued to importune her, and said, "Dear madam, do; the gentleman is a civil gentleman, pray madam, do;" and then, turning to me, said, "My mistress will, sir, I hope;" and seemed pleased, and indeed was so.

However, I went on to persuade her; and, taking no notice of what her maid said, that I was a civil gentleman, I told her, "I am a stranger to you, madam; but if I thought you were shy of me on any account as to civility, I will send my supper up to you in your chamber, and stay below myself." She bowed then to me twice, and looked up, which was the first time, and said, she had no suspicion of that kind; that my offer was so civil, that she was as much ashamed to refuse it as she should be ashamed to accept it, if she was where she was known; that she thought I was not quite a stranger to her, for she had seen me before; that she would accept my offer, so far as to sit at table, because I desired it; but she could not promise me to eat, and that she hoped I would take the other as a constraint upon her, in return to so much kindness.

She startled me when she said she had seen me before, for I had not the least knowledge of her, nor did I remember so much as to have heard of her name, for I had asked her name of her maid; and indeed it made me almost repent my compliment, for it was many ways essential to me not to be known. However, I could not go back, and, besides, if I was known, it was essentially necessary to me to know who it was that knew me, and by what circumstances; so I went on with my compliment.

We came to the inn but just before it was dark; I offered to hand my widow out of the coach, and she could not decline it; but though her hoods were not then much over her face, yet, being dark, I could see little of her then; I waited on her then to the stair-foot, and led her up the inn stairs to a dining-room, which the master of the house offered to show us, as if for the whole company; but she declined going in there, and said, she desired rather to go directly to her chamber, and, turning to her maid, bade her speak to the innkeeper to show her to her lodging-room; so I waited on her to the door, and took my leave, telling her I would expect her at supper.

In order to treat her moderately well, and not extravagantly, for I had no thoughts of anything farther than civility, which was the effect of mere compassion, for the unhappiness of the most truly disconsolate woman that I ever met with; say, in order to treat her handsomely, but not extravagantly, I provided what the house afforded, which was a couple of partridges, and a very good dish of stewed oysters; they brought us up afterward a neat's tongue, and a nam, that was almost cut quite down; but we eat none of it, for the other was fully enough for us both, and the maid made her supper of the oysters we had left, which were enough.

I mention this, because it should appear I did not treat her as a person I was making any court to, for I had nothing of that in my thoughts; but merely in pity to the poor woman, who I saw in a circumstance that was indeed very unhappy.

When I gave her maid notice that supper was ready, she fetched her mistress, coming in before her with a candle in her hand, and then it was that I saw her face, and, being in her dishabille, she had no hoods over eyes, or black upon her head, when I was truly surprised to see one of the most beautiful faces upon earth; I saluted her, and led her to the fire side, the table, though spread, being too far from the fire, the weather being cold.

She was now something sociable, though very grave, and sighed often on account of her circumstances; but she so handsomely governed her grief, yet so artfully made it mingle itself with all her discourse, that it added exceedingly to her behaviour, which was every way most exquisitely genteel. I had a great deal of discourse with her, and upon many subjects, and by degrees took her name, that is to say, from herself, as I had done before from her maid, also the place where she lived, viz. near Ratcliff, or rather Stepney, where I asked her leave to pay her a visit, when she thought fit to admit company, which she seemed to intimate would not be a great while.

It is a subject too surfeiting to entertain people with the beauty of a person they will never see ; let it suffice to tell them she was the most beautiful creature of her sex that I ever saw before or since, and it cannot be wondered if I was charmed with her the very first moment I saw her face ; her behaviour was likewise a beauty in itself, and was so extraordinary, that I cannot say I can describe it.

The next day she was much more free than she was the first night, and I had so much conversation as to enter into particulars of things on both side ; also she gave me leave to come and see her house, which, however, I did not do under a fortnight, or thereabouts, because I did not know how far she would dispense with the ceremony, which it was necessary to keep up at the beginning of the mourning.

However, I came as a man that had business with her relating to the ship her husband was dead out of, and the first time I came was admitted, and, in short, the first time I came I made love to her ; she received that proposal with disdain ; I cannot indeed say she treated me with any disrespect, but she said she abhorred the offer, and would hear no more of it.

How I came to make such a proposal to her, I scarce knew then, though it was very much my intention from the first.

In the meantime I inquired into her circumstances and her character, and heard nothing but what was very agreeable of them both ; and, above all, I found she had the report of the best humoured lady, and the best bred of all that part of the town ; and now I thought I had found what I had so often wished for to make me happy, and had twice miscarried in, and resolved not to miss her, if it was possible to obtain her.

It came indeed a little into my thoughts, that I was a married man, and had a second wife alive, who, though she was false to me, and a whore, yet I was not legally divorced from her, and that she was my wife for all that ; but I soon got over that part ; for, first, as she was a whore, and the marquis had confessed it to me, I was divorced in law, and I had a power to put her away ; but having had the misfortune of fighting a duel, and being obliged to quit the country, I could not claim the legal process which was my right, and therefore might conclude myself as much divorced as if it had been actually done, and so that scruple vanished.

I suffered now two months to run without pressing my widow any more, only I had kept a strict watch to find if any one else pretended to her ; at the end of two months I visited her again, when I found she received me with more freedom, and we had no more sighs and sobs about the last husband ; and though she would not let me press my former proposal so far as I thought I might have done, yet I found I had leave to come again, and it was the article of decency which she stood upon as much as any thing ; that I was not disagreeable to her, and that my using her so handsomely upon the road had given me a great advantage in her favour.

I went on gradually with her, and gave her leave to stand off for two months more ; but then I told her the matter of decency, which was but a ceremony, was not to stand in competition with the matter of affection ; and, in short, I could not bear any longer delay ; but that, if she thought fit, we might marry privately, and to cut the story short, as I did my courtship, in about five months I got her in the mind, and we were privately married, and that with so very exact a concealment, that her maid, that was so instrumental in it, yet had no knowledge of it for near a month more.

I was now, not only in my imagination, but in reality, the most happy creature in the world, as I was infinitely satisfied with my wife, who was indeed the best humoured woman in the world, a most accomplished, beautiful creature indeed, perfectly well-bred, and had not one ill quality about her ; and this happiness continued without the least interruption for about six years.

But I, that was to be the most unhappy fellow alive in the article of matrimony, had at last a disappointment of the worst sort, even here ; I had three fine children by her, and in her time of lying-in with the last, she got some cold, that she did not in a long time get off ; and, in short, she grew very sickly. In being so continually ill, and out of order, she very unhappily got a habit of drinking cordials and hot liquors ; drink, like the devil, when it gets hold of any one, though but a little, it goes on by little and little to their destruction ; so in my wife, her stomach being weak and faint, she first took this cordial, then that, till, in short, she could not live without them, and from a drop to a sup, from a sup to a dram, from a dram to a glass, and so on to two, till at last she took, in short, to what we call drinking.

As I likened drink to the devil in its gradual possession of the habits and person, so it is yet more like the devil in its encroachment on us, where it gets hold of our senses ; in short, my beautiful, good-humoured, modest, well-bred wife, grew a beast, a slave to strong liquor, and would be drunk at her own table, nay, in her own closet by herself, till, instead of a well-made, fine shape, she was as fat as an hostess ; her fine face, bloated and blotched, had not so much as the ruins of the most beautiful person alive, nothing remained but a good eye ; that indeed she held to the last : in short, she lost her beauty, her shape, her manners, and at last her virtue ; and, giving herself up to drinking, killed herself in about a year and a half after she first began that cursed trade, in which time she twice was exposed in the most scandalous manner with a captain of a ship, who, like a villain, took the advantage of her being in drink, and not knowing what she did ; but it had this unhappy effect, that, instead of her being ashamed, and repenting of it when she came to herself, it hardened her in the crime, and she grew as void of modesty at last as of sobriety.

O ! the power of intemperance, and how it encroaches on the best dispositions in the world ! how it comes upon us gradually and insensibly, and what dismal effects it works upon our morals, changing the most virtuous, regular, well-instructed, and well-inclined tempers into worse than brutal. That was a good story, whether real or invented, of the devil tempting a young man to murder his father :—" No," he said, " that was unnatural."—" Why, then," says the devil, " go and lie with your mother."—" No," says he, " that is abominable."—" Well, then," says the devil, "if you will do nothing else to oblige me, go and get drunk.—" Ay, ay," says the fellow, "I will do that;" so he went and made himself drunk as a swine; and when he was drunk, he murdered his father and lay with his mother.

Never was a woman more virtuous, modest, chaste, sober: she never so much as desired to drink anything strong; it was with the greatest entreaty that I could prevail with her to drink a glass or two of wine, and rarely, if ever, above one or two at a time; even in company she had no inclination to it; not an immodest word ever came out of her mouth, nor would she suffer it in any one else in her hearing, without resentment and abhorrence; but upon that weakness and illness, after her last lying-in as above, the nurse pressed her, whenever she found herself faint, and a sinking of her spirits, to take this cordial, and that dram, to keep up her spirits, till it became necessary even to keep her alive, and gradually increased to a habit, so that it was no longer her physic but her food; her appetite sunk and went quite away, and she eat little or nothing, but came at last to such a dreadful height, that, as I have said, she would be drunk in her own dressing-room by eleven o'clock in the morning, and, in short, at last was never sober.

In this life of hellish excess, as I have said, she lost all that was before so valuable in her; and a villain if it be proper to call a man by such a name, who was an intimate acquaintance, coming to pretend to visit her, made her and her maid so drunk together, that he abused both. Let any one judge what was my case now; I that for six years thought myself the happiest man alive, was now the most miserable distracted creature: as to my wife, I loved her so well, and was so sensible of the disaster of her drinking being the occasion of it all, that I could not resent it to such a degree as I had done in her predecessor, but I pitied her heartily; however, I put away all her servants, and almost locked her up, that is to say, I set new people over her, who would not suffer any one to come near her without my knowledge.

CHAPTER XVI.

I MEET AND FIGHT HER CAPTAIN, AND THRASH HIM HEARTILY — MY WIFE'S DEATH — ENTERTAIN THOUGHTS OF A FOURTH WIFE—COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE WITH MY FACTOR'S DAUGHTER—SHE MAKES ME AN EXCELLENT WIFE, BUT DIES AT THE END OF FOUR YEARS—I RETURN TO VIRGINIA, AND MEET WITH A WONDERFUL SURPRISE.

BUT what to do with the villain that had thus abused both her and me, that was the question that remained; to fight him upon equal terms, I thought was a little hard; that, after a man had treated me as he had done, he deserved no fair play for his life; so I resolved to wait for him in Stepney fields, and which way he often came home pretty late, and pistol him in the dark, and, if possible, to let him know what I killed him for before I did it: but when I came to consider of this, it shocked my temper too as well as principle, and I could not be a murderer, whatever else I could be, or whatever I was provoked to be.

However, I resolved, on the other hand, that I would severely correct him for what he had done, and it was not long before I had an opportunity; for, hearing one morning that he was walking cross the fields from Stepney to Shadwell, which way I knew he often went, I waited for his coming home again, and fairly met him.

I had not many words with him, but told him I had long looked for him; that he knew the villainy he had been guilty of in my family, and he could not believe, since he knew also that I was fully informed of it, but that I must be a great coward as well as a cuckold, or that I would resent it, and that it was now a very proper time to call him to account for it, and therefore bade him, if he durst show his face to what he had done, and defend the name of a captain of a man-of-war, as they said he had been, to draw.

He seemed surprised at the thing, and began to parley, and would lessen the crime of it, but I told him it was not a time to talk that way, since he could not deny the fact; and to lessen the crime was to lay it the more upon the woman, who, I was sure, if he had not first debauched with wine, he could never have brought to the rest; and, seeing he refused to draw, I knocked him down with my cane at one blow, and I would not strike him again while he lay on the ground, but waited to see him recover a little, for I saw plainly he was not killed; in a few minutes he came to himself again, and then I took him fast by one wrist, and caned him as severely as I was able, and as long as I could hold it for want of breath, but forbore his head, because I was resolved he should feel it; in this condition at last he begged for mercy, but I was deaf to all pity a great while, till he roared out like a boy soundly whipped; then I took his sword from him, and broke it before his face, and left him on the ground, giving him two or three kicks on the backside, and bade him go and take the law of me if he thought fit.

I had now as much satisfaction as indeed could be taken of a coward, and had no more to say to him: but, as I knew it would make a great noise about the town, I immediately removed my family, and that I might be perfectly concealed, went into the north of England, and lived in a little town called —, not far from Lancaster, where I lived retired, and was no more heard of for about two years. My wife, though more confined than she used to be, so kept up from the lewd part which, I believe, in the intervals of her intemperance, she was truly ashamed of and abhorred, yet retained the drinking part, which, becoming (as I have said) necessary for her subsistence, she soon ruined her health, and, in about a year and a half after my removal into the north, she died.

Thus I was once more a free man, and, as one would think, should by this time have been fully satisfied that matrimony was not appointed to be a state of felicity to me.

I should have mentioned that the villain of a captain, who I had drubbed (as above) pretended to make a great stir about my assaulting him on the highway, and that I had fallen upon him with three ruffians, with an intent to murder him, and this began to obtain belief among the people in the neighbourhood: I sent him word of so much of it as I had heard, and told him I hoped it did not come from his own mouth, but, if it did, I expected he would publicly disown it, he himself declaring he knew it to be false, or else I should be forced to act the same thing over again till I had disciplined him into better manners; and that he might be assured, that if he continued to pretend that I had anybody with me when I caned him, I would publish the whole story in print, and besides that would cane him again wherever I met him, and, as often as I met him, till he thought fit to defend himself with his sword like a gentleman.

He gave me no answer to this letter, and the satisfaction I had for that was, that I gave twenty or thirty copies of it about among the neighbours, which made it as public as if I had printed it (that is, as to his acquaintance and mine) and made him so hissed at and hated, that he was obliged to remove into some other part of the town, whither I did not inquire.

My wife being now dead, I knew not what course to take in the world, and I grew so disconsolate and discouraged, that I was next door to being distempered, and sometimes, indeed, I thought myself a little touched in the head. But it proved nothing but vapours, and the vexation of this affair, and in about a year's time, or thereabouts, it wore off again.

I had rambled up and down in a most discontented unsettled posture after this, I say, about a year, and then I considered I had three innocent children, and I could take no care of them, and that I must either go away and leave them to the wide world, or settle here and get somebody to look after them, and that better a mother-in-law than no mother, for to live such a wandering life it would not do; so I resolved I would marry as anything offered, though it was mean, and the meaner the better, I concluded my next wife should be only taken as an upper servant, that is to say, a nurse to my children, and house-keeper to myself, and let her be whore or honest woman, said I, as she likes best, I am resolved I will not much concern myself about that, for I was now one desperate, that valued not how things went.

In this careless, and indeed rash, foolish, humour, I talked to myself thus: If I marry an honest woman my children will be taken care of; if she be a slut and abuses me, as I see everybody does, I will kidnap her and send her to Virginia, to my plantations there, and there she shall work hard enough, and fare hard enough to keep her chaste, I'll warrant her.

I knew well enough at first that these were mad, hare-brained notions, and I thought no more of being serious in them than I thought of being a man in the moon; but I know not how it happened to me, I reasoned and talked to myself in this wild manner so long, that I brought myself to be seriously desperate; that is, to resolve upon another marriage, with all the suppositions of unhappiness that could be imagined to fall out.

And yet even this rash resolution of my senses did not come presently to action, for I was half a year after this before I fixed upon anything; at last, as he that seeks mischief shall certainly find it, so it was with me; there happened to be a young or rather a middle-aged woman in the next town, which was but half a mile off, who usually was at my house, and among my children every day, when the weather was tolerable; and though she came but merely as a neighbour, and to see us, yet she was always helpful in directing and ordering things for them, and mighty handy about them, as well before my wife died as after.

Her father was one that I employed often to go to Liverpool, and sometimes to Whitehaven, and do business for me; for having, as it were, settled myself in the northern parts of England, I had ordered part of my effects to be shipped, as occasion of shipping offered, to either of those two towns, to which (the war continuing very sharp) it was safer coming, as to privateers, than about through the channel to London.

I took a mighty fancy at last that this girl would answer my end, particularly that I saw she was mighty useful among the children; so, on the other hand, the children loved her very well, and I resolved to love her too, flattering myself mightily that, as I had married two gentlewomen and one citizen, and they proved all three w——s, I should now find what I wanted in an innocent country wench.

I took up a world of time in considering of this matter; indeed, scarce any of my matches were done without very mature consideration; the second was the worst in that article, but in this I thought of it, I believe, four months most seriously before I resolved, and that very prudence spoiled the whole thing; however, at last being resolved, I took Mrs Margaret one day as she passed by my parlour-door, called her in, and told her I wanted to speak with her; she came readily in, but blushed mightily when I bade her sit down, for I bade her sit down in a chair just by me.

I used no great ceremony with her, but told her that I had observed she had been mighty kind to my children, and was very tender to them, and that they all loved her, and that if she and I could agree about it, I intended to make her their mother, if she was not engaged to somebody else; the girl sat still and said never a word till I said those words, "if she was not engaged to somebody else;" when she seemed struck; however, I took no notice of it other than this,—“Look ye, Moggy,” said I (so they call them in the country), “if you have promised yourself you must tell me;” for we all knew that a young fellow, a good clergyman's wicked son, had hung about her a great while, two or three years, and made love to her, but could never get the girl in the mind, it seems, to have him.

She knew I was not ignorant of it, and therefore, after her first surprise was over, she told me Mr —— had, as I knew, often come after her, but she had never promised him anything, and had for several years refused him; her father always telling her that he was a wicked fellow, and that he would be her ruin if she had him.

“Well, Moggy, then,” says I, “what dost say to me, art thou free to make me a wife?” She blushed and looked down upon the ground, and would not speak a good while; but when I pressed her to tell me, she looked up and said she supposed I was but jesting with her; well, I got over that, and told her I was in very good earnest with her, and I took her for a sober, honest, modest girl, and, as I said, one that my children loved mighty well, and I was in earnest with her; if she would give me her consent, I would give her my word that I would have her, and we would be married to-morrow morning. She looked up again at that, and smiled a little, and said, "No, that was too soon to say yes;" she hoped I would give her some time to consider of it, and to talk with her father about it.

I told her she needed not much time to consider about it; but, however, I would give her till to-morrow morning, which was a great while. By this time I had kissed Moggy two or three times, and she began to be freer with me; and, when I pressed her to marry me the next morning, she laughed, and told me it was not lucky to be married in her old clothes.

I stopped her mouth presently with that, and told her she should not be married in her old clothes, for I would give her some new. "Ay, it may be afterwards," says Moggy, and laughed again. "No, just now," says I; "come along with me, Moggy;" so I carried her up stairs into my wife's room that was, and showed her a new morning gown of my wife's, that she had never worn above two or three times, and several other fine things. "Look you there, Moggy," says I, "there is a wedding gown for you; give me your hand now that you will have me to-morrow morning; and as to your father, you know he is gone to Liverpool on my business, but I will answer for it he shall not be angry when he comes home to call his master son-in-law, and I ask him no portion; therefore give me thy hand for it, Moggy," says I, very merrily to her, and kissed her again, and the girl gave me her hand, and very pleasantly too, and I was mightily pleased with it, I assure you.

There lived, about three doors from us, an ancient gentleman who passed for a doctor of physic, but who was really a Romish priest in orders, as there are many in that part of the country, and in the evening I sent to speak with him. He knew that I understood his profession, and that I had lived in popish countries, and, in a word, believed me a Roman too, for I was such abroad. When he came to me, I told him the occasion for which I sent for him, and that it was to be to-morrow morning; he readily told me if I would come and see him in the evening, and bring Moggy with me, he would marry us in his own study, and that it was rather more private to do it in the evening than in the morning; so I called Moggy again to me and told her since she and I had agreed the matter for to-morrow, it was as well to be done over night, and told her what the doctor had said.

Moggy blushed again, and said she must go home first; that she could not be ready before to-morrow. "Look ye, Moggy," says I, "you are my wife now, and you shall never go away from me a maid; I know what you mean, you would go home to shift you. Come, Moggy," says I, "come along with me again up stairs." So I carried her to a chest of linen, where were several new shifts of my last wife's, which she had never worn at all, and some that had been worn. "There is a clean smock for you, Moggy," says I, "and to-morrow you shall have all the rest." When I had done this, "Now Moggy," says I, "go and dress you;" so I locked her in, and went down stairs; "knock," says I, "when you are dressed."

After some time, Moggy did not knock, but down she came into my room, completely dressed, for there were several other things that I bade her take, and the clothes fitted her as if they had been made for her; it seems she slipped the lock back. "Well, Moggy," says I, "now you see you shall not be married in your old clothes;" so I took her in my arms and kissed her, and well pleased I was as ever I was in my life, or with anything I ever did in my life. As soon as it was dark, Moggy slipped away beforehand, as the doctor and I had agreed, to the old gentleman's housekeeper, and I came in about half an hour after, and there we were married in the doctor's study, that is to say, in his oratory, or chapel, a little room within his study, and we stayed and supped with him afterwards.

Then, after a short stay more, I went home first, because I would send the children all to bed, and the other servants out of the way, and Moggy came some time after, and so we lay together that night. The next morning I let all the family know that Moggy was my wife, and my three children were rejoiced at it to the last degree. And now I was a married man a fourth time; and, in short, I was really more happy in this plain country girl than with any of all the wives I had had. She was not young, being about thirty-three, but she brought me a son the first year; she was very pretty, well shaped, and of a merry, cheerful disposition, but not a beauty; she was an admirable family manager, loved my former children, and used them not at all the worse for having some of her own; in a word, she made me an excellent wife; but lived with me but four years, and died of a hurt she got of a fall while she was with child, and in her I had a very great loss indeed.

And yet such was my fate in wives, that, after all the blushing and backwardness of Mrs Moggy at first, Mrs Moggy had, it seems, made a slip in her younger days, and was got with child ten years before, by a gentleman of great estate in that country, who promised her marriage, and afterwards deserted her; but, as that had happened long before I came into the country, and the child was dead and forgotten, the people were so good to her, and so kind to me, that, hearing I had married her, nobody ever spoke of it, neither did I ever hear of it, or suspect it, till after she was in her grave, and then it was of small consequence to me one way or other, and she was a faithful, virtuous, obliging wife to me. I had a very severe affliction, indeed, while she lived with me, for the small-pox, a frightful distemper in that country, broke into my family and carried off three of my children and a maid-servant; so that I had only one of my former wife's, and one by my Moggy, the first a son, the last a daughter.

While these things were in agitation, came on the invasion of the Scots, and the fight at Preston, and I have cause to bless the memory of my Moggy, for I was all on fire on that side, and just going away with horse and arms to join the Lord Derwentwater; but Moggy begged me off (as I may call it), and hung about me so with her tears and importunities, that I sat still and looked on, for which I had reason to be thankful.

I was really a sorrowful father, and the loss of my children stuck close to me, but the loss of my wife stuck closer to me than all the rest; nor was my grief lessened, or my kindest thoughts abated in the least, by the account I heard of her former miscarriage, seeing they were so long before I knew her, and were not discovered by me, or to me, in her life-time.

All these things put together made me very comfortless. And now I thought heaven summoned me to retire to Virginia, the place, and (as I may say) the only place, I had been blessed at, or had met with anything that deserved the name of success in, and where, indeed, my affairs being in good hands, the plantations were increased to such a degree, that some years my return here made up eight hundred pounds, and one year almost a thousand; so I resolved to leave my native country once more, and taking my son with me, and leaving Moggy's daughter with her grandfather, I made him my principal agent, left him a considerable sum in his hands for the maintenance of the child, and left my will in his hand, by which, if I died before I should otherwise provide for her, I left her 2,000*l.* portion, to be paid by my son out of the estate I had in Virginia, and the whole estate, if he died unmarried.

I embarked for Virginia, in the year —, at the town of Liverpool, and had a tolerable voyage thither, only that we met with a pirate ship in the latitude of 48 degrees, who plundered us of every thing they could come at that was for their turn, that is to say, provisions, ammunition, small arms, and money; but, to give the rogues their due, though they were the most abandoned wretches that were ever seen, they did not use us ill; and as to my loss, it was not considerable; the cargo which I had on board was in goods, and was of no use to them; nor could they come at those things without rumaging the whole ship, which they did not think worth their while.

I found all my affairs in very good order at Virginia; my plantations prodigiously increased, and my manager, who first inspired me with travelling thoughts, and made me master of any knowledge worth naming, received me with a transport of joy, after a ramble of four-and-twenty years.

I ought to remember it, to the encouragement of all faithful servants, that he gave me an account, which, I believe, was critically just, of the whole affairs of the plantations, each by themselves, and balanced in years, every year's produce being fully transmitted, charges deducted, to my order at London.

I was exceedingly satisfied, as I had good reason indeed, with his management; and with his management, as much in its degree, of his own, I can safely say it. He had improved a very large plantation of his own at the same time, which he began upon the foot of the country's allowance of land, and the encouragement he had from me.

When he had given me all this pleasing, agreeable account, you will not think it strange that I had a desire to see the plantations, and to view all the servants, which, in both the works, were upwards of three hundred; and, as my tutor generally bought some every fleet that came from England, I had the mortification to see two or three of the Preston gentlemen there, who, being prisoners of war, were spared from the public execution and sent over to that slavery, which to gentlemen must be worse than death.

I do not mention what I did or said relating to them here; I shall speak at large of it when the rest of them came over, which more nearly concerned me.

But one circumstance occurred to me here that equally surprised me and terrified me to the last degree. Looking over all the servants, as I say above, and viewing the plantations narrowly and frequently, I came one day by a place where some women were at work by themselves: I was seriously reflecting on the misery of human life when I saw some of these poor wretches: thought I, they have perhaps lived gay and pleasantly in the world, notwithstanding, through a variety of distresses, they may have been brought to this; and if a body was to hear the history of some of them now, it would perhaps be as moving and as seasonable a sermon as any minister in the country could preach.

While I was musing thus and looking at the women, on a sudden I heard a combustion among other of the women servants, who were almost behind me in the same work, and help was called loudly for, one of the women having swooned away. They said she would die immediately if something was not done to relieve her. I had nothing about me but a little bottle, which we always carried about us there with rum, to give any servant a dram that merited that favour; so I turned my horse and went up towards the place; but as the poor creature was lying flat on the the ground, and the rest of the women-servants about her, I did not see her, but gave them the bottle, and they rubbed her temples with it, and, with much ado, brought her to life, and offered her a little to drink; but she could drink none of it, and was exceeding ill afterwards, so that she was carried to the infirmary (so they call it in the religious houses in Italy), where the sick nuns or friars are carried; but here, in Virginia, I think they should call it the condemned hole, for it really was only a place just fit for people to die in, not a place to be cured in.

The sick woman refusing to drink, one of the women-servants brought me the bottle again, and I bade them drink it among them, which had almost set them together by the ears for the liquor, there being not enough to give every one a sup.

I went home to my house immediately, and, reflecting on the miserable provision was wont to be made for poor servants when they are sick, I inquired of my manager if it was so still. He said he believed mine was better than any in the country; but he confessed it was but sad lodging; however, he said he would go and look after it immediately, and see how it was.

He came to me about an hour after and told me the woman was very ill and frightened with her condition; that she seemed to be very penitent for some things in her past life, which lay heavy upon her mind, believing she should die; that she asked him if there were no ministers to comfort poor dying servants; and he told her that she knew they had no minister nearer than such a place; but that, if she lived till morning, he should be sent for. He told me also, that he had removed her into a room where their chief workman used to lodge; that he had given her a pair of sheets, and everything he could that he thought she wanted, and had appointed another woman-servant to attend her, and sit up with her.

"Well," says I, "that is well, for I cannot bear to have poor creatures lie and perish by the mere hardship of the place they are in, when they are sick and want help; besides," said I, "some of those unfortunate creatures they call convicts may be people that have been tenderly brought up." "Really, sir," says he, "this poor creature I always said had something of a gentlewoman in her; I could see it by her behaviour; and I have heard the other women say that she lived very great once, and that she had fifteen hundred pounds to her portion, and I dare say she has been a handsome woman in her time, and she has a hand as fine as a lady's now, though it be tanned with the weather; I dare say she was never brought up to labour as she does here, and she says to the rest that it will kill her."

"Truly," says I, "it may be so, and that may be the reason that she faints under it; and," I added, "is there nothing you can put her to within doors that may not be so laborious, and expose her to so much heat and cold?" He told me yes, there was; he could set her to be the house-keeper, for the woman that lately was such was out of her time, and was married and turned planter. "Why, then, let her have it," said I, "if she recovers, and in the meantime go," said I, "and tell her so; perhaps the comfort of it may help to restore her."

He did so, and with that, taking good care of her, and giving her good warm diet, the woman recovered, and in a little time was abroad again; for it was the mere weight of labour, and being exposed to hard lodging and mean diet, to one so tenderly bred, that struck her, and she fainted at her work.

When she was made house-keeper, she was quite another body; she put all the household into such excellent order, and managed their provisions so well, that my tutor admired her conduct, and would be every now and then speaking of her to me, that she was an excellent manager. "I'll warrant," says he, "she has been bred a gentlewoman, and she has been a fine woman in her time too." In a word, he said so many good things of her, that I had a mind to see her; so one day I took occasion to go to the plantation-house, as they called it, and into a parlour, always reserved for the master of the plantation; there she had opportunity to see me before I could see her, and as soon as she had seen me, she knew me; but, indeed, had I seen her a hundred times, I should not have known her; she was, it seems, in the greatest confusion and surprise at seeing who I was, that it was possible for any one to be; and when I ordered my manager to bring her into the room, he found her crying, and begged him to excuse her, that she was frightened, and should die away if she came near me.

I not imagining anything, but that the poor creature was afraid of me (for masters in Virginia are terrible things), bade him tell her she need to be under no concern at my calling for her, for it was not for any hurt, nor for any displeasure, but that I had some orders to give her; so having, as he thought encouraged her (though her surprise was of another kind), he brought her in; when she came in, she held a handkerchief in her hand, wiping her eyes, as if she had cried. "Mrs. House-keeper," said I (speaking cheerfully to her), "don't be concerned at my sending for you; I have had a very good account of your management, and I called for you, to let you know I am very well pleased with it; and if it falls in my way to do you any good, if your circumstances will allow it, I may be willing enough to help you out of your misery."

She made low courtesies, but said nothing however, she was so far encouraged that she took her hand from her face, and I saw her face fully, and I believe she did it, desiring I should discover who she was, but I really knew nothing of her, any more than if I had never seen her in my life; but went on, as I thought, to encourage her, as I used to do with any that I saw deserved it.

In the meantime my tutor, who was in the room, went out on some business or other, I know not what. As soon as he was gone, she burst out into a passion, and fell down on her knees just before me: "O! sir," says she, "I see you don't know me; be merciful to me, I am your miserable divorced wife!"

I was astonished, I was frightened, I trembled like one in an ague, I was speechless; in a word, I was ready to sink, and she fell flat on her face, and lay there as if she had been dead. I was speechless, I say, as a stone; I had only presence of mind enough to step to the door and fasten it, that my tutor might not come in; then, going back to her, I took her up and spoke comfortably to her, and told her I no more knew her than if I had never seen her.

"O! sir," said she, "afflictions are dreadful things; such as I have suffered have been enough to alter my countenance; but forgive," said she, "for God's sake, the injuries I have done you. I have paid dear for all my wickedness; and it is just, it is righteous, that God should bring me to your foot, to ask your pardon for all my brutish doings. Forgive me, sir," said she, "I beseech you, and let me be your slave or servant for it as long as I live; it is all I ask;" and with those words she fell upon her knees again, and cried so vehemently that it was impossible for her to stop it, or to speak a word more. I took her up again, made her sit down, desired her to compose herself and to hear what I was going to say, though indeed it touched me so sensibly that I was hardly able to speak any more than she was.

First I told her it was such a surprise to me that I was not able to say much to her, and indeed the tears ran down my face almost as fast as they did on hers; I told her that I should only tell her now that, as nobody had yet known anything that had passed, so it was absolutely necessary not a word of it should be known; that it should not be the worse for her that she was thus thrown into my hands again; but that I could do nothing for her if it was known, and therefore that her future good or ill fortune would depend upon her entire concealing it; that, as my manager would come in again presently, she should go back to her part of the house, and go on in the business as she did before; that I would come to her, and talk more at large with her in a day or two; so she retired, after assuring me that not a word of it should go out of her mouth, and indeed she was willing to retire before my tutor came again, that she might not see the agony she was in.

I was so perplexed about this surprising incident that I hardly knew what I did or said all that night, nor was I come to any settled resolution in the morning what course to take in it. However, in the morning I called my tutor, and told him that I had been exceedingly concerned about the poor distressed creature, the housekeeper: that I had heard some of her story, which was very dismal; that she had been in very good circumstances, and was bred very well, and that I was glad he had removed her out of the field into the house; but still she was almost naked, and that I would have him go to the warehouse and give her some linen, especially head-clothes and all sorts of small things, such as hoods, gloves, stockings, shoes, petticoats, &c., and to let her choose for herself; also a morning-gown of calico, and a mantua of a better kind of calico; that is to say, to new clothe her, which he did; but he brought me word that he found her all in tears, and that she had cried all night long, and, in short, he believed she would indeed cry herself to death; that all the while she was receiving the things he gave her she cried; that now and then she would struggle with and stop it, but that then, upon another word speaking, she would burst out again, so that it grieved everybody that saw her.

I was really affected with her case very much, but struggled hard with myself to hide it, and turned the discourse to something else; in the meantime, though I did not go to her the next day, nor till the third day, yet I studied day and night how to act, and what I should do in this remarkable case.

When I came to the house, which was the third day, she came into the room I was in, clothed all over with my things which I had ordered her, and told me she thanked God she was now my servant again, and wore my livery; thanked me for the clothes I had sent her, and said it was much more than she had deserved from me.

I then entered into discourses with her, nobody being present but ourselves, and first I told her she should name no more of the unkind things that had passed; for she had humbled herself more than enough on that subject, and I would never reproach her with anything that was past; I found that she had been the deepest sufferer by far; I told her it was impossible for me, in my present circumstances, to receive her there as a wife who came over as a convict, neither did she know so little as to desire it; but I told her I might be instrumental to put an end to her misfortunes in the world, and especially to the miserable part of it, which was her present load, provided she could effectually keep her own counsel, and never let the particulars come out of her mouth, and that from the day she did she might date her irrecoverable ruin.

She was as sensible of the necessity of that part as I was, and told me all she could claim of me would be only to deliver her from her present calamity, that she was not able to support; and that then, if I pleased, she might live such a life as that she might apply the residue of what time she should have wholly to repentance; that she was willing to do the meanest offices in the world for me; and though she should rejoice to hear that I would forgive her former life, yet that she would not look any higher than to be my servant as long as she lived, and in the meantime I might be satisfied she would never let any creature so much as know that I had ever seen her before.

I asked her if she was willing to let me into any part of the history of her life since she and I parted, but I did not insist upon it otherwise than as she thought convenient. She said, as her breach with me began first in folly and ended in sin, so her whole life afterward was a continued series of calamity, sin, and sorrow, sin and shame, and last misery; that she was deluded into gay company, and to an expensive way of living, which betrayed her to several wicked courses to support the expenses of it; that after a thousand distresses and difficulties, being not able to maintain herself, she was reduced to extreme poverty.

That she would many times have humbled herself to me in the lowest and most submissive manner in the world, being sincerely penitent for her first crime, but that she never could hear of me, nor which way I was gone; that she was by that means so abandoned that she wanted bread, and those wants and distresses brought her into bad company of another kind, and that she fell in among a gang of thieves, with whom she herded for some time, and got money enough a great while, but under the greatest dread and terror imaginable, being in the constant fear of coming to shame; that afterwards, what she feared was come upon her, and for a very trifling attempt, in which she was not principal but accidentally concerned, she was sent to this place. She told me her life was such a collection of various fortunes, up and down, in plenty and in misery, in prison and at liberty, at ease and in torment, that it would take up a great many days to give me a history of it; that I was come to see the end of it, as I had seen the best part of the beginning; that I knew she was brought up tenderly, and fared delicately; but that now she was, with the prodigal, brought to desire husks with swine, and even to want that supply. Her tears flowed so strongly upon this discourse, that they frequently interrupted her, so that she could not go on without difficulty, and at last could not go on at all; so I told her I would excuse her telling any more of her story at that time; that I saw it was but a renewing of her grief, and that I would rather contribute to her forgetting what was past, and desired her to say no more of it, so I broke off that part.

In the meantime I told her, since Providence had thus cast her upon my hands again, I would take care that she should not want, and that she should not live hardly neither, though I could go no farther at present; and thus she parted for that time, and she continued in the business of housekeeper, only that to ease her I gave her an assistant; and though I would not have it called so, it was neither more nor less than a servant to wait on her, and to do everything for her, and I told her too that it was so.

CHAP. XVII.

MY TUTOR FALLS IN LOVE WITH MY QUONDAM WIFE
—DIFFICULTIES THEREUPON—I TAKE HER AGAIN TO WIFE MYSELF—A RETROSPECT ATTENDED WITH DISAGREEABLE CONSEQUENCES—I FREIGHT
A SLOOP, AND EMBARK FOR THE MADEIRAS.

AFTER she had been some time in this place she recovered her spirits and grew cheerful; her fallen flesh plumped up, and the sunk and hollow parts filled again; so that she began to recover something of that brightness and charming countenance which was once so very agreeable to me; and sometimes I could not help having warm desires towards her, and of taking her into her first station again; but there were many difficulties occurred, which I could not get over a great while.

But in the meantime another odd accident happened, which put me to a very great difficulty, and more than I could have thought such a thing could be capable of; my tutor, a man of wit and learning, and full of generous principles, who was at first moved with compassion for the misery of this gentlewoman, and even then thought there were some things more than common in her, as I have hinted. Now when, as I say, she was recovered, and her sprightly temper restored and comforted, he was charmed so with her conversation that, in short, he fell in love with her.

I hinted, in my former account of her, that she had a charming tongue, was mistress of abundance of wit, and she sung incomparably fine, and was perfectly well bred; these all remained with her still, and made her a very agreeable person; and, in short, he came to me one evening, and told me that he came to ask my leave to let him marry the housekeeper.

I was exceedingly perplexed at this proposal, but, however, I gave him no room to perceive that; I told him I hoped he had considered well of it before he brought it so far as to offer it to me, and supposed that he had agreed that point so that I had no consent to give, but as she had almost four years of her time to serve.

He answered, "No," he paid such a regard to me that he would not so much as take one step in such a thing without my knowledge, and assured me he had not so much as mentioned it to her. I knew not what answer indeed to make to him, but at last I resolved to put it off from myself to her, because then I should have opportunity to talk with her beforehand; so I told him he was perfectly free to act in the matter as he thought fit; that I could not say either one thing or another to it, neither had I any right to meddle in it. As to serving out her time with me, that was a trifle, and not worth naming, but I hoped he would consider well every circumstance before he entered upon such an affair as that.

He told me he had fully considered it already, and that he was resolved, seeing I was not against it, to have her, whatever came of it, for he believed he should be the happiest man alive with her. Then he ran on in his character of her, how clever a woman she was in the management of all manner of business, what admirable conversation she had, what a wit, what a memory, what a vast share of knowledge, and the like; all which I knew to be the truth, and yet short of her just character too; for as she was all that formerly when she was mine, she was vastly improved in the school of affliction, and was all the bright part, with a vast addition of temper, prudence, judgment, and all that she formerly wanted.

I had not much patience, as you may well imagine, till I saw my honest housekeeper, to communicate this secret to her, and to see what course she would steer on so nice an occasion; but I was suddenly taken so ill with a cold, which held for two days, that I could not stir out of doors; and in this time the matter was all done and over, for my tutor had gone the same night and made his attack, but was coldly received at first, which very much surprised him, for he made no doubt to have her consent at first word; however, the next day he came again, and again the third day, when finding he was in earnest, and yet that she could not think of anything of that kind, she told him, in few words, that she thought herself greatly obliged to him for such a testimony of his respect to her, and should have embraced it willingly, as anybody would suppose one in her circumstances should do, but that she would not abuse him so much, for that she must acknowledge to him she was under obligations that prevented her, that was, in short, that she was a married woman, and had a husband alive.

This was so sincere, but so effectual an answer, that he could have no room to reply one word to it; but that he was very sorry, and that it was a very great affliction to him, and as great a disappointment as ever he met with.

The next day after he had received this repulse I came to the plantation-house, and, sending for the housekeeper, I began with her, and told her that I understood she would have a very advantageous proposal made to her, and that I would have her consider well of it, and then told her what my tutor had said to me.

She immediately fell a-crying, at which I seemed to wonder very much. "O! sir," says she, "how can you name such a thing to me?" I told her that I could name it the better to her, because I had been married myself since I parted from her. "Yes, sir," says she, "but the case alters; the crime being on my side, I ought not to marry; but," says she, "that is not the reason at all, but I cannot do it." I pretended to press her to it (though not sincerely, I must acknowledge, for my heart had turned toward her for some time, and I had fully forgiven her in my mind all her former conduct), but, I say, I seemed to press her to it, at which she burst out in a passion. "No, no," says she, "let me be your slave rather than the best man's wife in the world." I reasoned with her upon her circumstances, and how such a marriage would restore her to a state of ease and plenty, and none in the world might ever know or suspect who or what she had been, but she could not bear it; but with tears again raising her voice, that I was afraid she would be heard. "I beseech you," says she, "do not speak of it any more; I was once yours, and I will never belong to any man else in the world; let me be as I am, or anything else you please to make me, but not a wife to any man alive but yourself."

I was so moved with the passion she was in at speaking this, that I knew not what I said or did for some time; at length I said to her, "It is a great pity that you had not long ago been as sincere as you are now, it had been better for us both; however, as it is, you shall not be forced to anything against your mind, nor shall you be the worse treated for refusing; but how will you put him off? No doubt he expects you will receive his proposal as an advantage, and as he sees no further into your circumstances, so it is." "O! sir," says she, "I have done all that already; he has his answer, and is fully satisfied; he will never trouble you any more on that head;" and then she told me what answer she had given him.

From that minute I resolved that I would certainly take her again to be my wife as before; I thought she had fully made me amends for her former ill conduct, and she deserved to be forgiven; and so indeed she did, if ever woman did, considering also what dreadful penance she had undergone, and how long she had lived in misery and distress; and that providence had, as it were, cast her upon me again; and, above all, had given her such an affection to me, and so resolved a mind, that she could refuse so handsome an offer of deliverance, rather than be farther separated from me.

As I resolved this in my mind, so I thought it was cruel to conceal it any longer from her; nor, indeed, could I contain myself any longer, but I took her in my arms. "Well," says I, "you have given me such a testimony of affection in this, that I can no longer withstand; I forgive you all that ever was between us on this account; and since you will be nobody's but mine, you shall be mine again as you were at first."

But this was too much for her the other way, and now she was so far overcome with my yielding to her, that, had she not got vent to her passion by the most vehement crying, she must have died in my arms, and I was forced to let her go, and set her down a chair, where she cried for a quarter of an hour before she could speak a word.

When she was come to herself enough to talk again, I told her we must consider of a method how to bring this to pass; and that it must not be done by publishing there that she was my wife before, for that would expose us both, but that I would openly marry her again. This she agreed was very rational, and accordingly, about two months after, we were married again, and no man in the world ever enjoyed a better wife, or lived more happy than we both did for several years after.

And now I began to think my fortunes were settled for this world, and I had nothing before me but to finish a life of infinite variety, such as mine had been, with a comfortable retreat, being both made wiser by our sufferings and difficulties, and able to judge for ourselves what kind of life would be best adapted to our present circumstances, and what station we might look upon ourselves to be most completely happy.

But man is a short-sighted creature at best, and in nothing more than in that of fixing his own felicity, or, as we may say, choosing for himself. One would have thought, and so my wife often suggested to me, that the state of life that I was now in was as perfectly calculated to make a man completely happy as any private station in the world could be. We had an estate more than sufficient, and daily increasing, for the supporting any state or figure that in that place we could propose to ourselves, or even desire to live in. We had everything that was pleasant and agreeable, without the least mortification in any circumstances of it; every sweet thing, and nothing to embitter it; every good, and no mixture of evil with it; nor any gap open where we could have the least apprehensions of any evil breaking out upon us; nor indeed was it easy for either of us, in our phlegmatic melancholy notions, to have the least imagination how anything disastrous could happen to us in the common course of things, unless something should befall us out of the ordinary way of providence, or of its acting in the world.

But an unseen mine blew up all this apparent tranquillity at once; and, though it did not remove my affairs there from me, yet it effectually removed me from them, and sent me a wandering into the world again; a condition full of hazards, and always attended with circumstances dangerous to mankind, while he is left to choose his own fortunes, and be guided by his own short-sighted measures.

I must now return to a circumstance of my history which had been past for some time, and which relates to my conduct while I was last in England.

I mentioned how my faithful wife Moggy, with her tears and her entreaties, had prevailed with me not to play the madman, and openly join in the rebellion with the late Lord Derwentwater and his party when they entered Lancashire, and thereby, as I may say, saved my life. But my curiosity prevailed so much at last, that I gave her the slip when they came to Preston, and at least thought I would go and look at them, and see what they were likely to come to.

My former wife's importunities, as above, had indeed prevailed upon me from publicly embarking in that enterprise, and joining openly with them in arms; and by this, as I have observed, she saved my life to be sure, because, had I then publicly espoused the rebellion, and had been known to have been among them, which might have been as fatal to me afterwards, though I had not been taken in the action as if I had.

But when they advanced and came nearer to us to Preston, and there appeared a greater spirit among the people in their favour, my old doctor, who I mentioned before, who was a Romish priest, and had married us, inspired me with new zeal, and gave me no rest till he obliged me, with only a good horse and arms, to join them the day before they entered Preston, he himself venturing in the same posture with me.

I was not so public here as to be very well known, at least by any one that had knowledge of me in the country where I lived; and this was indeed my safety afterward, as you will soon hear; but yet I was known, too, among the men, especially among the Scots, with some of whom I had been acquainted in foreign service; with these I was soon particularly conversant, and passed for a French officer. I talked to them of making a select detachment to defend the pass between Preston and the river and bridge, upon maintaining which, as I insisted, depended the safety of the whole party.

It was with some warmth that I spoke of that affair, and as I passed among them, I say, for a French officer and a man of experience, it caused several debates among them; but the hint was not followed, as is well known, and from that moment I gave them all up as lost, and meditated nothing but how to escape from them, which I effected the night before they were surrounded by the royal cavalry: I did not do this without great difficulty, swimming the river Ribble at a place where, though I got well over, yet I could not for a long while get to a place where my horse could land himself, that is to say, where the ground was firm enough for him to take the land; however, at length I got on shore, and riding very hard, came the next evening in sight of my own dwelling; here, after lying by in a wood till the depth of night, I shut my horse in a little kind of a gravel-pit or marl-pit, where I soon covered him with earth for the present, and marching all alone, I came about two in the morning to my house, where my wife, surprised with joy and yet terribly frightened, let me in, and then I took immediate measures to secure myself upon whatever incident might happen, but which, as things were ordered, I had no need to make use of; for the rebels being entirely defeated, and either all killed or taken prisoners, I was not known by anybody in the country to have been among them, no, nor so much as suspected; and thus I made a narrow escape from the most dangerous action, and most foolishly embarked in, of any that I had ever been engaged in before.

It was very lucky for me that I killed and buried my horse, for he would have been taken two days after, and would, to be sure, have been known by those who had seen me upon him at Preston; but now, as none knew I had been abroad, nor any such circumstance could discover me, I kept close, and as my excursion had been short, and I had not been missed by any of my neighbours, if anybody came to speak with me, behold I was at home.

However, I was not thoroughly easy in my mind, and secretly wished I was in my own dominions in Virginia, to which, in a little time, other circumstances occurring, I made preparations to remove with my whole family.

In the meantime, as above, the action at Preston happened, and the miserable people surrendered to the king's troops; some were executed for examples, as in such cases is usual, and the government extending mercy to the multitude, they were kept in Chester castle and other places a considerable time, till they were disposed of, some one way, some another, as we shall hear.

Several hundreds of them, after this, were at their own request transported, as it is vulgarly expressed, to the plantations, that is to say, sent to Virginia and other British colonies, to be sold after the usual manner of condemned criminals, or, as we call them there, convicts, to serve a limited time in the country, and then be made freemen again; some of these I have spoken of above; but now, to my no little uneasiness, I found, after I had been there some time, two ships arrived with more of these people in the same river where all my plantations lay.

I no sooner heard of it, but the first step I took was, to resolve to let none of them be bought into my work or to any of my plantations; and this I did, pretending that I would not make slaves every day of unfortunate gentlemen, who fell into that condition for their zeal to their party only, and the like: but the true reason was, that I expected several of them would know me, and might perhaps betray me, and make it public that I was one of the same sort, but had made my escape, and so I might be brought into trouble, and if I came off with my life, might have all my effects seized on, and be reduced to misery and poverty again at once, all which I thought I had done enough to deserve.

This was a just caution; but, as I found quickly, was not a sufficient one, as my circumstances stood for my safety; for though I bought none of these poor men myself, yet several of my neighbours did, and there was scarce a plantation near me but had some of them, more or less, among them; so that, in a word, I could not peep abroad hardly, but I was in danger to be seen, and known too, by some or other of them.

I may be allowed to say, that this was a very uneasy life to me, and such that, in short, I found myself utterly unable to bear; for I was now reduced from a great man, a magistrate, a governor, or master of three plantations, and having three or four hundred servants at my command, to be a poor, self-condemned rebel, and durst not show my face: and that I might with the same safety, or rather more, have skulked about in Lancashire where I was, or gone up to London, and concealed myself there till things had been over; but now the danger was come home to me, even to my door, and I expected nothing but to be informed against every day, be taken up, and sent to England in irons, and have all my plantations seized on as a forfeited estate to the crown.

I had but one hope of safety to trust to, and that was, that having been so little a while among them, done nothing for them, and passing for a stranger, they never knew my name, but only I was called the French colonel, or the French officer, or the French gentleman, by most, if not by all, the people there; and as for the doctor that went with me, he had found means to escape too, though not the same way that I did, finding the cause not likely to be supported, and that the king's troops were gathering on all sides around them like a cloud.

But to return to myself; this was no satisfaction to me, and what to do I really knew not, for I was more at a loss how to shift in such a distressed case as this, now it lay so close to me, than ever I was in any difficulty in my life: the first thing I did was to come home, and make a confidence of the whole affair to my wife; and though I did it generously without conditions, yet I did not do it without first telling her how I was now going to put my life into her hands, that she might have it in her power to pay me home for all that she might think had been hard in my former usage of her ; and that, in short, it would be in her power to deliver me up into the hands of my enemies, but that I would trust her generosity as well as her renewed affection, and put all upon her fidelity, and, without any more precaution, I opened the whole thing to her, and particularly the danger I was now in.

A faithful counsellor is life from the dead, gives courage where the heart is sinking, and raises the mind to a proper use of means ; and such she was to me, indeed, upon every step of this affair, and it was by her direction that I took every step that followed for the extricating myself out of this labyrinth.

"Come, come, my dear," says she, "if this be all, there is no room for any such disconsolate doings as your fears run you upon ;" for I was immediately for selling off my plantations and all my stock, and embarking myself forthwith, and to get to Madeiras, or to any place out of the king's dominions.

But my wife was quite of another opinion, and encouraging me on another account, proposed two things, either my freighting a sloop with provisions to the West Indies, and so taking passage from thence to London, or letting her go away directly for England, and endeavour to obtain the king's pardon, whatever it might cost.

I inclined to the last proposal ; for though I was unhappily prejudiced in favour of a wrong interest, yet I had always a secret and right notion of the clemency and merciful disposition of his majesty, and, had I been in England, should, I believe, have been easily persuaded to have thrown myself at his feet.

But going to England as I was circumstanced must have been a public action, and I must have made all the usual preparations for it, must have appeared in public, have stayed till the crop was ready, and gone away in form and state as usual, or have acted as if something extraordinary was the matter, and have filled the heads of the people there with innumerable suggestions of they knew not what.

But my wife made all this easy to me from her own invention ; for, without acquainting me of anything she comes merrily to me one morning before I was up : "My dear," says she, "I am very sorry to hear that you are not very well this morning. I have ordered Pennico (that was a young negro girl which I had given her) to make you a fire in your chamber, and pray lie still where you are a while till it is done ;" at the same instant the little negro came in with the wood and a pair of bellows, &c., to kindle the fire, and my wife not giving me time to reply, whispers close to my ear to lie still and say nothing till she came up again to me.

I was thoroughly frightened, that you may be sure of, and thought of nothing but of being discovered, betrayed, and carried to England, hanged, quartered, and all that was terrible, and my very heart sunk within me ; she perceived my disorder and turned back, assuring me there was no harm, desired me to be easy and she would come back again presently and give me satisfaction in every particular that I could desire ; so I composed myself as well as I could, but it was but a little while that I could bear it, and I sent Pen- nico down stairs to find out her mistress, and tell her I was very ill, and must speak with her immediately, and the girl was scarce out of the room before I jumped out of bed and began to dress me, that I might be ready for all events.

My wife was as good as her word, and was coming up as the girl was going down. "I see," says she, "you want patience, but pray do not want government of yourself, but take that screen before your face, and go to the window and see if you know any of those Scotchmen that are in the yard, for there are seven or eight of them come about some business to your clerk."

I went and looked through the screen, and saw the faces of them all distinctly, but could make nothing of them, other than that they were Scotchmen, which was easy to discern ; however, it was no satisfaction to me that I knew not their faces, for they might know mine for all that, according to the old English proverb, "that more knows Toni Fool than Tom Fool knows ;" so I kept close in my chamber till I understood they were all gone.

After this my wife caused it to be given out in the house that I was not well, and when this not being well had lasted three or four days I had my leg wrapped up in a great piece of flannel and laid upon a stool, and there I was lame of the gout : and this served for about six weeks, when my wife told me she had given it out that my gout was rather rheumatic than a settled gout, and that I was resolved to take one of my own sloops and go to Nevis or Antigua, and use the hot baths there for my cure.

All this was very well, and I approved my wife's contrivance as admirably good, both to keep me within doors eight or ten weeks at first, and to convey me away afterwards without any extraordinary bustle to be made about it ; but still I did not know what it all tended to, and what the design of it all was, but my wife desired me to leave that to her, so I really did, and she carried it all on with a prudence not to be disputed ; and after she had wrapt my legs in flannel almost three months, she came and told me the sloop was ready and all the goods put on board. "And now, my dear," says she, "I come to tell you all the rest of my design ; for," added she, "I hope you will not think I am going to kidnap you and transport you from Virginia as other people are transported to it, or that I am going to get you sent away and leave myself in possession of your estate ; but you shall find me the same faithful creature which I should have been if I had been still your slave, and not had any hopes of being your wife, and that in all my scheme which I have laid for your safety in this new exigence, I have not proposed your going one step but where I shall go, and be always with you to assist and serve you on all occasions, and to take my portion with you of what kind soever our lot may be."

This was so generous and so handsome a declaration of her fidelity, and so great a token too of the goodness of her judgment in considering of the things which were before her, and of what my present circumstances called for, that from that time forward I gave myself cheerfully up to her management, without any hesitation in the least, and, after about ten days' preparation, we embarked in a large sloop of my own of about sixty tons.

I should have mentioned here that I had still my faithful tutor (as I called him) at the head of my affairs; and, as he knew whom to correspond with, and how to manage the correspondence in England, we left all that part to him as I had done before, and I did this with a full satisfaction in his ability as well as in his integrity: it is true he had been a little chagrined in that affair of my wife, who, as I hinted before, had married me after telling him, in answer to his solicitations, that she had a husband alive.

Now, though this was literally true, yet, as it was a secret not fit to be opened to him, I was obliged to put him off with other reasons as well as I could, perhaps not much to the purpose, and perhaps not much to his satisfaction, so that I reckoned he looked on himself as not very kindly used several ways.

But he began to get over it and to be easy, especially at our going away, when he found that the trust of everything was still left in his hands as it was before.

When my wife had thus communicated every thing of the voyage to me, and we began to be ready to go off, she came to me one morning, and, with her usual cheerfulness, told me she now came to tell me the rest of her measures for the completing my deliverance; and this was, that while we made this trip, as she called it, to the hot springs at Nevis, she would write to a particular friend at London, whom she could depend upon, to try to get a pardon for a person on account of the late rebellion, with all the circumstances which my case was attended with: viz., of having acted nothing among them, but being three days in the place; and, while we were thus absent, she did not question but to have an answer, which she would direct to come so many ways that we would be sure to have the first of it as soon as it was possible the vessels could go and come; and in the meantime the expense should be very small, for she would have an answer to the grand question first, whether it could be obtained or no, and then an account of the expense of it, so that I might judge for myself whether I would part with the needful sum or no, before any money was disbursed on my account.

I could not but be thoroughly satisfied with her contrivance in this particular, and I had nothing to add to it but that I would not have her limit her friend so strictly, but that, if he saw the way clear, and that he was sure to obtain it, he should go through with it, if within the expense of two, or three, or four hundred pounds, and that, upon advice of its being practicable, he should have bills payable by such a person on delivery of the warrant for the thing.

To fortify this I enclosed in her packet a letter to one of my correspondents, whom I could particularly trust, with a credit for the money on such and such conditions; but the honesty and integrity of my wife's correspondence was such as prevented all the expense, and yet I had the wished-for security as if it had been all paid, as you shall hear presently.

All these things being fixed to our minds, and all things left behind in good posture of settlement as usual, we embarked together and put to sea, having the opportunity of an English man-of-war being on the coast in pursuit of the pirates, and who was just then standing away towards the Gulf of Florida, and told us he would see us safe as far as New Providence or the Bahama Islands.

CHAPTER XVIII.

WE ARE CHASED BY A BRIGANTINE AND SLOOP, PRIVATEERS—DURING THE CHASE THEY DISCOVER AN ENGLISH MAN-OF-WAR, AND SHEER OFF—ARRIVE SAFE AT ANTIGUA—MY WIFE RETURNS TO VIRGINIA IN THE SLOOP, TO WAIT NEWS FROM ENGLAND—THE VESSEL RETURNS GUTTED OF ITS CARGO BY PIRATES, BUT WITH NEWS OF MY DELIVERANCE—TRANSACTIONS ON MY VOYAGE TO VIRGINIA.

AND now having fair weather and a pleasant voyage, and my flannels taken off my legs, I must hint a little what cargo I had with me; for, as my circumstances were very good in that country, so I did not go such a voyage as this, and with a particular reserve of fortunes whatever might afterward happen, without a sufficient cargo for our support, and whatever exigence might happen.

Our sloop, as I said, was of about 60 or 70 tons; and as tobacco, which is the general produce of the country, was no merchandise at Nevis, that is to say, for a great quantity, so we carried very little, but loaded the sloop with corn, pease, meal, and some barrels of pork, and an excellent cargo it was, most of it being the produce of my own plantation; we took also a considerable sum of money with us in Spanish gold, which was, as above, not for trade, but for all events: I also ordered another sloop to be hired, and to be sent after me, laden with the same goods, as soon as they should have advice from me that I was safe arrived.

We came to the latitude of the island of Antigua, which was very near to that of Nevis, whither we intended to go on the eighteenth day after our passing the Capes of Virginia, but had no sight of the island; only our master said he was sure, if he stood the same course as he then was, and the gale held, I say he told me he was sure he should make the island in less than five hours' sail; so he stood on fair for the islands: however, his account had failed him, for we held on all the evening, made no land, and likewise all night, when, in the grey of the morning, we discovered, from the top-mast head, a brigantine and a sloop making sail after us, at the distance of about six leagues, fair weather, and the wind fresh at S. E.

Our master soon understood what they were, and came down into the cabin to me, to let me know it; I was much surprised, you may be sure, at the danger, but my poor wife took from me all the concern for myself to take care of her, for she was frightened to that degree that I thought we should not have been able to keep life in her.

While we were thus under the first hurry and surprise of the thing, suddenly another noise from the deck called us up to look out, and that was, land! land! The master and I (for by this time I had gotten out of my cabin) ran upon the deck, and there we saw the state of our case very plain; the two rogues that stood after us laid on all the canvass they could carry, and crowded after us amain; but at the distance, as I have said, of about six leagues, rather more than less; on the other hand, the land discovered lay about nine leagues right a-head; so that if the pirates could gain on us, so as to sail three feet for our two, it was evident they would be up with us before we could make the island; if not, we should escape them and get in; but even then we had no great hope to do any more than to run the ship ashore to save our lives; and so, stranding our vessel, spoil both sloop and cargo.

When we were making this calculation, our master came in cheerfully, and told me he had crowded on more sail, and found the sloop carried it very well, and that he did not find the rogues gained much upon us, and that especially, if one of them did not, that was the sloop, he found he could go away from the brigantine as he pleased. Thus we gave them what they call a stern chase, and they worked hard to come up with us till towards noon, when on a sudden they both stood away and gave us over, to our great satisfaction, you may be sure.

We did not, it seems, so easily see the occasion of our deliverance as the pirate did; for while we went spooning away large with the wind for one of the islands, with those two spurs in our heels, that is, with the two thieves at our sterns, there lay an English man-of-war in the road of Nevis, which was the same island from whence they espied the pirates, but the land lying between, we could not see them.

As the man-of-war discovered them, she immediately slipped her cable, and put herself under sail in chase of the rogues, and they as soon perceived her; and, being windward, put themselves upon a wind to escape her; and thus we were delivered, and in half an hour more we knew who was our deliverer, seeing the man of war stretch a-head clear of the island, and stand directly after the pirates, who now crowded from us as fast as they crowded after us before, and thus we got safe into Antigua, after the terrible apprehension we had been in of being taken; our apprehensions of being taken now were much more than they would have been on board a laden ship from or to London, where the most they ordinarily do is to rifle the ship, take what is valuable and portable, and let her go; but ours being but a sloop, and all our loading being good provisions, such as they wanted, to be sure, for their ship's store, they would certainly have carried us away, ship and all, taken out the cargo and the men, and, perhaps, have set the sloop on fire; so that, as to our cargo of gold, it had been inevitably lost, and we hurried away, nobody knows where, and used as such barbarous fellows are wont to use such innocent people as fall into their hands.

But we were now out of their hands, and had the satisfaction, a few days after, to hear that the man-of-war pursued them so close, notwithstanding they changed their course in the night, that the next day they were obliged to separate, and shift for themselves; so the man-of-war took one of them, namely, the brigantine, and carried her into Jamaica; but the other, viz. the sloop, made her escape.

Being arrived here, we presently disposed of our cargo, and at a tolerably good price; and now the question was, what I should do next? I looked upon myself to be safe here from the fears I had been under of being discovered as a rebel, and so indeed I was; but having been now absent five months, and having sent the ship back with a cargo of rum and molasses, which I knew was wanting in my plantations, I received the same vessel back in return, laden, as at first, with provisions.

With this cargo my wife received a packet from London, from the person whom she had employed (as above) to solicit a pardon, who very honestly wrote to her, that he would not be so unjust to her friend, whoever he was, as to put him to any expense for a private solicitation; for that he was very well assured that his majesty had resolved, from his own native disposition to acts of clemency and mercy to his subjects, to grant a general pardon, with some few exceptions to persons extraordinary, and he hoped her friend was none of the extraordinary persons to be excepted.

This was a kind of life from the dead to us both, and it was resolved that my wife should go back in the sloop directly to Virginia, where she should wait the good news from England, and should send me an account of it as soon as she received it.

Accordingly, she went back, and came safe with the sloop and cargo to our plantation, from whence, after above four months' expectation, behold the sloop came to me again, but empty, and gutted of all her cargo, except about 100 sacks of unground malt which the pirates (not knowing how to brew) knew not what to do with, and so had left in her. However, to my infinite satisfaction, there was a packet of letters from my wife, with another to her from England, as well one from her friend, as one from my own correspondent; both of them intimating that the king had signed an act of grace, that is to say, a general free pardon, and sent me copies of the act, wherein it was manifest I was fully included.

And here let me hint, that, having now, as it were, received my life at the hands of King George, and in a manner so satisfying as it was to me, it made a generous convert of me, and I became sincerely given to the interest of King George; and this from a principle of gratitude, and a sense of my obligation to his majesty for my life; and it has continued ever since, and will certainly remain with me as long as any sense of honour, and of the debt of gratitude, remains with me. I mention this to hint how far, in such cases, justice and duty to ourselves commands us; namely, that to those who graciously give us our lives when it is in their power to take them away, those lives are a debt ever after, and ought to be set apart for their service and interest as long as any of the powers of life remain; for gratitude is a debt that never ceases while the benefit received remains; and if my prince has given me my life, I can never pay the debt fully, unless such a circumstance as this should happen—that the prince's life should be in my power, and I as generously preserved it ; and yet, neither would the obligation be paid then, because the cases would differ ; thus, that my preserving the life of my prince was my natural duty, whereas the prince on his side (my life being forfeited to him) had no motive but mere clemency and beneficence.

Perhaps this principle may not please all that read it ; but, as I have resolved to guide my actions in things of such a nature by the rules of strict virtue and principles of honour, so I must lay it down as a rule of honour that a man having once forfeited his life to the justice of his prince and to the laws of his country, and receiving it back as a bounty from the grace of his sovereign, such a man can never lift up his hand again against that prince without a forfeiture of his virtue, and an irreparable breach of his honour and duty, and deserves no pardon after it, either from God or man. But all this is a digression ; I leave it as a sketch of the laws of honour, imprinted by the laws of nature in the breast of a soldier, or a man of honour, and which, I believe, all impartial persons, who understand what honour means, will subscribe to.

But I return now to my present circumstances ; my wife was gone, and, with her, all my good fortune and success in business seemed to have forsaken me ; and I had another scene of misery to go through after I had thought that all my misfortunes were over and at an end.

My sloop, as I have told you, arrived, but having met with a pirate rogue in the Gulf of Florida, they took her first, then, finding her cargo to be all eatables, which they always want, they gutted her of all her loading except (as I have said) about 100 sacks of malt, which they really knew not what to do with ; and, which was still worse, they took all the men, except the master and two boys, whom they left on board, just to run the vessel into Antigua, where they said they were bound.

But the most valuable part of my cargo, viz. a packet of letters from England, those they left, to my inexpressible comfort and satisfaction ; and particularly that by those I saw my way open to return to my wife and to my plantations, from which I promised myself never to wander any more.

In order to this, I now embarked myself, and all my effects, on board the sloop, resolving to sail directly to the capes of Virginia. My captain, beating it up to reach the Bahama channel, had not been two days at sea, but we were overtaken with a violent storm, which drove us so far upon the coast of Florida, as that we twice struck upon the shore, and had we struck a third time, we had been inevitably lost. A day or two after that, the storm abating a little, we kept the sea, but found the wind blowing so strong against our passing the gulf, and the sea going so high, we could not hold it any longer ; so we were forced to bear away, and make what shift we could ; in which distress, the fifth day after, we made land, but found it to be Cape —, the north-west part of the isle of Cuba. Here we found ourselves under a necessity to run in under the land for shelter, though we had not come to an anchor, so we had not touched the King of Spain's territories at all. However, in the morning, we were surrounded with five Spanish barks or boats, such as they call barcos longos, full of men ; who instantly boarded us, took us, and carried us into the Havannah, the most considerable port belonging to the Spaniards in that part of the world.

Here the sloop was immediately seized, and in consequence plundered, as any one that knows the Spaniards, especially in that country, will easily guess. Our men were made prisoners, and sent to the common gaol ; and as for myself and the captain, we were carried before the Alcaide Mayor, or intendant of the place, as criminals.

I spoke Spanish very well, having served under the King of Spain in Italy, and it stood me in good stead at this time ; for I so effectually argued the injustice of their treatment of me, that the governor, or whatever I ought to call him, frankly owned they ought not to have stopped me, seeing I was in the open sea, pursuing my voyage, and offering no offence to anybody, and had not landed, or offered to land, upon any part of his Catholic majesty's dominions, till I was brought as a prisoner.

It was a great favour that I could obtain thus much ; but I found it easier to obtain an acknowledgment that I had received wrong, than to get any satisfaction for that wrong, and much less was there any hope or prospect of restitution. And I was let know, that I was to wait till an account could be sent to the viceroy of Mexico, and orders could be received back from him how to act in the affair.

I could easily foresee what all this tended to, namely, to a confiscation of the ship and goods by the ordinary process at the place ; and that my being left to the decision of the viceroy of Mexico was but a pretended representation of things to him from the corregidor, or judge of the place.

However, I had no remedy but the old insignificant thing called patience ; and this I was better furnished with, because I did not so much value the loss as I made them believe I did ; my greatest apprehensions were, that they would detain me, and keep me as a prisoner for life, and perhaps send me to their mines in Peru, as they have done many, and pretended to do to all that come on shore in their dominions, how great soever the distresses may have been which have brought them thither, and which have been the reason why others, who have been forced on shore, have committed all manner of violence upon the Spaniards in their turn ; resolving, however dear they sold their lives, not to fall into their hands.

But I got better quarter among them than that too, which was (as I have said) much of it owing to my speaking Spanish, and to my telling them how I had fought on so many occasions in the quarrel of his Catholic majesty in Italy ; and, by great good chance, I had the King of France's commission for lieutenant-colonel in the Irish brigade in my pocket, where it was mentioned that the said brigade was then serving in the armies of France, under the orders of his Catholic majesty in Italy.

I failed not to talk up the gallantry and personal bravery of his Catholic majesty on all occasions, and particularly in many battles where

(by the way) his majesty had never been at all, and in some where I had never been myself; but I found I talked to people who knew nothing of the matter, and so anything went down with them, if it did but praise the King of Spain, and talk big of the Spanish cavalry, of which, God knows, there was not one regiment in the army, at least while I was there.

However, this way of managing myself obtained me the liberty of the place, upon my parole that I would not attempt an escape; and I obtained also, which was a great favour, to have 200 pieces of eight allowed me out of the sale of my cargo, for subsistence, till I could negotiate my affairs at Mexico; as for my men, they were maintained as prisoners at the public charge.

Well, after several months' solicitation and attendance, all I could obtain was, the satisfaction of seeing my ship and cargo confiscated, and my poor sailors in a fair way to be sent to the mines. The last I begged off, upon condition of paying 300 pieces of eight for their ransom, and having them set on shore at Antigua, and myself to remain hostage for the payment of the said 300 pieces of eight, and for 200 pieces of eight, which I had already had, and for 500 pieces of eight more for my own ransom, if, upon a return from Mexico, the sentence of confiscation, as above, should be confirmed by the viceroy.

These were hard articles indeed, but I was forced to submit to them: nor, as my circumstances were above all such matters as these as to substance, did I lay it much to heart; the greatest difficulty that lay in my way was, that I knew not how to correspond with my friends in any part of the world, or which way to supply myself with necessaries, or with money for the payment I had agreed to: the Spaniards being so tenacious of their ports, that they allowed nobody to come on shore, or indeed near the shore, from any part of the world, upon pain of seizure and confiscation, as had been my case already.

Upon this difficulty I began to reason with the corregidor, and tell him that he put things upon us that were impossible, and that were inconsistent with the customs of nations; that if a man was a prisoner at Algiers, they would allow him to write to his friends to pay his ransom, and would admit the person that brought it to come and go free, as a public person; and if they did not, no treaty could be carried on for the ransom of a slave, nor the conditions be performed when they are agreed upon.

I brought it then down to my own case, and desired to know, upon supposition that I might, within the time limited in that agreement, have the sums of money ready for the ransom of my men and of myself, how I should obtain to have notice given me of it, or how it should be brought, seeing the very persons bringing that notice, or afterwards presuming to bring the money, might be liable to be seized and confiscated as I had been, and the money itself be taken as a second prize, without redeeming the first.

Though this was so reasonable a request, that it could not be withstood in point of argument, yet the Spaniard shrunk his head into his shoulders, and said, they had not power sufficient to act in such a case; that the king's laws were so severe against the suffering any strangers to set their foot on his Catholic majesty's dominions in America, and they could not dispense with the least tittle of them without a particular assiento (as they called it) from the consulado, or chamber of commerce, at Seville, or a command under the hand and seal of the viceroy of Mexico.

"How! Seignior Corregidor," said I, with some warmth, and, as it were, with astonishment, "have you not authority enough to sign a passport for an agent, or ambassador, to come on shore here, from any of the King of Great Britain's governors in these parts, under a white flag, or flag of truce, to speak with the governor of this place, or with any other person in the king's name, on the subject of such business as the governor may have to communicate? Why," said I, "if you cannot do that, you cannot act according to the law of nations."

He shook his head, but still said, no, he could not do even so much as that; but here one of the military governors put in and opposed him, and they two differed warmly; the first insisting that their orders were deficient in that particular; but the other said, that, as they were bound up to them, it could not be in their power to act otherwise, and that they were answerable for the ill consequences.

"Well then," says the governor to the corregidor, "now you have kept this Englishman as hostage for the ransom of the men that you have dismissed, suppose he tells you the money is ready, either at such, or such, or such a place, how shall he bring it hither? You will take all the people prisoners that offer to bring it; what must he do? If you say you will send and fetch it, what security shall he have that he shall have his liberty when it is paid you? And why should he trust you so far as to pay the money, and yet remain here a prisoner?"

This carried so much reason with it, that the corregidor knew not what to say, but that so was the law, and he could act no otherwise but by the very letter of it; and here each was so positive, that nothing could determine it but another express to be sent to the viceroy of Mexico.

Upon this, the governor was so kind as to say he would get me a passport for anybody that should bring the money, and any vessel they were in, by his own authority, and for their safe returning, and taking me with them, provided I would answer for it, that they should bring no European, or other goods whatever with them, and should not set foot on shore without his express permission, and provided he did not receive orders to the contrary in the meantime from any superior hand; and that even, in such a case, they should have liberty to go back freely from whence they came, under the protection of a white flag.

I bowed very respectfully to the governor in token of my acknowledging his justice, and then presented my humble petition to him, that he would allow my men to take their own sloop; that it should be rated at a certain value, and would be obliged they should bring specie on board with them, and that they should either pay it for the sloop, or leave the sloop again.

Then he inquired to what country I would send them for so much money, and if I could assure him of the payment; and, when he understood it was no farther than to Virginia, he seemed very easy; and, to satisfy the corregidor, who still stood off, adhering, with a true Spanish stiffness, to the letter of the law, the said governor calls out to me: "Seignior," says he, "I shall make all this matter easy to you if you agree to my proposal; your men shall have the sloop on condition you shall be my hostage for her return; but they shall not take her as your sloop, though she shall in the effect be yours on the payment of the money; but you shall take two of my men on board with you upon your parole for their safe return, and when she returns she shall carry his Catholic majesty's colours, and be entered as one of the sloops belonging to the Havannah; one of the Spaniards to be commander, and to be called by such a name as he shall appoint.

This the corregidor came into immediately, and said this was within the letter of the king's commanderie, or precept, upon condition, however, that she should bring no European goods on board. I desired it might be put in other words; namely, that she should bring no European goods on shore. It cost two days' debate between these two, whether it should pass, that no European goods should be brought in the ship, or brought on shore; but having found means to intimate that I meant not to trade there, but would not be tied from bringing a small present to a certain person, in acknowledgment of favours; I say, after I had found room to place such a hint right, where it should be placed, I found it was all made easy to me, and it was all agreed presently that, after the ransom was paid, and the ship also bought, it was but reasonable that I should have liberty to trade to any other country, not in the dominions of the king of Spain, so to make up my losses; and that it would be hard to oblige my men to bring away the vessel light, and so lose the voyage, and add so much to our former misfortunes; that so long as no goods were brought on shore in the country belonging to his Catholic majesty's dominions, which was all that they had to defend, the rest was no business of theirs.

Now I began to see my way through this unhappy business, and to find that, as money would bring me out of it, so money would bring it to turn to a good account another way; wherefore I sent the sloop away under Spanish colours, and called her the Nuestra Signiora de la Val de Grace, commanded by Signior Giraldo de Nesma, one of the two Spaniards.

With the sloop I sent letters to my wife, and to my chief manager, with orders to load her back. I there directed, viz., that she should have 200 barrels of flour, 50 barrels of pease, and to answer my other views, I ordered 100 bales to be made up of all sorts of European goods, such as not my own warehouses only would supply, but such as they could be supplied with in other warehouses, where I knew they had credit for anything.

In this cargo I directed all the richest and most valuable English goods they had, or could get, whether linen, woollen, or silk, to be made up; the coarser things, such as we use in Virginia for clothing of servants, such I ordered to be left behind, for the use of the plantation. In less than seven weeks time the sloop returned, and I, that failed not every day to look out for her on the strand, was the first that spied her at a distance,

When she returned, she came into the road with her Spanish ancient flying, and came to an anchor, as directed; but I, that had seen her some hours before, went directly to the governor, and gave him an account of her being come, and fain I would have obtained the favour to have his excellency (as I called him) go on board in person, that he might see how well his orders were executed; but he declined that, saying, he could not justify going off the island, which was, in short, to go out of his command of the fort, which he could not re-assume without a new commission from the king's own hand.

Then I asked leave to go on board myself, which he granted me, and I brought on shore with me the full sum in gold, which I had conditioned to pay for the ransom, both of my men and myself, and for the purchase of the sloop; and as I obtained leave to land in a different place, so my governor sent his son with six soldiers to receive and convey me with the money to the castle, where he commanded, and therein to his own house. I had made up the money in heavy parcels, as if it had been all silver, and gave it to two of my men, who belonged to the sloop, with orders to them that they should make it seem, by their carrying it, to be much heavier than it was; this was done to conceal three parcels of goods, which I had packed up with the money, to make a present to the governor, as I intended.

When the money was carried in and laid down on the table, the governor ordered my men to withdraw, and I gave the soldiers each of them a piece of eight to drink, for which they were very thankful, and the governor seemed very well pleased with it also. Then I asked him, pleasantly, if he would please to receive the money: he said, no; he would not receive it but in the presence of the corregidor and the other people concerned. Then I begged his excellency (as I called him) to give me leave to open the parcels in his presence, for that I would do myself the honour to acknowledge his favours in the best manner I could.

He told me, no; he could not see anything be brought on shore but the money; but if I had brought anything on shore for my own use, he would not be so strict as to inquire into that, so I might do what I pleased myself.

Upon that I went into the place, shut myself in, and having opened all the things, and placed them to my mind—there were five little parcels, as follows:—

- 1, 2. A piece of twenty yards fine English broadcloth, five yards of black, five yards of crimson, in one parcel; and the rest of fine mixtures in another parcel.
3. A piece of thirty ells of fine Holland linen.
4. A piece of eighteen yards of fine English brocaded silk.
5. A piece of black Colchester baize.

After I had placed these by themselves, I found means, with some seeming difficulties, and much grimace, to bring him to know that this was intended for a present to himself. After all that part was over, and he had seemed to accept them, he signified, after walking a hundred turns and more in the room by them, by throwing his hat, which was under his arm, upon them, and making a very stiff bow; I say, after this he seemed to take his leave of me for awhile, and I waited in an outer room; when I was called in again, I found that he had looked over all the particulars, and caused them to be removed out of the place.

But when I came again, I found him quite another man; he thanked me for my present; told me it was a present fit to be given to a viceroy of Mexico, rather than to a mere governor of the fort; that he had done me no services suitable to such a return, but that he would see if he could not oblige me farther before I left the place.

After our compliments were over, I obtained leave to have the corregidor sent for, who accordingly came, and in his presence the money stipulated for the ransom of the ship, and of the men, was paid.

But here the corregidor showed that he would be as severely just on my side as on theirs, for he would not admit the money as a ransom for us as prisoners, but as a deposit for so much as we were to be ransomed for, if the sentence of our being made prisoners should be confirmed.

And then the governor and corregidor, joining together, sent a representation of the whole affair, at least we were told so, to the viceroy of Mexico; and it was privately hinted to me that I would do well to stay for the return of the aviso, that is, a boat which they send over the bay to Vera Cruz, with an express to Mexico, whose return is generally performed in two months.

I was not unwilling to stay, having secret hints given me that I should find some way to go with my sloop towards Vera Cruz myself, where I might have an occasion to trade privately for the cargo which I had on board; but it came about a nearer way—for, about two days after this money being deposited (as above), the governor's son invited himself on board my sloop, where I told him I would be very glad to see him, and whither, at the same time, he brought with him three considerable merchants, Spaniards, two of them not inhabitants of the place.

When they were on board, they were very merry and pleasant, and I treated them so much to their satisfaction that, in short, they were not well able to go on shore for that night, but were content to take a nap on some carpets, which I caused to be spread for them; and that the governor's son might think himself well used, I brought him a very good silk night-gown, with a crimson velvet night-cap, to lie down in, and in the morning desired him to accept of them for his use, which he took very kindly.

During that merry evening one of the merchants, not so touched with drink as the young gentleman, nor so as not to mind what it was he came about, takes an occasion to withdraw out of the great cabin, and enter into a parley with the master of the sloop, in order to trade for what European goods we had on board. The master took the hint, and gave me notice of what had passed, and I gave him instructions what to say, and what to do; according to which instructions they made but few words, bought the goods for about 5,000 pieces of eight, and carried them away themselves, and at their own hazards.

This was very agreeable to me, for now I began to see I should lick myself whole by the sale of this cargo, and should make myself full amends of Jack Spaniard for all the injuries he had done me in the first of these things; with this view I gave my master, or captain of the sloop, instructions for sale of all the rest of the goods, and left him to manage by himself, which he did so well that he sold the whole cargo the next day to the three Spaniards, with this additional circumstance, that they desired the sloop might carry the goods, as they were on board, to such part of the terra firma as they should appoint between the Honduras and the coast of La Vera Cruz.

It was difficult for me to make good this part of the bargain; but finding the price agreed for would very well answer the voyage, I consented; but then how to send the sloop away and remain among the Spaniards when I was now a clear man, this was a difficulty too, as it was also to go away and not wait for a favourable answer from the viceroy of Mexico to the representation of the governor and the corregidor; however, at last I resolved to go in the sloop, fall out what would; so I went to the governor and represented to him, that being now to expect a favourable answer from Mexico, it would be a great loss to me to keep the sloop there all the while, and I desired his leave for me to go with the sloop to Antigua to sell and dispose of the cargo, which he well knew I was obliged not to bring on shore there at the Havannah, and which would be in danger of being spoiled by lying so long on board.

This I obtained readily, with licence to come again into the road, and (for myself only) to come on shore, in order to hear the viceroy's pleasure in my case which was depending.

CHAPTER XIX.

I MAKE A VERY PROFITABLE VOYAGE—EMBARK ON A SIMILAR ADVENTURE ACCOMPANIED BY MY WIFE—I FIT UP MY SLOOP FOR DEFENCE AND SAIL FOR THE WEST INDIES—GREAT SUCCESS OF MY VOYAGE—AFTER VARIOUS CHANGES OF FORTUNE I RETURN TO ENGLAND WEALTHY, WHERE MY WIFE JOINS ME—CONCLUSION.

HAVING thus obtained a licence or passport for the sloop and myself, I put to sea with the three Spanish merchants on board with me. They told me they did not live at the Havannah, but it seems one of them did; and some rich merchants of the Havannah, or of the parts thereabouts in the Havannah, were concerned with them; for they brought on board, the night we put to sea, a great sum of money in pieces of eight; and, as I understood afterwards, that these merchants bought the cargo of me, and, though they gave me a very great price for every thing, yet that they sold them again to the merchants whom they procured on the coast of Vera Cruz at a prodigious advantage; so that they got above a hundred per cent. after I had gained very sufficiently before.

We sailed from the Havannah directly for Vera Cruz. I scrupled venturing into the port at first, and was very uneasy lest I should have another Spanish trick put upon me; but as we sailed under Spanish colours, they showed us such authentic papers from the proper officers, that there was no room to fear anything.

However, when we came in sight of the Spanish coast, I found that they had a secret clandestine trade to carry on, which, though it was secret, yet they knew the way of it so well that it was but a mere road to them. The case was this: we stood close under shore in the night about six leagues to the north of the port, where two of the three merchants went ashore in the boat, and in three hours or thereabouts they came on board again with five canoes and seven or eight merchants more with them, and as soon as they were on board we stood off to sea, so that by day-light we were quite out of sight of land.

I ought to have mentioned before that as soon as we were put to sea from the Havannah, and during our voyage into the Gulf of Mexico, which was eight days, we rummaged the whole cargo, and opening every bale as far as the Spanish merchants desired, we trafficked with them for the whole cargo except the barrels of flour and pease.

This cargo was considerable in itself, for my wife's account or invoice, drawn out by my tutor and manager, amounted to 2,684*l.* 10*s.*, and I sold the whole, including what had been sold in the evening, when they were on board first (as I have said), for 38,593 pieces of eight, and they allowed me 1,200 pieces of eight for the freight of the sloop, and made my master and the seamen very handsome presents besides, and they were well able to do this too, as you shall hear presently.

After we were gotten out of sight of land the Spaniards fell to their traffic, and our three merchants opened their shop, as they might say, for it was their shop; as to me, I had nothing to do with it, or with their goods; they drove their bargain in a few hours, and at night we stood in again for the shore, when the five canoes carried a great part of the goods on shore, and brought the money back in specie, as well for that they carried as for all the rest, and at their second voyage carried all away clear, leaving me nothing on board but my barrels of flour and peas, which they bade me money for too, but not so much as I expected.

Here I found that my Spanish merchants made above 70,000 pieces of eight of the cargo I had sold them, upon which I had a great mind to be acquainted with those merchants on the Terra Firma who were the last customers; for it presently occurred to me that I could easily go with a sloop from Virginia, and, taking a cargo directed on purpose from England of about 5 or 6,000*l.*, I might easily make four of one. With this view I began to make a kind of an acquaintance with the Spaniards who came in the canoes, and we became so intimate that at last, with the consent of the three Spaniards of the Havannah, I accepted an invitation on shore to their house, which was a little villa, or rather plantation, where they had an ingenio, that is to say, a sugar-house, or sugar-work, and there they treated us all like princes.

I took occasion at this invitation to say, that if I knew how to find my way thither again, I could visit them once or twice a year very much to their advantage and mine too. One of the Spaniards took the hint, and, taking me into a room by myself, "Signor," says he, "if you have any thoughts of coming to this place again, I shall give you such directions as you shall be sure not to mistake, and, upon either coming on shore in the night, and coming up to this place, or upon making the signals which we shall give you, we will not fail to come off to you, and bring money enough for any cargaison (so they call it) that you shall bring."

I took all their directions, took their paroles of honour for my safety, and, without taking any notice to my first three merchants, laid up all the rest in my most secret thoughts, resolving to visit them again in as short a time as I could; and thus, having in about five days finished all our merchandising, we stood off to sea, and made for the island of Cuba, where I set my three Spaniards on shore with all their treasure, to their hearts' content, and made the best of my way to Antigua, where, with all the dispatch I could, I sold my 200 barrels of flour, which, however, had suffered a little from the length of the voyage; and, having laden the sloop with rum, molasses, and sugar, I set sail again for the Havannah.

I was now uneasy indeed for fear of the pirates, for I was a rich ship, having, besides goods, nearly 40,000 pieces of eight in silver.

When I came back to the Havannah I went on shore to wait on the governor and the corregidor, and to hear what return was had from the viceroy, and had the good fortune to know that the viceroy had disallowed that part of the sentence which condemned us as prisoners, and put a ransom on us, which he insisted could not be but in time of open war; but as to the confiscation, he deferred it to the chamber or council of commerce at Seville, and the appeal to the king, if such be preferred.

This was, in some measure, a very good piece of justice in the viceroy; for, as we had not been on shore, we could not be legally imprisoned; and for the rest, I believe if I would have given myself the trouble to have gone to Old Spain, and have preferred my claim to both the ship and the cargo, I had recovered them also.

However, as it was, I was now a freeman without ransom, and my men were also free, so that all the money which I had deposited, as above, was returned me; and thus I took my leave of the Havannah, and made the best of my way for Virginia, where I arrived after a year and a half's absence; and, notwithstanding all my losses, came home above 40,000 pieces of eight richer than I went out.

As to the old affair about the Preston prisoners, that was quite at an end, for the general pardon passed in parliament made me perfectly easy, and I took no more thought about that part. I might here very usefully observe how necessary and inseparable a companion fear is to guilt; it was but a few months before that the face of a poor Preston transport would have frightened me out of my wits; to avoid them I feigned myself sick, and wrapped my legs in flannel, as if I had the gout; whereas now they were no more surprise to me, nor was I any more uneasy to see them, than I was to see any other of the servants of the plantations.

And that which was more particular than all was, that though before I fancied every one of them would know me, and remember me, and consequently betray me and accuse me, now, though I was frequently among them, and saw most, if not all of them, one time or other, nay, though I remembered several of their faces, and even some of their names, yet there was not a man of them that ever took the least notice of me, or of having known or seen me before.

It would have been a singular satisfaction to me if I could have known so much as this of them before, and had saved me all the fatigue, hazard, and misfortune that befel me afterwards; but man, a short-sighted creature, sees so little before him that he can neither anticipate his joys nor prevent his disasters, be they ever so little a distance from him.

I had now my head full of my West India project, and I began to make provision for it accordingly. I had a full account of what European goods were most acceptable in New Spain; and, to add to my speed, I knew that the Spaniards were in great want of European goods, the galleons from Old Spain having been delayed to an unusual length of time for the two years before. Upon this account, not having time, as I thought, to send to England for a cargo of such goods as were most proper, I resolved to load my sloop with tobacco and rum (the last I brought from Antigua), and go away to Boston in New England, and to New York, and see if I could pick up a cargo to my mind.

Accordingly I took 20,000 pieces of eight in money, and my sloop laden as above, and taking my wife with me, we went away. It was an odd and new thing at New England to have such a quantity of goods bought up there by a sloop from Virginia, and especially to be paid for in ready money, as I did for most of my goods; and this set all the trading heads upon the stretch, to inquire what and who I was; to which they had an immediate and direct answer, that I was a very considerable planter in Virginia, and that was all any of my men on board the sloop could tell of me, and enough too.

Well, it was the cause of much speculation among them, as I heard at second and third hands; some said, he is certainly going to Jamaica; others said, he is going to trade with the Spaniards; others, that he is going to the South Sea, and turn half merchant, half pirate, on the coast of Chili and Peru; some one thing, some another, as the men-gossips found their imaginations directed; but we went on with our business, and laid out 12,000 pieces of eight, besides our cargo of rum and tobacco, and went from thence to New York, where we laid out the rest.

The chief of the cargo we bought here was, fine English broad cloth, serges, druggets, Norwich stuffs, baize, says, and all kinds of woollen manufactures, as also linen of all sorts, a very great quantity, and nearly 1,000*l.* in fine silks of several sorts.

Being thus freighted, I came back safe to Virginia, and, with very little addition to my cargo, began to prepare for my West India voyage.

I should have mentioned that I had built upon my sloop, and raised her a little, so that I had made her carry 12 guns, and fitted her up for defence, for I thought she should not be attacked and boarded by a few Spanish barco longos, as she was before; and I found the benefit of it afterwards, as you shall hear.

We set sail the beginning of August, and, as I had twice been attacked by pirates in passing the Gulf of Florida, or among the Bahama islands, I resolved, though it was further about, to stand off to sea, and so keep, as I believed it would be, out of the way of them.

We passed the tropic, as near as we could guess, just where the famous Sir William Phipps fished up the silver from the Spanish plate wreck, and, standing in between the islands, kept our course W. by S., keeping under the isle of Cuba, and so running away trade, as they call it, into the great Gulf of Mexico, leaving the island of Jamaica to the S. and S.E., by this means avoiding, as I thought, all the Spaniards of Cuba or the Havannah.

As we passed the west point of Cuba three Spanish boats came off to board us, as they had done before on the other side of the island; but they found themselves mistaken, we were too many for them, for we ran out our guns, which they did not perceive before, and, firing three or four shot at them, they retired.

The next morning they appeared again, being five large boats and a bark, and gave us chase; but we then spread our Spanish colours, and brought to to fight them, at which they retired, so we escaped this danger by the addition of force which we had made to our vessel.

We now had a fair run for our port, and, as I had taken very good directions, I stood away to the north of St John d'Uloa, and then running in for the shore, found the place appointed exactly; and, going on shore, I sent the master of my sloop directly to the ingenio, where he found the Spanish merchant at his house, and where he dwelt like a little sovereign prince, who welcomed him; and understanding that I was in a particular boat at the creek, as appointed, he came immediately with him, and bringing another Spaniard from a villa not far off, in about four hours they were with me.

They would have persuaded me to go up to their houses, and have stayed there till the next night, ordering the sloop to stand off as usual, but I would not consent to let the sloop go to sea without me, so we went on board directly; and, as the night was almost run, stood off to sea; so, by daybreak, we were quite out of sight of land.

Here we began, as I said before, to open shop, and I found the Spaniards were extremely surprised at seeing such a cargo, I mean so large, for, in short, they had cared not if it had been four times as much. They soon ran through the contents of all the bales we opened that night, and, with very little dispute about the price, they approved and accepted all that I showed them; but, as they said they had not money for any greater parcel, they agreed to go on shore the next evening for more money.

However, we spent the remainder of the night in looking over and making inventories or invoices of the rest of the cargo, that so they might see the goods, know the value, and know what more money they had to bring.

Accordingly, in the evening, we stood in for the shore, and they carried part of the cargo with them, borrowing the sloop's boat to assist them; and after they had lodged and landed the goods, they came on board again, bringing three of the other merchants with them, who were concerned before, and money enough to clear the whole ship, ay, and ship and all, if I had been willing to sell her.

To give them their due, they dealt with me like men of honour; they were indeed sensible that they bought everything much cheaper of me than they did before of the three merchants of the Havannah; these merchants having been, as it were, the hucksters, and bought them first of me, and then advanced, as I have said, above 100 per cent. upon the price they gave me; but yet, at the same time, I advanced in the price much more now than I did before to the said Spaniards, nor was it without reason, because of the length and risk of the voyage, both out and home, which now lay wholly upon me.

In short, I sold the whole cargo to them, and for which I received near 200,000 pieces of eight in money besides which, when they came on board the second time, they brought all their boats loaden with fresh provisions, hogs, sheep, fowls, sweetmeats, &c., enough for my whole voyage, all which they made a present of to me, and thus we finished our traffic to our mutual satisfaction, and parted with promises of farther commerce, and with assurances on their part of all acts of friendship and assistance that I could desire, if any disaster should befall me in any of these adventures; as indeed was not improbable, considering the strictness and severity of their customs, in case any people were taken trading upon their coast.

I immediately called a council with my little crew which way we should go back; the mate was for beating it up to windward, and getting up to Jamaica; but, as we were too rich to run any risks, and were to take the best course to get safe home, I thought, and so did the master of the sloop, that our best way was to coast about the bay, and keeping the shore of Florida on board, make the shortest course to the gulf, and so make for the coast of Carolina, and to put in there, into the first port we could, and wait for any English men-of-war that might be on the coast to secure us to the capes.

This was the best course we could take, and proved very safe to us, excepting that, about the Cape of Florida, and on the coast in the gulf, till we came to the height of St Augustine, we were several times visited with the Spaniards' barco longos and small barks, in hopes of making a prize of us; but carrying Spanish colours deceived most of them, and a good tire of guns kept the rest at a distance, so that we came safe, though once or twice in danger of being run on shore by a storm of wind, I say, we came safe into Charles River in Carolina.

From thence I found means to send a letter home, with an account to my wife of my good success; and having an account that the coast was clear of pirates, though there were no men-of-war in the place, I ventured forward, and, in short, got safe into the bay of Chesapeake, that is to say, within the capes of Virginia, and in a few days more to my own house, having been absent three months and four days.

Never did any vessel on this side the world make a better voyage in so short a time than I made in this sloop; for, by the most moderate computation, I cleared, in these three months, 25,000*l.* sterling in ready money, all the charges of the voyages to New England being reckoned up.

Now was my time to have sat still contented with what I had got, if it was in the power of man to know when his good fortune was at the highest; and more, my prudent wife gave it as her opinion that I should sit down satisfied, and push the affair no farther, and earnestly persuaded me to do so; but I that had a door open, as I thought, to immense treasure, that had found the way to have a stream of the golden rivers of Mexico flow into my plantation of Virginia, and saw no hazards more than what were common to all such things in the prosecution; I say, to me these things looked with another face, and I dreamed of nothing but millions and hundreds of thousands; so, contrary to all moderate measures, I pushed on for another voyage, and laid up a stock of all sorts of goods that I could get together proper for the trade: I did not indeed go again to New England, for I had by this time a very good cargo come from England, pursuant to a commission I had sent several months before; so that, in short, my cargo, according to the invoice now made out, amounted to above 10,000*l.* sterling first cost, and was a cargo so sorted, and so well bought, that I expected to have advanced upon them much more in proportion than I had done in the cargo before.

With these expectations we began our second voyage in April, being about five months after our return from the first; we had not indeed the same good speed, even in our beginning, as we had at first; for, though we stood off to sea about 60 leagues, in order to be out of the way of the pirates, yet we had not been above five days at sea but we were visited and rifled by two pirate barks, who, being bound to the northward, that is to say, the banks of Newfoundland, took away all our provisions, and all our ammunition and small arms, and left us very ill provided to pursue our voyage; and, it being so near home, we thought it advisable to come about, and stand in for the capes again, to restore our condition, and furnish ourselves with stores of all kinds for our voyage; this took us up about ten days, and we put to sea again; as for our cargo, the pirates did not meddle with it, being all bale goods, which they had no present use for, and knew not what to do with, if they had them.

We met with no other adventure worth naming till, by the same course that we had steered before, we came into the Gulf of Mexico; and the first misfortune we met with here was, that, on the back of Cuba, crossing towards the point of the Terra Firma, on the coast of Yucatan, we had sight of the flota of New Spain, that is, of the ships which come from Carthagena or Porto Bello, and go to the Havannah, in order to pursue their voyage to Europe.

They had with them one Spanish man-of-war and three frigates; two of the frigates gave us chase; but, it being just at the shutting in of the day, we soon lost sight of them, and, standing to the north, cross the bay of Mexico, as if we were going to the mouth of Mississippi, they lost us quite, and in a few days more we made the bottom of the bay, being the port we were bound for.

We stood in, as usual, in the night, and gave notice to our friends; but instead of their former readiness to come on board, they gave us notice that we had been seen in the bay, and that notice of us was given at Vera Cruz and at other places, and that several frigates were in quest of us, and that three more would be cruising the next morning in search of us.

We could not conceive how this could be; but we were afterwards told that those three frigates, having lost sight of us in the night, had made in for the shore, and had given the alarm of us as of privateers.

Be that as it would, we had nothing to do but to consider what course to take immediately. The Spanish merchants' advice was very good if we had taken it, namely, to have unladen as many of our bales as we could that very night, by the help of our boat and their canoes, and to make the best of our way in the morning to the north of the gulf, and take our fate.

This my skipper, or master, thought very well of, but, when we began to put it in execution, we were so confused, and in such a hurry, being not resolved what course to take, that we could not get out above sixteen bales of all sorts of goods before it began to be too light, and it behoved us to sail; at last the master proposed a medium, which was, that I should go on shore in the next boat, in which were five bales of goods more, and that I should stay on shore, if the Spanish merchants would undertake to conceal me, and let them go to sea and take their chance.

The Spanish merchants readily undertook to protect me, especially it being so easy to have me pass for a natural Spaniard, and so they took me on shore with twenty-one bales of my goods, and the sloop stood off to sea. If they met with any enemies, they were to stand in for the shore the next night, and we failed not to look well out for them, but to no purpose, for the next day they were discovered and chased by two Spanish frigates; they stood from them, and the sloop being an excellent sailer, gained so much that they would certainly have been clear of them when night came on, but a small picaroon of a sloop kept them company in spite of all they could do, and two or three times offered to engage them, thereby to give time to the rest to come up; but the sloop kept her way, and gave them a chase of three days and nights, and having a fresh gale of wind at S. W. till she made the Rio Grand, or, as the French call it, the Mississippi, and there finding no remedy, they ran the vessel on shore, not far from the fort which the Spaniards call Pensacola, garrisoned at that time with French. Our men would have entered the river as a port, but having no pilot, and the current of the river being strong against them, the sloop ran on shore, and the men shifted as well as they could in their boats.

I was now in a very odd condition indeed, though my circumstances were in one sense very happy, namely, that I was in the hands of my friends, for such really they were, and so faithful, that no men could have been more careful of their own safety than they were of mine; and that which added to the comfort of my new condition was the produce of my goods, which were gotten on shore by their own advice and direction, which was a fund sufficient to maintain me with them as long as I could be supposed to stay there; and the first merchant to whose house I went assured me, that he would give me credit for 20,000 pieces of eight, if I had occasion for it.

My greatest affliction was, that I knew not how to convey news to my wife of my present condition, and how, among the many misfortunes of the voyage, I was yet safe, and in good hands.

But there was no remedy for this part but the great universal cure of all incurable sorrows, viz. patience; and indeed I had a great deal of reason, not for patience only, but thankfulness, if I had known the circumstances which I should have been reduced to, if I had fallen into the hands of the Spaniards; the best of which that I could reasonably have expected, had been, to have been sent to the mines, or, which was ten thousand times worse, the inquisition; or, if I had escaped the Spaniards, as my men in the sloop did, the hardships they were exposed to, the dangers they were in, and the miseries they suffered, were still worse, in wandering among savages, and the more savage French, who plundered and stripped them, instead of relieving and supplying them in their long wilderness journey over the mountains, till they reached the S. W. parts of South Carolina, a journey which indeed deserves to have an account to be given of it by itself; I say, all these things, had I known of them, would have let me see that I had a great deal of reason, not only to be patient under my present circumstances, but satisfied and thankful.

Here, as I said, my patron, the merchant, entertained me like a prince; he made my safety his peculiar care; and, while we were in any expectation of the sloop being taken, and brought into Vera Cruz, he kept me retired at a little house in a wood, where he kept a fine aviary of all sorts of American birds, and out of which he yearly sent some as presents to his friends in Old Spain.

This retreat was necessary, lest, if the sloop should be taken and brought into Vera Cruz, and the men be brought in prisoners, they should be tempted to give an account of me as their supercargo or merchant, and where both I and the twenty-one bales of goods were sent on shore. As for the goods, he made sure work with them, for they were all opened, taken out of the bales, and separated, and, being mixed with other European goods which came by the galleons, were made up in new packages, and sent to Mexico in several parcels, some to one merchant, some to another; so that it was impossible to have found them out, even if they had had information of them.

In this posture, and in apprehension of some bad news of the sloop, I remained at the villa, or house in the vale, for so they called it, about five weeks; I had two negroes appointed to wait on me, one of whom was my purveyor, or my cook, the other my valet; and my friend, the master of all, came constantly every evening to visit and sup with me, when we walked out together into the aviary, which was, of its kind, the most beautiful thing that ever I saw in the world.

After above five weeks' retreat of this kind, he had good intelligence of the fate of the sloop, viz. that the two frigates and a sloop had chased her till she ran on ground near the fort of Pensacola, that they saw her stranded and broke in pieces by the force of the waves, the men making their escape in their boat. This news was brought, it seems, by the said frigates to La Vera Cruz, where my friend went on purpose to be fully informed, and received the account from one of the captains of the frigates, and discoursed with him at large about it.

I was better pleased with the loss of the sloop and all my cargo, the men being got on shore and escaping, than I should have been with the saving the whole cargo if the men had fallen into the hands of the Spaniards, for now I was safe, whereas then, it being supposed they would have been forced to some discovery about me, I must have fled, and should have found it very difficult to have made my escape, even with all that my friends could have done for me too.

But now I was perfectly easy, and my friend, who thought confining me at the house in the vale no longer needful, brought me publicly home to his dwelling-house as a merchant come from Old Spain by the last galleons, and who, having been at Mexico, was come to reside with him.

Here I was dressed like a Spaniard of the better sort, had three negroes to attend me, and was called Don Ferdinand de Villa Moresa, in Castilia Feja, that is to say, in Old Castile.

Here I had nothing to do but to walk about, and ride out into the woods, and come home again to enjoy the pleasantest and most agreeable retirement in the world; for certainly no men in the world live in such splendour, and wallow in such immense treasures, as the merchants of this place.

They live, as I have said, in a kind of country retreat at their villas, or, as we would call them in Virginia, their plantations, and, as they call them, their ingenios, where they make their indigo and their sugars; but they have also houses and warehouses at Vera Cruz, where they go twice a year, when the galleons arrive from Old Spain, and when these galleons re-lade for their return; and it was surprising to me, when I went to La Vera Cruz with them, to see what prodigious consignments they had from their correspondents in Old Spain, and with what dispatch they managed them; for no sooner were the cases, packages, and bales of European goods brought into their warehouses, but they were opened, and repacked by porters and packers of their own, that is to say, negroes and Indian servants; and being made up into new bales and separate parcels, were all dispatched again, by horses, for Mexico, and directed to their several merchants there, and the remainder carried home, as above, to the ingenio, where they lived, which was near thirty English miles from Vera Cruz, so that, in about twenty days, their warehouses were again entirely free: at La Vera Cruz, all their business was over there, and they and all their servants retired; for they stayed no longer there than needs must, because of the unhealthiness of the air.

After the goods were thus dispatched, it was equally surprising to see how soon, and with what exactness, the merchants of Mexico, to whom those cargoes were separately consigned, made the return, and how it came all in silver or in gold, so that their warehouses, in a few months, were piled up, even to the ceiling, with chests of pieces of eight, and with bars of silver.

It is impossible to describe, in the narrow compass of this work, with what exactness and order, and yet with how little hurry, and not the least confusion, everything was done, and how soon a weight of business of such importance and value was negotiated and finished, the goods repacked, invoices made, and everything dispatched and gone; so that, in about five weeks, all the goods they had received from Europe by the galleons were disposed of, and entered in their journals, to the proper account of their merchants, to whom they were respectively consigned; from thence they had book-keepers, who drew out the invoices, and wrote the letters, which the merchant himself only read over and signed, and then other hands copied all again into other books.

I can give no estimate of the value of the several consignments they received by that flota; but I remember that when the galleons went back they shipped on board, at several times, 1,300,000 pieces of eight in specie, besides 180 bales or bags of cochineal, and about 300 bales of indigo, but they were so modest that they said this was for themselves and their friends; that is to say, the several merchants of Mexico consigned large quantities of bullion to them to ship on board and consign according to their order; but then I know also, that, for all that, they were allowed commission, so that their gain was very considerable even that way also.

I had been with them at La Vera Cruz, and came back again before we came to an account for the goods which I had brought on shore in the 21 bales, which, by the account we brought them (leaving a piece of everything to be governed by our last market), amounted to 8,570 pieces of eight, all which money my friend, for so I must now call him, brought me in specie, and caused his negroes to pile them up in one corner of my apartment; so that I was indeed still very rich, all things considered.

There was a bale which I had caused to be packed up on purpose in Virginia, and which, indeed, I had written for from England, being chiefly of fine English broad-cloths, silk, silk-druggets, and fine stuffs of several kinds, with some very fine Hollands, which I set apart for presents as I should find occasion; and as, whatever hurry I was in at carrying the 21 bales of goods on shore, I did not forget to let this bale be one of them, so, when we came to a sale for the rest, I told them that this was a pack with clothes and necessaries for my own wearing and use, and so desired it might not be opened with the rest, which was accordingly observed, and that bale or pack was brought into my apartment.

This bale was, in general, made up of several smaller bales, which I had directed, so that I might have room to make presents, equally sorted, as the circumstance might direct me. However, they were all considerable, and I reckoned the whole bale cost me nearly 200*l.* sterling in England; and, though my present circumstances required some limits to my bounty in making presents, yet the obligation I was under being so much greater, especially to this friendly generous Spaniard, I thought I could not do better than, by opening two of the smaller bales, join them together, and make my gift something suitable to my benefactor, and to the respect he had shown me; accordingly I took two bales, and, laying the goods together, the contents were as follows:—

Two pieces of fine English broad-cloth, the finest that could be got in London, divided, as was that which I gave to the governor at the Havannah, into fine crimson in grain, fine light mixtures, and fine black.

Four pieces of fine Holland of 7*s.* to 8*s.* per ell in London.

Twelve pieces of fine silk drugget and duroys for men's wear.

Six pieces of broad silks, two damasks, two brocaded silks, and two mantuas.

With a box of ribands and a box of lace. The last cost about 40*l.* sterling in England.

This handsome parcel I laid open in my apartment, and brought him up stairs one morning on pretence to drink chocolate with me, which he ordinarily did, when, as we drank chocolate, and were merry, I said to him, though I had sold him almost all my cargo and taken his money, yet the truth was that I ought not to have sold them to him, but to have laid them all at his feet, for that it was to his direction I owed the having anything saved at all.

He smiled, and, with a great deal of friendship in his face, told me that not to have paid me for them would have been to have plundered a shipwreck, which had been worse than to have robbed an hospital.

At last I told him I had two requests to make to him which must not be denied. I told him I had a small present to make him which I would give him a reason why he should not refuse to accept; and the second request I would make after the first was granted. He said he would have accepted my present from me if I had not been under a disaster; but, as it was, it would be cruel and ungenerous. But I told him he was obliged to hear my reason for his accepting it. Then I told him that this parcel was made up for him by name by my wife and I in Virginia, and his name set on the marks of the bale, and accordingly I showed him the marks, which was indeed on one of the bales, but I had doubled it now (as above), so that I told him these were his own proper goods; and, in short, I pressed him so to receive them that he made a bow, and I said no more, but ordered my negro, that is to say, his negro, that waited on me, to carry them all except the two boxes into his apartments, but would not let him see the particulars till they were all carried away.

After he was gone about a quarter of an hour he came in raving, and almost swearing, and in a great passion; but I could easily see he was exceedingly pleased; and told me, had he known the particulars, he would never have suffered them to have gone as he did, and at last used the very same compliment that the governor at the Havannah used, viz., that it was a present fit for a viceroy of Mexico rather than for him.

When he had done he then told me he remembered I had two requests to him, and that one was not to be told till after the first was granted, and he hoped now I had something to ask of him that was equal to the obligation I had laid upon him.

I told him I knew it was not the custom in Spain for a stranger to make presents to the ladies, and that I would not in the least doubt but that, whatever the ladies of his family required as proper for their use, he would appropriate to them as he thought fit; but that there were two little boxes in the parcel, which my wife, with her own hand, had directed to the ladies; and I begged he would be pleased, with his own hand, to give them in my wife's name, as directed; that I was only the messenger, but that I could not be honest if I did not discharge the trust reposed in me.

These were the two boxes of ribands and lace, which, knowing the nicety of the ladies in Spain, or rather of the Spaniards about their women, I had made my wife pack up, and directed with her own hand, as I have said.

He smiled, and told me it was true the Spaniards did not ordinarily admit so much freedom among the women as other nations; but he hoped (he said) I would not think the Spaniards thought all their women whores, or that all Spaniards were jealous of their wives; that, as to my present, since he had agreed to accept of it, I should have the direction of what part I pleased to his wife and daughters; for he had three daughters.

Here I strained courtesies again, and told him by no means, I would direct nothing of that kind, I only begged that he would with his own hand present to his donna, or lady, the present designed her by my wife, and that he would present it in her name, now living in Virginia. He was extremely pleased with the nicety I used, and I saw him present it to her accordingly, and could see, at the opening of it, that she was extremely pleased with the present itself, as indeed she might very well be; for in that country it was worth a very considerable sum of money.

Though I was used with an uncommon friendship before, and nothing could well be desired more, yet the grateful sense I showed of it, in the magnificence of this present, was not lost, and the whole family appeared sensible of it; so that I must allow that presents, where they can be made in such a manner, are not without their influence, where the persons were not at all mercenary, either before or after.

I had here now a most happy and comfortable retreat, though it was a kind of an exile; here I enjoyed everything I could think of that was agreeable and pleasant, except only a liberty of going home, which, for that reason, perhaps, was the only thing I desired in the world; for the grief of one absent comfort is oftentimes capable of embittering all the other enjoyments in the world.

Here I enjoyed the moments which I had never before known how to employ, I mean, that here I learned to look back upon a long ill-spent life, blessed with infinite advantage, which I had no heart given me till now to make use of, and here I found just reflections were the utmost felicity of human life.

Here I wrote these memoirs, having to add to the pleasure of looking back with due reflections the benefit of a violent fit of the gout, which, as it is allowed by most people, clears the head, restores the memory, and qualifies us to make the most, and just, and useful remarks upon our own actions.

Perhaps, when I wrote these things down, I did not foresee that the writings of our own stories would be so much the fashion in England, or so agreeable to others to read, as I find custom and the humour of the times has caused it to be; if any one that reads my story, pleases to make the same just reflections, which I acknowledge I ought to have made, he will reap the benefit of my misfortunes, perhaps, more than I have done myself; it is evident, by a long series of changes and turns, which have appeared in the narrow compass of one private mean person's life, that the history of men's lives may be many ways made useful and instructing to those who read them, if moral and religious improvement and reflections are made by those that write them.

There remains many things in the course of this unhappy life of mine, though I have left so little a part of it to speak of, that is worth giving a large and distinct account of, and which gives room for just reflections of a kind which I have not made yet; particularly I think it just to add how, in collecting the various changes and turns of my affairs, I saw, clearer than ever I had done before, how an invincible, over-ruling power, a hand influenced from above, governs all our actions of every kind, limits all our designs, and orders the events of everything relating to us.

And from this observation it necessarily occurred to me how just it was that we should pay the homage of all events to him; that, as he guided, and had even made the chain of cause and consequences, which nature in general strictly obeyed, so to him should be given the honour of all events, the consequences of those causes, as the first mover and maker of all things.

I, who had hitherto lived, as might be truly said, without God in the world, began now to see farther into all those things than I had ever yet been capable of before, and this brought me at last to look with shame and blushes upon such a course of wickedness as I had gone through in the world: I had been bred indeed to nothing of either religious or moral knowledge; what I had gained of either, was, first, by the little time of civil life which I lived in Scotland, where my abhorrence of the wickedness of my captain and comrade, and some sober religious company I fell into, first gave me some knowledge of good and evil, and showed me the beauty of a sober, religious life, though, with my leaving that country, it soon left me too; or, secondly, the modest hints and just reflections of my steward, whom I called my tutor, who was a man of sincere religion, good principles, and a real true penitent for his past miscarriages: O! had I with him sincerely repented of what was past, I had not for twenty-four years together lived a life of levity and profligate wickedness after it.

But here I had (as I said) leisure to reflect, and to repent, and to call to mind things past, and with a just detestation learn, as Job says, to abhor myself in dust and ashes.

It is with this temper that I have written my story; I would have all that design to read it, prepare to do so with the temper of penitents; and remember, with how much advantage they make their penitent reflections at home under the merciful dispositions of Providence in peace, plenty, and ease, rather than abroad, under the discipline of a transported criminal, as my wife and my tutor, or under the miseries and distresses of a shipwrecked wanderer, as my skipper, or captain of the sloop, who (as I hear) died a very great penitent, labouring in the deserts and mountains to find his way home to Virginia by the way of Carolina, whither the rest of the crew reached, after infinite dangers and hardships; or in exile, however favourably circumstanced as mine, in absence from my family, and for some time in no probable view of ever seeing them any more.

Such (I say) may repent with advantage; but how few are they that seriously look in till their way is hedged up, and they have no other way to look.

Here (I say) I had leisure to repent; how far it pleases God to give the grace of repentance where he gives the opportunity of it, is not for me to say of myself; it is sufficient that I recommend it to all that read this story, that, when they find their lives come up in any degree to any similitude of cases, they will inquire by me, and ask themselves, is not this the time to repent? Perhaps the answer may touch them.

I have only to add what was then written, that my kind friend the Spaniard finding no other method presented for conveying me to my home, that is to say, to Virginia, got a licence for me to come in the next galleons as a Spanish merchant to Cadiz, where I arrived safe with all my treasure, for he suffered me to be at no expenses in his house; and from Cadiz I soon got my passage on board an English merchant ship for London, from whence I sent an account of my adventures to my wife, and where, in about five months more, she came over to me, leaving, with full satisfaction, the management of all our affairs in Virginia in the same faithful hands as before.

P R E F A C E.

THE world is so taken up of late with novels and romances, that it will be hard for a private history to be taken for genuine, where the names and other circumstances of the person are concealed; and on this account we must be content to have the reader to put his own opinion upon the ensuing sheets, and take it just as he pleases.

The author is here supposed to be writing her own history; and in the very beginning of her account she gives the reasons why she thinks fit to conceal her true name, after which there is no occasion to say any more about that.

It is true that the original of this story is put into new words, and the style of the famous lady we here speak of is a little altered; particularly, she is made to tell her own tale in modester words than she told it at first; the copy which came first to hand having been written in language more like one still in Newgate than one grown penitent and humble, as she afterwards pretends to be.

The pen employed in finishing her story, and making it what you see it to be, has had no little difficulty to put it into a dress fit to be seen, and to make it speak language fit to be read. When a woman, debauched from her youth, nay, even being the offspring of debauchery and vice, comes to give an account of all her vicious practices, and even to descend to the particular occasions and circumstances by which she first became wicked, and of all the progressions of crime which she ran through in threescore years, an author must be hard put to it to wrap it up so clean, as not to give room, especially for vicious readers, to turn it to his disadvantage.

All possible care, however, has been taken to give no lewd ideas, no immodest turns, in the new dressing up of this story; no, not to the worst part of her expressions. To this purpose some of the vicious part of her life, which could not be modestly told, is quite left out, and several other parts are very much shortened. What is left, 'tis hoped, will not offend the chastest reader, or the modestest hearer; and as the best use is to be made even of the worst story, the moral, 'tis hoped, will keep the reader serious, even where the story might incline him to be otherwise. To give the history of a wicked life repented of, necessarily requires that the wicked part should be made as wicked as the real history of it will bear, to illustrate and give a beauty to the penitent part, which is certainly the best and brightest, if related with equal spirit and life.

It is suggested there cannot be the same life, the same brightness and beauty, in relating the penitent part as in the criminal part. If there is any truth in that suggestion, I must be allowed to say 'tis because there is not the same taste and relish in the reading; and indeed it is too true that the difference lies not in the real worth of the subject, so much as in the gust and palate of the reader.

But as this work is chiefly recommended to those who know how to read it, and how to make the good uses of it which the story all along recommends to them, so it is to be hoped that such readers will be much more pleased with the moral than the fable, with the application than with the relation, and with the end of the writer than with the life of the person written of.

There is in this story abundance of delightful incidents, and all of them usefully applied. There is an agreeable turn artfully given them in the relating, that naturally instructs the reader either one way or another. The first part of her lewd life with the young gentleman at Colchester has so many happy turns given it to expose the crime, and warn all whose circumstances are adapted to it of the serious end of such things; and were it true that they did so, and that they constantly adhered to that rule as the test of their acting on the theatre, much might be said in their favour.

Throughout the infinite variety of this book, this fundamental rule is most strictly adhered to; there is not a wicked action in any part of it, but is first or last rendered unhappy or unfortunate. There is not a superlative villain brought upon the stage, but either he is brought to an unhappy end, or brought to be a penitent. There is not an ill thing mentioned, but it is condemned even in the relation; nor a virtuous, just thing, but it carries its praise along with it. What can more exactly answer the rule laid down to recommend even those representations of things which have so many other just objections lying against them,—names of example, of bad company, of obscene language, and the like?

Upon this foundation this book is recommended to the reader, as a work from every part of which something may be learned, and some just and religious inference is drawn, by which the reader will have something of instruction, if he pleases to make use of it.

All the exploits of this lady of fame in her depredations upon mankind stand as so many warnings to honest people to beware of them, intimating to them by what methods innocent people are drawn in, plundered, and robbed, and, by consequence, how to avoid them. Her robbing a little child, dressed fine by the vanity of the mother, to go to the dancing school, is a good memento to such people hereafter; as is likewise her picking the gold watch from the young lady's side in the Park.

Her getting a parcel from a hair-brained wench at the coaches in St John's street, her booty at the fire, and also at Harwich, all give us excellent warning in such cases to be more present to ourselves in sudden surprises of every sort.

Her application to a sober life and industrious management at last in Virginia, with her transported spouse, is a story fruitful of instruction to all the unfortunate creatures who are obliged to seek their re-establishment abroad, whether by the misery of transportation or other disaster; letting them know that diligence and application have their due encouragement, even in the remotest part of the world, and that no case can be so low, so despicable, or so empty of prospect, but that an unwearied industry will go a great way to deliver us from it, will in time raise the meanest creature to appear again in the world, and give him a new cast for his life.

These are a few of the serious inferences which we are led by the hand to in this book, and these are fully sufficient to justify any man in recommending it to the world, and much more to justify the publication of it.

There are two of the most beautiful parts still behind, which this story gives some idea of, and lets us into the parts of them; but they are, either of them, too long to be brought into the same volume, and indeed are, as I may call them, whole volumes of themselves, viz.—1. The Life of her Governess, as she calls her, who had run through, it seems, in a few years, all the eminent degrees of a gentlewoman, a whore, and a bawd; a midwife and a midwife-keeper, as they are called; a pawn-broker, a child-taker, a receiver of thieves and of stolen goods; and, in a word, herself a thief, and a breeder up of thieves, and the like, and yet, at last, a penitent.

The second is the life of her transported husband, a highwayman, who, it seems, lived a twelve years' life of successful villany upon the road, and even at last came off so well as to be a volunteer transport, not a convict, and in whose life there is an incredible variety.

But, as I said, there are things too long to bring in here, so neither can I make a promise of their coming out by themselves.

We cannot say, indeed, that this history is carried on quite to the end of the life of this famous Moll Flanders, for nobody can write their own life to the full end of it, unless they can write it after they are dead; but her husband's life being written by a third hand, gives a full account of them both, how long they lived together in that country, and how they came both to England again, after about eight years; in which time they were grown very rich, and where she lived, it seems, to be very old, but was not so extraordinary a penitent as she was at first; it seems only that indeed she always spoke with abhorrence of her former life, and of every part of it.

In her last scene at Maryland and Virginia, many pleasant things happened, which make that part of her life very agreeable; but they are not told with the same elegance as those accounted for by herself, so it is still to the more advantage that we break off here.

THE HISTORY OF MOLL FLANDERS.

My true name is so well known in the records or registers at Newgate, and in the Old Bailey, and there are some things of such consequence still depending there, relating to my particular conduct, that it is not to be expected I should set my name, or the account of my family, to this work; perhaps, after my death, it may be better known, at present it would not be proper, no, though a general pardon should be issued, even without exceptions and reserve of persons or crimes.

It is enough to tell you that as some of my worst comrades, who are out of the way of doing me harm, having gone out of the world by the steps and the string, as I often expected to go, knew me by the name of Moll Flanders; so you may give me leave to speak of myself under that name, till I dare own who I have been, as well as who I am.

I have been told, that in one of our neighbour nations, whether it be in France or where else I know not, they have an order from the king that when any criminal is condemned, either to die or to the galleys, or to be transported, if they leave any children, as such are generally unprovided for by the poverty or forfeiture of their parents, so they are immediately taken care of by the government, and put into a hospital called the House of Orphans, where they are bred up, clothed, fed, taught, and when fit to go out are placed to trades, or to services, so as to be well able to provide for themselves by an honest, industrious behaviour.

Had this been the custom in our country, I had not been left a poor desolate girl, without friends, without clothes, without help or helper in the world, as was my fate, and by which I was not only exposed to very great distresses, even before I was capable either of understanding my case, or how to amend it, but brought into a course of life which was not only scandalous in itself, but which in its ordinary course tended to the swift destruction both of soul and body.

But the case was otherwise here; my mother was convicted of felony for a certain petty theft, scarce worth naming, viz. having an opportunity of borrowing three pieces of fine Holland, of a certain draper in Cheapside. The circumstances are too long to repeat, and I have heard them related so many ways, that I can scarce be certain which is the right account.

However it was, this they all agree in, that my mother pleaded her belly, and being found quick with child, she was respited for about seven months, in which time having brought me into the world, and being about again, she was called down, as they term it, to her former judgment, but obtained the favour of being transported to Virginia, and left me about half a year old, and in bad hands you may be sure.

This is too near the first hours of my life for me to relate anything of myself but by hearsay; it is enough to mention, that as I was born in such an unhappy place, I had no parish to have recourse to for my nourishment in my infancy, nor can I give the least account how I was kept alive, other than that as I have been told some relation of my mother's took me away for awhile as a nurse child, but at whose expense, or by whose directions, I know nothing at all of it.

The first account that I can recollect, or could ever learn of myself, was, that I had wandered among a crew of those people they call gipsies or Egyptians, but I believe it was but a very little while that I had been among them, for I had not had my skin discoloured or blackened, as they do very young to all the children they carry about with them, nor can I tell how I came among them, or how I got from them.

It was at Colchester, in Essex, that those people left me; but I have a notion in my head that I left them there (that is, that I hid myself and would go no farther with them), but I am not able to be particular in that account; only this I remember, that being taken up by some of the parish officers of Colchester, I gave an account that I came into the town with the gipsies, but that I would not go any farther with them, and that so they had left me, but whither they were gone that I knew not, nor could they expect it of me; for, though they sent round the country to inquire after them, it seems they could not be found.

I was now in a way to be provided for; for though I was not a parish charge upon this or that part of the town by law, yet as my case came to be known, and that I was too young to do any work, being not above four years old, compassion moved the magistrates to order some care to be taken of me, and I became one of their own as much as if I had been born in the place.

In the provision they made for me it was my good hap to be put to nurse, as they call it, to a woman who was indeed poor, but had been in better circumstances, and who got a little livelihood by taking such as I was supposed to be, and keeping them with all necessaries till they were of a certain age, in which it might be supposed they might go to service, or get their own bread.

This woman had also had a little school, which she kept to teach children to read and to work; and having, as I have said, lived before that in good fashion, she bred up the children she took with a great deal of art, as well as with a great deal of care, but which was worth all the rest, she bred them up very religiously also, being herself a very sober, pious woman, very housewifely and clean, and very mannerly, and with good behaviour, so that, excepting a plain diet, coarse lodging, and mean clothes, we were brought up as mannerly as if we had been at the dancing school.

I was continued here till I was eight years old, when I was terrified with the news that the magistrates, as I think they call them, had ordered that I should go to service. I was able to do but very little wherever I was to go, except it was to run of errands, and be a drudge to some cook-maid; and this they told me of often, which put me into a great fright, for I had a thorough aversion to going to service, as they called it, though I was so young, and I told my nurse, as we called her, that I believed I could get my living without going to service, if she pleased to let me; for she had taught me to work with my needle and spin worsted, which is the chief trade of that city; and I told her, if that she would keep me, I would work for her, and I would work very hard.

I talked to her almost every day of working hard, and, in short, I did nothing but work and cry all day, which grieved the good kind woman so much that at last she began to be concerned, for she loved me very well.

One day after this, as she came into the room where all we poor children were at work, she sat down just over against me, not in her usual place as mistress, but as if she had set herself on purpose to observe me and see me work. I was doing something she had set me to, as I remember; it was marking some shirts which she had taken to make, and after awhile she began to talk to me. "Thou foolish child," says she, "thou art always crying," for I was crying then. "Prithee, what dost cry for?" "Because they will take me away," says I, "and put me to service, and I can't work house-work." "Well, child," says she, "but though you can't work house-work, as you call it, you will learn it in time, and they will not put you to hard things at first." "Yes they will," says I, "and if I cannot do it they will beat me, and the maids will beat me, and make me do great work, and I am but a little girl, and I can't do it;" and then I cried again till I could not speak any more.

This moved my good motherly nurse so that she resolved I should not go to service yet; so she bid me not cry, and she would speak to Mr Mayor, and I should not go to service till I was bigger.

Well, this did not satisfy me; for to think of going to service was such a frightful thing to me that if she had assured me I should not have gone till I was 20 years old, it would have been the same to me, I should have cried I believe all the time with the very apprehension of its being to be so at last.

When she saw that I was not pacified yet she began to be angry with me. "And what would you have?" says she. "Do I not tell you that you shall not go to service till you grow bigger?" "Ay," says I, "but then I must go at last." "Why, what!" said she; "is the girl mad? What, would you be a gentlewoman?" "Yes," says I, and cried heartily, till I roared out again.

This set the old gentlewoman a laughing at me, as you may be sure it would. "Well, madam, forsooth," says she, gibing at me, "you would be a gentlewoman; and how would you come to be a gentlewoman; what, will you do it by your fingers' ends?"

"Yes," says I again very innocently.

"Why, what can you earn," says she; "what can you get a day at your work?"

"Threepence," said I, "when I spin, and fourpence when I work plain work."

"Alas! poor gentlewoman," said she again, laughing; "what will that do for thee?"

"It will keep me," says I, "if you will let me live with you," and this I said in such a poor petitioning tone that it made the poor woman's heart yearn to me, as she told me afterwards.

"But," says she, "that will not keep you, and buy you clothes too; and who must buy the little gentlewoman clothes," says she, and smiled all the while at me.

"I will work harder, then," says I, "and you shall have it all."

"Poor child! it will not keep you," says she; "it will hardly find you in victuals."

"Then I will have no victuals," says I again very innocently; "let me but live with you."

"Why, can you live without victuals?" says she. "Yes," again says I, very much like a child, you may be sure, and still I cried heartily.

I had no policy in all this; you may easily see it was all nature; but it was joined with so much innocence and so much passion that, in short, it set the good motherly creature a weeping too, and she cried at last as fast as I did, and then took me, and led me out of the teaching-room. "Come," says she, "you shall not go to service, you shall live with me;" and this pacified me for the present.

Some time after this she going to wait on the mayor, and talking of such things as belonged to her business, at last my story came up, and my good nurse told Mr Mayor the whole tale. He was so pleased with it that he would call his lady and his two daughters to hear it; and it made mirth enough among them, you may be sure.

However, not a week had passed over but on a sudden comes the mayor's lady and her two daughters to the house to see my old nurse, her school, and the children. When they had looked about them a little, "Well, Mrs _____," says the lady to my nurse, "pray which is the little lass that intends to be a gentlewoman?" I heard her, and was terribly frightened at first, though I did not know why neither; but the lady came up to me, "Well, Miss," says she, "and what are you at work upon?" The word miss was a language that had hardly been heard of in our school, and I wondered what sad name it was she called me; however, I stood up, made a curtsy, and she took my work out of my hand, looked on it, and said it was very well; then she took up one of my hands,—“Nay,” says she, “the child may come to be a gentlewoman for aught anybody knows; she has a gentlewoman’s hand.” This pleased me mightily, you may be sure, but she did not stop there; but giving me my work again, put her hand in her pocket, gave me a shilling, and bid me mind my work and learn to work well, and I might be a gentlewoman for aught she knew.

Now, all this while my good old nurse, the lady, and all the rest of them, did not understand me at all, for they meant one sort of thing by the word gentlewoman and I meant quite another; for, alas, all I understood by being a gentlewoman was, to be able to work for myself, and to get enough to keep me without that terrible bugbear, “going to service;” whereas they meant to live great, rich, and high, and I know not what.

Well, after the mayor’s lady was gone, her two daughters came in, and they called for the gentlewoman too, and they talked a long while to me, and I answered them in my innocent way, but always, if they asked me whether I resolved to be a gentlewoman, I answered “Yes.” At last one of them asked me what a gentlewoman was. That puzzled me much, but however I explained myself negatively, that it was one that did not go to service to do house-work. They were pleased to be familiar with me, and liked my little prattle to them, which it seems was agreeable enough to them, and they gave me money too.

As for my money, I gave it to my Mrs Nurse, as I called her, and told her she should have all I got for myself when I was a gentlewoman, as well as now. By this and some other of my talk my old tutoress began to understand me about what I meant by being a gentlewoman, and that I understood by it no more than to be able to get my bread by my own work; and at last she asked me whether it was not so.

I told her “Yes,” and I insisted on it, that to do so was to be a gentlewoman; “For,” says I, “there is such a one,” naming a woman that mended lace and washed the ladies’ laced heads; “she,” says I, “is a gentlewoman, and they call her madam.”

“Poor child,” says my good old nurse, “you may soon be such a gentlewoman as that, for she is a person of ill fame, and has had two or three bastards.”

I did not understand anything of that, but answered, “I am sure they call her madam, and she does not go to service, nor do housework;” and therefore I insisted that she was a gentlewoman, and I would be such a gentlewoman as that.

The ladies were told all this again, to be sure, and they made themselves merry with it, and every now and then the young ladies (Mr Mayor’s daughters) would come and see me, and ask where the little gentlewoman was, which made me not a little proud of myself.

This held a great while, and I was often visited by these young ladies, and sometimes they brought others with them, so that I was known by it almost all over the town.

I was now about ten years old, and began to look a little womanish, for I was mighty grave and humble, very mannerly; and, as I had often heard the ladies say I was pretty, and would be a very handsome woman, so you may be sure that hearing them say so made me not a little proud; however, that pride had no ill effect upon me yet, only as they often gave me money, and I gave it all to my old nurse; she, honest woman, was so just to me as to lay it all out again for me, and gave me head-dresses, linen, gloves, and ribands, and I went very neat, and always clean, for that I would do, and if I had rags on I would always be clean, or else I would dabble them in water myself; but I say, my good nurse, when I had money given me, very honestly laid it out for me, and would always tell the ladies this or that was bought with their money, and this made them oftentimes give me more, till at last I was indeed called upon by the magistrates, as I understood it, to go out to service; but then I was come to be so good a workwoman myself, and the ladies were so kind to me, that it was plain I could maintain myself, that is to say, I could earn as much for my nurse as she was able by it to keep me; so she told them that if they would give her leave she would keep the gentlewoman, as she called me, to be her assistant, and teach the children, which I was very well able to do, for I was very nimble at my work, and had a good hand with my needle, though I was yet very young.

But the kindness of the ladies of the town did not end here; for when they came to understand that I was no more maintained by the public allowance, as before, they gave me money oftener than formerly, and as I grew up they brought me work to do for them, such as linen to make, and laces to mend, and heads to dress up, and not only paid me for doing them, but even taught me how to do them; so that now I was a gentlewoman indeed, as I understood that word, and as I desired to be; for, by the time I was twelve years old, I not only found myself clothes and paid my nurse for my keeping, but got money in my pocket too beforehand.

The ladies also gave me clothes frequently of their own or their children’s, and stockings, some petticoats, some gowns, some one thing, some another, and these my old woman managed for me like a mere mother, and kept them for me, obliged me to mend them and turn them and twist them to the best advantage, for she was a rare housewife.

At last one of the ladies took so much fancy to me that she would have me home to her house, for a month, she said, to be among her daughters.

Now, though this was exceeding kind in her, yet, as my old good woman said to her, unless she resolved to keep me for good and all, she would do the little gentlewoman more harm than good. “Well,” says the lady, “that is true, and therefore I will only take her home for a week, that I may see how my daughters and she agree together, and how I like her temper, and then I will tell you more; and, in the mean time, if anybody comes to see her as they used to do, you may only tell them you have sent her to my house.

This was prudently managed enough, and I went to the lady's house, but I was so pleased there with the young ladies, and they so pleased with me, that I had enough to do to come away, and they were as unwilling to part with me.

However, I did come away, and lived almost a year more with my honest old woman, and began now to be very helpful to her; for I was almost 14 years old, was tall of my age, and looked a little womanish; but I had such a taste of genteel living at the lady's house that I was not so easy in my old quarters as I used to be, and I thought it was fine to be a gentlewoman indeed, for I had quite other notions of a gentlewoman now than I had before; and, as I thought, I say, that it was fine to be a gentleman, so I loved to be among gentlewomen, and therefore I longed to be there again.

About the time that I was fourteen years and a quarter old, my good old nurse—mother I ought rather to call her—fell sick and died. I was then in a sad condition indeed; for, as there is no great bustle in putting an end to a poor body's family, when once they are carried to the grave, so the poor good woman being buried, the parish children she kept were immediately removed by the churchwardens, the school was at an end, and the children of it had no more to do but just to stay at home till they were sent somewhere else; and, as for what she left, her daughter, a married woman with six or seven children, came and swept it all away at once, and, removing the goods, they had no more to say to me than to jest with me, and tell me that the little gentlewoman might set up for herself if she pleased.

I was frightened almost out of my wits, and knew not what to do, for I was, as it were, turned out of doors to the wide world; and that which was still worse, the old honest woman had two and twenty shillings of mine in her hand, which was all the estate the little gentlewoman had in the world, and when I asked the daughter for it, she huffed me, and laughed at me, and told me she had nothing to do with it.

It was true, the good woman had told her daughter of it, and that it lay in such a place, and that it was the child's money, and had called once or twice for me, to give it me, but I was unhappily out of the way, somewhere or other, and when I came back she was past being in a condition to speak of it; however, the daughter was so honest afterward as to give it me, though at first she used me cruelly about it.

But my new generous mistress, for she exceeded the good woman I was with before in everything, as well as in the matter of estate—I say in everything except honesty—and for that, though this was a lady most exactly just, yet I must not forget to say on all occasions, that the first, though poor, was as uprightly honest as it was possible for any one to be.

Now was I a poor gentlewoman indeed, and was just that very night to be turned into the wide world; for the daughter removed all the goods, and I had not so much as a lodging to go to, or a bit of bread to eat: but it seems some of the neighbours who had known my circumstances took so much compassion of me as to acquaint the lady in whose family I had been a week, as I mentioned above, and immediately she sent her maid to fetch me away, and her two daughters came with the maid, though unsent; so I went with them bag and baggage, and with a glad heart you may be sure: the fright of my condition had made such an impression upon me that I did not want now to be a gentlewoman, but was very willing to be a servant, and that any kind of servant they thought fit to have me be.

I was no sooner carried away, as I have said, by this good gentlewoman, but the first lady, that is to say, the mayor's lady that was, sent her two daughters to take care of me, and another family which had taken notice of me when I was the little gentlewoman, and had given me work to do, sent for me after her, so that I was mightily made of, as we say; nay, and they were not a little angry, especially madame the mayoress, that her friend had taken me away from her as they called it; for, as she said, I was hers by right, she having been the first that took any notice of me, but they that had me would not part with me, and as for me, though I should have been very well treated with any of the other, yet I could not be better than where I was.

Here I continued till I was between seventeen and eighteen years of age, and here I had all the advantages for my education that could be imagined; the lady had masters home in her own house to teach her daughters to dance, and to speak French, and to write, and others to teach them music; and as I was always with them, I learnt as fast as they, and though the masters were not appointed to teach me, yet I learnt by imitation and inquiry all that they learnt by instruction and direction. So that, in short, I learned to dance and speak French as well as any of them, and to sing much better, for I had a better voice than any of them; I could not so readily come at playing on the harpsicord or spinnet, because I had no instrument of my own to practise on, and could only come at theirs in the intervals when they left it, which was uncertain, but yet I learnt tolerably well too, and the young ladies at length got two instruments, that is to say, a harpsichord and a spinnet, and then they taught me themselves; but as to dancing, they could hardly help my learning country dances, because they always wanted me to make up an even number; and, on the other hand, they were as heartily willing to learn me everything that they had been taught themselves, as I could be to take the learning.

By this means I had, as I have said above, all the advantages of education that I could have had, if I had been as much a gentlewoman as they were with whom I lived, and in some things I had the advantage of my ladies, though they were my superiors; viz. that mine were all the gifts of nature, and which all their fortunes could not furnish. First, I was apparently handsomer than any of them; secondly, I was better shaped; and thirdly, I sung better, by which I mean I had a better voice; in all which you will, I hope, allow me to say, I do not speak my own conceit of myself, but the opinion of all that knew the family.

I had with all these the common vanity of my sex, viz. that being really taken for very handsome, or, if you please, for a great beauty, I very well knew it, and had as good an opinion of myself as anybody else could have of me, and particularly I loved to hear anybody speak of it, which could not but happen to me sometimes, and was a great satisfaction to me.

Thus far I have had a smooth story to tell of myself, and in all this part of my life I not only had the reputation of living in a very good family, and a family noted and respected everywhere for virtue and sobriety, and for every valuable thing; but I had the character, too, of a very sober, modest, and virtuous young woman, and such I had always been; neither had I yet any occasion to think of anything else, or to know what a temptation to wickedness meant.

But that which I was too vain of was my ruin, or rather my vanity was the cause of it. The lady in the house where I was had two sons, young gentlemen of very promising parts and of extraordinary behaviour, and it was my misfortune to be very well with them both, but they managed themselves with me in a quite different manner.

The eldest, a gay gentleman that knew the town as well as the country, and though he had levity enough to do an ill-natured thing, yet had too much judgment of things to pay dear for his pleasures; he began with that unhappy snare to all women, viz. taking notice upon all occasions how pretty I was, as he called it, how agreeable, how well carriaged, and the like, and this he contrived so subtilly, as if he had known as well how to catch a woman in his net as a partridge when he went a setting; for he would contrive to be talking this to his sisters when, though I was not by, yet when he knew I was not so far off, but that I should be sure to hear him: his sisters would return softly to him—"Hush, brother, she will hear you; she is but in the next room." Then he would put it off, and talk softer, as if he had not known it, and began to acknowledge he was wrong; and then, as if he had forgot himself, he would speak aloud again, and I, that was so well pleased to hear it, was sure to listen for it upon all occasions.

After he had thus baited his hook, and found easily enough the method how to lay it in my way, he played an opener game, and one day going by his sister's chamber when I was there, doing something about dressing her, he comes in with an air of gaiety. "O! Mrs Betty," said he to me, "how do you do, Mrs Betty? do not your cheeks burn, Mrs Betty?" I made a curtsy, and blushed, but said nothing. "What makes you talk so, brother?" says the lady. "Why," says he, "we have been talking of her below stairs this half hour." "Well," says his sister, "you cannot say harm of her, that I am sure, so it is no matter what you have been talking about."—"Nay," says he, "it is so far from talking harm of her, that we have been talking a great deal of good, and a great many fine things have been said of Mrs Betty, I assure you, and particularly that she is the handsomest young woman in Colchester, and, in short, they begin to toast her health in the town."

"I wonder at your brother," says the sister. "Betty wants but one thing, but she had as good want every thing, for the market is against our sex just now; and if a young woman have beauty, birth, breeding, wit, sense, manners, modesty, and all these to an extreme, yet if she have not money, she is nobody; she had as good want them all, for nothing but money now recommends a woman; the men play the game all into their own hands."

Her younger brother, who was by, cried, "Hold, sister; you run too fast; I am an exception to your rule, I assure you. If I find a woman so accomplished as you talk of, I say, I assure you, I would not trouble myself about the money."

"O," says the sister, "but you will take care not to fancy one of them without the money."

"You do not know that neither," says the brother.

"But why sister," says the elder brother, "why do you exclaim so at the men, for aiming so much at the fortune? You are none of them that want a fortune, whatever else you want."

"I understand you, brother," replies the lady very smartly. "You suppose I have the money, and want the beauty; but as times go now, the first will do without the last, so I have the better of my neighbours."

"Well," says the younger brother, "but your neighbours, as you call them, may be even with you, for beauty will steal a husband sometimes in spite of money, and when the maid chances to be handsomer than the mistress, she oftentimes makes as good a market, and rides in a coach before her."

I thought it was time for me to withdraw, and leave them, and I did so; but not so far but that I heard all their discourse, in which I heard abundance of fine things said of myself, which served to prompt my vanity. But this I soon found was not the way to increase my interest in the family; for the sister and the younger brother fell grievously out about it; and as he said some very disobliging things to her upon my account, so I could easily see that she resented them, by her future conduct to me, which indeed was very unjust to me, for I had never had the least thought of what she suspected as to her younger brother. Indeed the elder brother, in his distant remote way, had said a great many things, as in jest, which I had the folly to believe were in earnest, or to flatter myself with the hopes of what I ought to have supposed he never intended, and perhaps never thought of.

It happened one day that he came running up stairs towards the room where his sisters used to sit and work, as he often used to do, and calling to them before he came in, as was his way too, I being there alone, stepped to the door, and said, "Sir, the ladies are not here; they are walked down the garden." As I stepped forward to say this, towards the door, he was just got to the door, and clasping me in his arms, as if it had been by chance, "O! Mrs Betty," says he, "are you here? That is better still. I want to speak with you more than I do to them;" and then having me in his arms, he kissed me three or four times.

I struggled to get away, and yet did it but faintly neither, and he held me fast and still kissed me, till he was almost out of breath, and then sitting down, says, "Dear Betty, I am in love with you."

His words, I must confess, fired my blood; all my spirits flew about my heart, and put me into disorder enough, which he might easily have seen in my face. He repeated it afterwards several times, that he was in love with me, and my heart spoke as plain as a voice, that I liked it. Nay, whenever he said I am in love with you, my blushes replied, would you were, sir.

However, nothing else passed at this time; it was but a surprise, and when he was gone, I soon recovered myself again. He had stayed longer with me, but he happened to look out at the window, and see his sisters coming up the garden; so he took his leave, kissed me again, told me he was very serious, and I should hear more of him very quickly, and away he went, leaving me infinitely pleased, though surprised; and had there not been one misfortune in it, I had been in the right; but the mistake lay here, that Mrs Betty was in earnest, and the gentleman was not.

From this time my head run upon strange things, and I may truly say I was not myself, to have such a gentleman talk to me of being in love with me, and of my being such a charming creature, as he told me I was. These were things I knew not how to bear; my vanity was elevated to the last degree; it is true, I had my head full of pride, but knowing nothing of the wickedness of the times, I had not one thought of my own safety, or of my virtue about me; and had my young master offered it at first sight, he might have taken any liberty he thought fit with me; but he did not see his advantage, which was my happiness for that time.

After this attack, it was not long but he found an opportunity to catch me again, and almost in the same posture; indeed, it had more of design in it on his part, though not on my part. It was thus:—the young ladies were all gone a-visiting with their mother; his brother was out of town; and as for his father, he had been in London for a week before. He had so well watched me, that he knew where I was, though I did not so much as know that he was in the house; and he briskly comes up stairs, and seeing me at work comes into the room to me directly, and began just as he did before, with taking me in his arms and kissing me for almost a quarter of an hour together.

It was the youngest sister's chamber that I was in, and as there was nobody in the house but the maids below stairs, he was, it may be, the ruder: in short, he began to be in earnest with me indeed; perhaps he found me a little too easy, for God knows, I made no resistance to him while he only held me in his arms and kissed me; indeed, I was too well pleased with it to resist him much.

However, as it were, tired with that kind of work, we sat down, and there he talked with me a great while; he said he was charmed with me, and that he could not rest night or day till he had told me how he was in love with me; and if I was able to love him again, and would make him happy, I should be the saving of his life, and many such fine things. I said little to him again, but easily discovered I was a fool, and that I did not in the least perceive what he meant.

Then he walked about the room, and taking me by the hand, I walked with him; and by and by, taking his advantage, he threw me down upon the bed, and kissed me there most violently; but to give him his due, offered no manner of rudeness to me, only kissed me a great while. After this he thought he had heard somebody come up stairs; so he got off from the bed, lifted me up, professing a great deal of love for me, but told me it was all an honest affection, and that he meant no ill to me; and with that he put five guineas into my hand, and went down stairs.

I was more confounded with the money than I was before with the love, and began to be so elevated, that I scarce knew the ground I stood on. I am the more particular in this part, that if my story comes to be read by any innocent young body, they may learn from it to guard themselves against the mischiefs which attend an early knowledge of their own beauty. If a young woman once thinks herself handsome, she never doubts the truth of any man that tells her he is in love with her; for if she believes herself charming enough to captivate him, it is natural to expect the effects of it.

This young gentleman had fired his inclination as much as he had my vanity, and as if he had found that he had an opportunity, and was sorry he did not take hold of it, he comes up again in half an hour, or thereabouts, and falls to work with me again as before, only with a little less introduction.

And first when he entered the room, he turned about and shut the door. "Mrs Betty," said he, "I fancied before somebody was coming up stairs, but it was not so; however," adds he, "if they find me in the room with you, they shan't catch me kissing you." I told him I did not know who should be coming up stairs, for I believed there was nobody in the house but the cook and the other maid, and they never came up those stairs. "Well, my dear," says he, "it is good, to be sure, however;" and so he sits down, and we began to talk; and now, though I was still all on fire with his first visit, and said little, he did, as it were, put words in my mouth, telling me how passionately he loved me, and that though he could not mention such a thing till he came to his estate, yet he was resolved to make me happy then, and himself too; that is to say, to marry me, and abundance of such fine things, which I, poor fool, did not understand the drift of, but acted as if there was no such thing as any kind of love but that which tended to matrimony; and if he had spoke of that, I had no room, as well as no power to have said no; but we were not come that length yet.

We had not sat long, but he got up, and stopped my very breath with kisses, threw me upon the bed again; but then, being both well warmed, he went farther with me than decency permits me to mention, nor had it been in my power to have denied him at that moment, had he offered much more than he did.

However, though he took these freedoms with me, it did not go to that which they call the last favour, which, to do him justice, he did not attempt; and he made that self-denial of his a plea for all his freedoms with me upon other occasions after this. When this was over, he stayed but a little while, but he put almost a handful of gold in my hand, and left me, making a thousand protestations of his passion for me, and of his loving me above all the women in the world.

It will not be strange if I now began to think, but alas! it was but very little solid reflection: I had a most unbounded stock of vanity and pride, and but a very little stock of virtue; I did indeed cast sometimes with myself what my young master aimed at, but thought of nothing but the fine words and the gold; whether he intended to marry me, or not to marry me, seemed a matter of no great consequence to me, nor did my thoughts so much as suggest to me the necessity of making any capitulation for myself, till he came to make a kind of formal proposal to me, as you shall hear presently.

Thus I gave up myself to a readiness of being ruined without the least concern, and am a fair memento to all young women whose vanity prevails over their virtue. Nothing was ever so stupid on both sides: had I acted as became me, and resisted as virtue and honour required, this gentleman had either desisted his attacks, finding no room to expect the accomplishment of his design, or had made fair and honourable proposals of marriage; in which case, whoever had blamed him nobody could have blamed me. In short, if he had known me, and how easy the trifle he aimed at was to be had, he would have troubled his head no farther, but have given me four or five guineas, and have lain with me the next time he had come at me; on the other hand, if I had known his thoughts, and how hard he thought I would be to be gained, I might have made my own terms with him; and if I had not capitulated for an immediate marriage, I might for a maintenance till marriage, and might have had what I would, for he was already rich to excess, besides what he had in expectation; but I had wholly abandoned all such thoughts as these, and was taken up only with the pride of my beauty, and of being beloved by such a gentleman; as for the gold I spent whole hours in looking upon it, I told the guineas over and over a thousand times a day; never poor vain creature was so wrapt up with every part of the story as I was, not considering what was before me, and how near my ruin was at the door; indeed, I think I rather wished for that ruin than studied to avoid it.

In the meantime, however, I was cunning enough not to give the least room to any in the family to suspect me, or to imagine that I had the least correspondence with him; I scarce ever looked towards him in public, or answered if he spoke to me, if anybody was near us; but for all that we had every now and then a little encounter, where we had room for a word or two, and now and then a kiss, but no fair opportunity for the mischief intended; and especially considering that he made more circumlocution than if he had known my thoughts he had occasion for, and the work appearing difficult to him he really made it so.

But as the devil is an unwearied tempter, so he never fails to find opportunity for that wickedness he invites to. It was one evening that I was in the garden with his two younger sisters and himself, and all very innocently merry, when he found means to convey a note into my hand, by which he directed me to understand that he would tomorrow desire me publicly to go of an errand for him into the town, and that I should see him somewhere by the way.

Accordingly after dinner he very gravely says to me, his sisters being all by, "Mrs Betty, I must ask a favour of you."—"What is that?" says his second sister. "Nay, sister," says he, very gravely, "if you cannot spare Mrs Betty to-day, any other time will do."—"Yes," they said, they could spare her well enough, and the sister begged pardon for asking, which she did of mere course, without any meaning. "Well, but, brother," says the eldest sister, "you must tell Mrs Betty what it is; if it be any private business that we must not hear, you may call her out; there she is."—"Why, sister," says the gentleman, very gravely, "what do you mean? I only desire her to go into the High street (and then he pulls out a turnover), to such a shop," and he tells them a long story of two fine neckcloths he had bid money for, and he wanted to have me go and make an errand to buy a neck to the turnover that he showed, to see if they would take my money for the neckcloths, to bid a shilling more, and haggle with them; and then he made more errands, and so continued to have such petty business to do, that I should be sure to stay a good while.

When he had given me my errands, he told them a long story of a visit he was going to make to a family they all knew, and where was to be such and such gentlemen, and how merry they were to be, and very formally asked his sisters to go with him, and they as formally excused themselves, because of company that they had notice was to come and visit them that afternoon, which by the way he had contrived on purpose.

He had scarce done speaking to them, and giving me my errand, but his man came up to tell him that Sir W—— H——'s coach stopped at the door; so he runs down and comes up again immediately. "Alas!" says he aloud, "there is all my mirth spoiled at once; Sir W—— has sent his coach for me, and desires to speak with me upon some earnest business."

It seems this Sir W—— was a gentleman who lived about three miles out of town, to whom he had spoken on purpose the day before, to lend him his chariot for a particular occasion, and had appointed it to call for him, as it did about three o'clock.

Immediately he calls for his best wig, hat, and sword, and ordering his man to go to the other place to make his excuse (that was to say, he made an excuse to send his man away), prepares to go into the coach. As he was going, he stopped a while, and speaks mighty earnestly to me about his business, and finds an opportunity to say very softly to me, "Come away, my dear, as soon as ever you can." I said nothing, but made a curtsy, as if I had done so to what he said in public. In about a quarter of an hour I went out too. I had no dress other than before, except that I had a hood, a mask, fan, and a pair of gloves in my pocket, so that there was not the least suspicion in the house. He waited for me in the coach in a back lane, which he knew I must pass, and had directed the coachman whither to go, which was to a place called Mile-End, where lived a confidant of his, where we went in, and where was all the convenience in the world to be as wicked as we pleased.

When we were together, he began to talk very gravely to me, and tell me he did not bring me there to betray me; that his passion for me would not suffer him to abuse me; that he resolved to marry me as soon as he came to his estate; that in the meantime, if I would grant his request, he would maintain me very honourably, and made me a thousand protestations of his sincerity and of his affection to me, and that he would never abandon me, and, as I may say, made a thousand more preambles than he need to have done.

However, as he pressed me to speak, I told him I had no reason to question the sincerity of his love to me, after so many protestations. But —, and there I stopped, as if I left him to guess at the rest. "But what, my dear?" says he; "I guess what you mean; what if you should be with child; is not that it? Why then," says he, "I will take care of you, and provide for you and the child too, and that you may see I am not in jest," says he, "here is an earnest for you;" and with that he pulls out a silk purse, with an hundred guineas in it, and gave it me; "and I will give you such another," says he, "every year till I marry you."

My colour came and went at the sight of the purse and with the fire of his proposal together; so that I could not say a word, and he easily perceived it; so, putting the purse into my bosom, I made no more resistance to him, but let him do just what he pleased, and as often as he pleased; and thus I finished my own destruction at once, for from this day, being forsaken of my virtue and my modesty, I had nothing of value left to recommend me, either to God's blessing or man's assistance.

But things did not end here; I went back to the town, did the business he publicly directed me to, and was at home before anybody thought me long. As for my gentleman, he stayed out, as he told me he would, till late at night, and there was not the least suspicion in the family, either on his account or on mine.

We had after this frequent opportunities to repeat our crime, chiefly by his contrivance; especially at home, when his mother and the young ladies went abroad a-visiting, which he watched so narrowly as never to miss; knowing always beforehand when they went out, and then failed not to catch me all alone, and securely enough; so that we took our fill of our wicked pleasure for near half a year, and yet, which was the most to my satisfaction, I was not with child.

But before this half year was expired, his younger brother, of whom I have made some mention in the beginning of the story, falls to work with me, and he finding me alone in the garden one evening, begins a story of the same kind to me, made good honest professions of being in love with me, and, in short, proposes fairly and honourably to marry me, and that before he made any other offer to me at all.

I was now confounded and driven to such an extremity as the like was never known; at least not to me. I resisted the proposal with obstinacy, and now I began to arm myself with arguments: I laid before him the inequality of the match, the treatment I should meet with in the family, the ingratitude it would be to his good father and mother, who had taken me into their house upon such generous principles, and when I was in such a low condition; and, in short, I said everything to dissuade him from his design that I could imagine, except telling him the truth, which would indeed have put an end to it all, but that I durst not think of mentioning.

But here happened a circumstance that I did not expect indeed, which put me to my shifts; for this young gentleman, as he was plain and honest, so he pretended to nothing with me but what was so too; and knowing his own innocence, he was not so careful to make his having a kindness for Mrs Betty a secret in the house as his brother was; and though he did not let them know that he had talked to me about it, yet he said enough to let his sisters perceive he loved me, and his mother saw it too, which though they took no notice of it to me, yet they did to him, and immediately I found their carriage to me altered more than ever before.

I saw the cloud, though I did not foresee the storm. It was easy, I say, to see that their carriage to me was altered, and that it grew worse and worse every day; till at last I got information among the servants that I should, in a very little while, be desired to remove.

I was not alarmed at the news, having a full satisfaction that I should be otherwise provided for; and especially, considering that I had reason every day to expect I should be with child, and that then I should be obliged to remove without any pretence for it.

After some time, the younger gentleman took an opportunity to tell me that the kindness he had for me had got vent in the family; he did not charge me with it, he said, for he knew well enough which way it came out; he told me his plain way of talking had been the occasion of it, for that he did not make his respect for me so much a secret as he might have done, and the reason was, that he was at a point; that if I would consent to have him, he would tell them all openly that he loved me, and that he intended to marry me; that it was true his father and mother might resent it, and be unkind, but that he was now in a way to live, being bred to the law, and he did not fear maintaining me, agreeable to what I should expect; and that, in short, as he believed I would not be ashamed of him, so he was resolved not to be ashamed of me, and that he scorned to be afraid to own me now, who he resolved to own after I was his wife, and therefore I had nothing to do but to give him my hand, and he would answer for all the rest.

I was now in a dreadful condition indeed, and now I repented heartily my easiness with the elder brother, not from any reflection of conscience, but from a view of the happiness I might have enjoyed, and had now made impossible; for though I had no great scruples of conscience (as I have said) to struggle with, yet I could not think of being a whore to one brother, and a wife to the other; but then it came into my thoughts, that the first brother had promised to make me his wife when he came to his estate; but I presently remembered what I had often thought of, that he had never spoken a word of having me for a wife after he had conquered me for a mistress; and indeed till now, though I said I thought of it often, yet it gave me no disturbance at all, for as he did not seem in the least to lessen his affection to me, so neither did he lessen his bounty, though he had the discretion himself to desire me not to lay out a penny of what he gave me in clothes, or to make the least show extraordinary, because it would necessarily give jealousy in the family, since everybody knew I could come at such things no manner of ordinary way, but by some private friendship, which they would presently have suspected.

But I was now in a great strait, and really knew not what to do; the main difficulty was this, the younger brother not only laid close siege to me, but suffered it to be seen; he would come into his sister's room and his mother's room, and sit down and talk a thousand kind things of me, and to me, even before their faces, and when they were all there. This grew so public, that the whole house talked of it, and his mother reproved him for it, and their carriage to me appeared quite altered; in short, his mother had let fall some speeches, as if she intended to put me out of the family, that is, in English, to turn me out of doors. Now I was sure this could not be a secret to his brother, only, that he might not think, as indeed nobody else yet did, that the youngest brother had made any proposal to me about it; but as I easily could see that it would go farther, so I saw likewise there was an absolute necessity to speak of it to him, or that he would speak of it to me, and which to do first I knew not; that is, whether I should break it to him, or let it alone till he should break it to me.

Upon serious consideration, for indeed now I began to consider things very seriously, and never till now; I say upon serious consideration, I resolved to tell him of it first, and it was not long before I had an opportunity, for the very next day his brother went to London upon some business, and the family being out a-visiting, just as it had happened before, and as indeed was often the case, he came according to his custom to spend an hour or two with Mrs Betty.

When he came and had sat down a while, he easily perceived there was an alteration in my countenance, that I was not so free and pleasant with him as I used to be, and particularly that I had been a-crying; he was not long before he took notice of it, and asked me in very kind terms what was the matter, and if anything troubled me. I would have put it off if I could, but it was not to be concealed, so after suffering many importunities to draw that out of me which I longed as much as possible to disclose, I told him that it was true something did trouble me, and something of such a nature that I could not conceal from him, and yet, that I could not tell how to tell him of it neither; that it was a thing that not only surprised me, but greatly perplexed me, and that I knew not what course to take, unless he would direct me. He told me with great tenderness, that let it be what it would I should not let it trouble me, for he would protect me from all the world.

I then began at a distance, and told him I was afraid the ladies had got some secret information of our correspondence, for that it was easy to see that their conduct was very much changed towards me, and that now it was come to that pass, that they frequently found fault with me, and sometimes fell quite out with me, though I never gave them the least occasion; that whereas I used always to lie with the eldest sister, I was put to lie by myself, or with one of the maids; and that I had overheard them several times talking very unkindly about me; but that which confirmed it all was, that one of the servants had told me that she had heard I was to be turned out, and that it was not safe for the family that I should be any longer in the house.

He smiled when he heard all this, and I asked him how he could make so light of it, when he must needs know, that if there was any discovery I was undone for ever, and that even it would hurt him, though not ruin him, as it would me; I upbraided him, that he was like all the rest of the sex, that when they had the character and honour of a woman at their mercy, oftentimes made it their jest, and at least looked upon it as a trifle, and counted the ruin of those they had had their will of as a thing of no value.

He saw me warm and serious, and he changed his style immediately; he told me he was sorry I should have such a thought of him; that he had never given me the least occasion for it, but had been as tender of my reputation as he could be of his own; that he was sure our correspondence had been managed with so much address, that not one creature in the family had so much as a suspicion of it; that if he smiled when I told him my thoughts, it was at the assurance he lately received, that our understanding one another was not so much as known or guessed at, and that when he had told me how much reason he had to be easy, I should smile as he did, for he was very certain it would give me a full satisfaction.

"This is a mystery I cannot understand," says I, "or how it should be to my satisfaction that I am to be turned out of doors; for if our correspondence is not discovered, I know not what else I have done to change the countenances of the whole family to me, or to have them treat me as they do now, who formerly used me with so much tenderness, as if I had been one of their own children."

"Why, look you, child," says he, "that they are uneasy about you, that is true; but that they have the least suspicion of the case as it is, and as it respects you and I, is so far from being true, that they suspect my brother Robin, and, in short, they are fully persuaded he makes love to you. Nay, the fool has put it into their heads too himself, for he is continually bantering them about it and making a jest of himself; I confess I think he is wrong to do so, because he cannot but see that it vexes them, and makes them unkind to you; but it is a satisfaction to me, because of the assurance it gives me that they do not suspect me in the least; and I hope this will be to your satisfaction too."

"So it is," says I, "one way, but this does not reach my case at all; nor is this the chief thing that troubles me, though I have been concerned about that too." "What is it, then?" says he. With which I fell into tears, and could say nothing to him at all. He strove to pacify me all he could, but began at last to be very pressing upon me to tell what it was. At last I answered that I thought I ought to tell him too, and that he had some right to know it; besides that I wanted his direction in the case, for I was in such perplexity that I knew not what course to take, and then I related the whole affair to him. I told him how imprudently his brother had managed himself, in making himself so public; for that if he had kept a secret, as such a thing ought to have been, I could but have denied him positively, without giving any reason for it, and he would in time have ceased his solicitations; but that he had the vanity, first, to depend upon it that I would not deny him, and then had taken the freedom to tell his resolution of having me to the whole house.

I told him how far I had resisted him, and told him how sincere and honourable his offers were. "But," says I, "my case will be doubly hard; for, as they carry it ill to me now, because he desires to have me, they will carry it worse when they find I have denied him, and they will presently say there is something else in it, and then out it comes that I am married already to somebody else, or else that I would never refuse a match so much above me as this was."

This discourse surprised him indeed very much. He told me that it was a critical point indeed for me to manage, and he did not see which way I should get out of it; but he would consider of it, and let me know next time we met what resolution he was come to about it; and, in the meantime, desired I would not give my consent to his brother, nor yet give him a flat denial, but that I would hold him in suspense awhile.

I seemed to start at his saying I should not give him my consent. I told him he knew very well I had no consent to give; that he had engaged himself to marry me, and that my consent was at the same time engaged to him; that he had all along told me I was his wife, and I looked upon myself as effectually so as if the ceremony had passed, and that it was from his own mouth that I did so, he having all along persuaded me to call myself his wife.

"Well, my dear," says he, "don't be concerned at that now. If I am not your husband, I will be as good as a husband to you; and do not let those things trouble you now, but let me look a little further into this affair, and I shall be able to say more next time we meet."

He pacified me as well as he could with this, but I found he was very thoughtful, and that though he was very kind to me, and kissed me a thousand times, and more, I believe, and gave me money too, yet offered no more all the while we were together, which was above two hours, and which I much wondered at indeed at that time, considering how it used to be, and what opportunity we had.

His brother did not come from London for five or six days, and it was two days more before he got an opportunity to talk with him; but then, getting him by himself, he began to talk very close to him about it, and the same evening got an opportunity (for we had a long conference together) to repeat all their discourse to me, which was, as near as I can remember, to the purpose following:—"He told him he heard strange news of him since he went, viz., that he made love to Mrs Betty. "Well," says his brother, a little angrily, "and so I do; and what then? What has anybody to do with that?" "Nay," says his brother, "do not be angry, Robin; I do not pretend to have anything to do with it, nor do I pretend to be angry with you about it; but I find they do concern themselves about it, and that they have used the poor girl ill about it, which I should take as done to myself." "Who do you mean by they?" says Robin. "I mean my mother and the girls," says the elder brother.

"But hark ye," says his brother, "are you in earnest; do you really love the girl? you may be free with me you know." "Why, then, says Robin, "I will be free with you; I do love her above all the women in the world, and I will have her, let them say and do what they will: I believe the girl will not deny me."

It struck me to the heart when he told me this, for though it was most rational to think I would not deny him, yet I knew in my own conscience I must deny him, and I saw my ruin in my being obliged to do so, but I knew it was my business to talk otherwise then, so I interrupted him in his story thus:

"Ay," said I, "does he think I cannot deny him? but he shall find I can deny him for all that."

"Well, my dear," says he, "but let me give you the whole story as it went on between us, and then say what you will."

Then he went on and told me, that he replied thus: "But brother, you know she has nothing, and you may have several ladies with good fortunes." "It is no matter for that," said Robin; "I love the girl, and I will never please my pocket in marrying, and not please my fancy. And so, my dear," adds he, "there is no opposing him."

"Yes, yes," says I, "you shall see I can oppose him; I have learnt to say no now, though I had not learnt it before; if the best lord in the land offered me marriage now, I could very cheerfully say no to him."

"Well, but, my dear," says he, "what can you say to him? You know, as you said when we talked of it before, he will ask you many questions about it, and all the house will wonder what the meaning of it should be."

"Why," says I, smiling, "I can stop all their mouths at one clap by telling him, and them too, that I am married already to his elder brother."

He smiled a little at the word, but I could see it startled him, and he could not hide the disorder it put him into; however he returned—

"Why, though that may be true in some sense, yet I suppose you are but in jest when you talk of giving such an answer as that, it may not be convenient on many accounts."

"No, no," says I pleasantly, "I am not so fond of letting the secret come out, without your consent."

"But what then can you say to him, or to them," says he, "when they find you positive against a match which would be apparently so much to your advantage?"

"Why," says I, "should I be at a loss? First of all, I am not obliged to give them any reason at all; on the other hand, I may tell them I am married already, and stop there; and that will be a full stop too to him, for he can have no reason to ask one question after it."

"Ay," says he, "but the whole house will tease you about that, even to father and mother, and if you deny them positively, they will be disobliged at you, and suspicious besides."

"Why," says I, "what can I do? what would you have me do? I was in strait enough before; and, as I told you, I was in perplexity before, and acquainted you with the circumstances, that I might have your advice."

"My dear," says he, "I have been considering very much upon it, you may be sure, and though it is a piece of advice that has a great many mortifications in it to me, and may at first seem strange to you, yet all things considered, I see no better way for you than to let him go on, and if you find him hearty and in earnest, marry him."

I gave him a look full of horror at those words, and turning pale as death, was at the very point of sinking down out of the chair I sat in; when giving a start, "My dear," says he aloud, "what is the matter with you? Where are you a going?" and a great many such things, and with jogging and calling to me, he fetched me a little to myself, though it was a good while before I fully recovered my senses, and was not able to speak for several minutes more.

When I was fully recovered he began again: "My dear," says he, "what made you so surprised at what I said, I would have you consider seriously of it? You may see plainly how the family stand in this case, and they would be stark mad if it was my case, as it is my brother's, and for aught I see, it would be my ruin and yours too."

"Ah!" says I, still speaking angrily, "are all your protestations and vows to be shaken by the dislike of the family? Did I not always object that to you, and you made a light thing of it, as what you were above, and would not value, and is it come to this now?" said I. "Is this your faith and honour, your love, and the solidity of your promises?"

He continued perfectly calm, notwithstanding all my reproaches, and I was not sparing of them at all; but he replied at last, "My dear, I have not broken one promise with you yet; I did tell you I would marry you when I was come to my estate; but you see my father is a hale, healthy man, and may live these thirty years still, and not be older than several are around us in the town, and you never proposed my marrying you sooner, because you know it might be my ruin, and as to all the rest, I have not failed you in anything, you have wanted for nothing."

I could not deny a word of this, and had nothing to say to it in general; "But why then," says I, "can you persuade me to such a horrid step as leaving you, since you have not left me? Will you allow no affection, no love on my side, where there has been so much on your side? Have I made you no returns? Have I given no testimony of my sincerity, and of my passion? Are the sacrifices I have made of honour and modesty to you no proof of my being tied to you in bonds too strong to be broken?"

"But here, my dear," says he, "you may come into a safe station, and appear with honour and with splendour at once, and the remembrance of what we have done may be wrapt up in an eternal silence, as if it had never happened; you shall always have my respect, and my sincere affection, only then it shall be honest, and perfectly just to my brother, you shall be my dear sister, as now you are my dear——" and there he stopped.

"Your dear whore," says I, "you would have said, if you had gone on, and you might as well have said it, but I understand you; however, I desire you to remember the long discourses you have had with me, and the many hours pains you have taken to persuade me to believe myself an honest woman; that I was your wife intentionally, though not in the eyes of the world, and that it was as effectual a marriage that had passed between us as if we had been publicly wedded by the parson of the parish; you know and cannot but remember that these have been your own words to me."

I found this was a little too close upon him, but I made it up in what follows. He stood stock still for awhile, and said nothing, and I went on thus—"You cannot," says I, "without the highest injustice, believe that I yielded upon all these persuasions without a love not to be questioned, not to be shaken again by anything that could happen afterward. If you have such dishonourable thoughts of me, I must ask you what foundation in any of my behaviour have I given for such a suggestion? If then I have yielded to the importunities of my affection, and if I have been persuaded to believe that I am really, and in the essence of the thing, your wife, shall I now give the lie to all those arguments, and call myself your whore, or mistress, which is the same thing? And will you transfer me to your brother? Can you transfer my affection? Can you bid me cease loving you, and bid me love him? Is it in my power, think you, to make such a change at demand? No, sir," said I, "depend upon it it is impossible, and whatever the change of your side may be I will ever be true, and I had much rather, since it is come to that unhappy length, be your whore than your brother's wife."

He appeared pleased and touched with the impression of this last discourse, and told me that he stood where he did before; that he had not been unfaithful to me in any one promise he had ever made yet, but that there were so many terrible things presented themselves to his view in the affair before me, and that on my account in particular, that he had thought of the other as a remedy so effectual, as nothing could come up to it; that he thought this would not be an entire parting us, but that we might love as friends all our days, and perhaps with more satisfaction than we should in the station we were now in, as things might happen; that he durst say I could not apprehend anything from him as to betraying a secret, which could not but be the destruction of us both, if it came out; that he had but one question to ask of me that could lie in the way of it, and if that question was answered in the negative, he could not but think still it was the only step I could take.

I guessed at his question presently, namely, whether I was sure I was not with child? As to that, I told him he need not be concerned about it, for I was not with child. "Why, then, my dear," says he, "we have no time to talk farther now, consider of it and think closely about it; I cannot but be of the opinion still, that it will be the best course you can take," and with this he took his leave, and the more hastily too, his mother and sisters ringing at the gate just at the moment that he had risen to go.

He left me in the utmost confusion of thought, and he easily perceived it the next day, and all the rest of the week, for it was but Tuesday evening when we talked; but he had no opportunity to come to me all that week till the Sunday after, when I, being indisposed, did not go to church, and he making some excuse for the like, stayed at home.

And now he had me an hour and a half again by myself, and we fell into the same arguments all over again, or at least so near the same, as it would be to no purpose to repeat them; at last I asked him warmly what opinion he must have of my modesty, that he could suppose I should so much as entertain a thought of lying with two brothers? And assured him it could never be. I added, if he was to tell me that he would never see me more, than which nothing but death could be more terrible, yet I could never entertain a thought so dishonourable as this to myself, and so base to him; and therefore I entreated him, if he had one grain of respect or affection left for me, that he would speak no more of it to me, or that he would pull his sword out and kill me. He appeared surprised at my obstinacy, as he called it; told me I was unkind to myself and unkind to him in it; that it was a crisis unlooked for upon us both, and impossible for either of us to foresee; but that he did not see any other way to save us both from ruin, and therefore he thought it the more unkind; but that if he must say no more of it to me, he added with an unusual coldness, that he did not know anything else we had to talk of; and so he rose up to take his leave. I rose up too, as if with the same indifference, but when he came to give me as it were a parting kiss, I burst out into such a passion of crying, that though I would have spoke I could not, and only pressing his hand, seemed to give him the adieu, but cried vehemently.

He was sensibly moved with this; so he sat down again and said a great many kind things to me, to abate the excess of my passion; but still urged the necessity of what he had proposed, all the while insisting that if I did refuse he would, notwithstanding, provide for me; but letting me plainly see that he would decline me in the main point, nay, even as a mistress; making it a point of honour not to lie with a woman that, for ought he knew, might come to be his brother's wife.

The bare loss of him as a gallant was not so much my affliction as the loss of his person, whom indeed I loved to distraction, and the loss of all the expectations I had, and which I always had built my hopes upon, of having him one day for my husband. These things oppressed my mind so much that, in short, I fell very ill; the agonies of my mind, in a word, threw me into a high fever, and so long it was that none in the family expected my life.

I was reduced very low indeed, and was often delirious and light-headed; but nothing lay so near me as the fear, that when I was light-headed I should say something or other to his prejudice. I was distressed in my mind also to see him, and so was he to see me, for he really loved me most passionately. But it could not be; there was not the least room to desire it, on one side or other, or so much as to make it decent.

It was near five weeks that I kept my bed, and though the violence of my fever abated in three weeks, yet it several times returned, and the physicians said two or three times they could do no more for me, but that they must leave nature and the distemper to fight it out, only strengthening the first with cordials to maintain the struggle. After the end of five weeks I grew better, but was so weak, so altered, so melancholy, and recovered so slowly, that the physicians apprehended I should go into a consumption, and which vexed me most, they gave it as their opinion that my mind was oppressed, that something troubled me, and in short, that I was in love. Upon this the whole house was set upon me to examine me and to press me to tell whether I was in love or not, and with who? But, as I well might, I denied my being in love at all.

They had, on this occasion, a squabble one day about me at table, that had like to have put the whole family in an uproar, and for some time did so. They happened to be all at table but the father; as for me, I was ill, and in my chamber. At the beginning of the talk, which was just as they had finished their dinner, the old gentlewoman who had sent me somewhat to eat, called her maid to go up and ask me if I would have any more; but the maid brought down word I had not eaten half what she had sent me already.

"Alas," says the old lady, "that poor girl, I am afraid she will never be well."

"Well!" says the elder brother, "how should Mrs Betty be well, they say she is in love?"

"I believe nothing of it," says the old gentlewoman.

"I do not know," says the eldest sister, "what to say to it; they have made such a rout about her being so handsome, and so charming, and I know not what, and that in her hearing too, that has turned the creature's head, I believe; and who knows what possessions may follow such doings? For my part, I do not know what to make of it."

"Why, sister, you must acknowledge she is very handsome," says the elder brother.

"Ah, and a great deal handsomer than you sister," says Robin, "and that is your mortification."

"Well, well, that is not the question," says his sister, "the girl is well enough, and she knows it well enough; she need not be told of it to make her vain."

"We are not talking of her being vain," says the eldest brother, "but of her being in love; it may be she is in love with herself, it seems my sisters think so."

"I would she was in love with me," says Robin, "I would quickly put her out of her pain."

"What do ye mean, son?" says the old lady. "How can you talk so?"

"Why, madam," says Robin again, very honestly, "do you think I would let the poor girl die for love, and of one that is near at hand to be had too?"

"Fie, brother," says the second sister, "How can you talk so? Would you take a creature that has not a groat in the world?"

"Pr'ythee, child," says Robin, "beauty is a portion, and good-humour with it, is a double portion; I wish thou hadst half her stock of both for thy portion." So there was her mouth stopped.

"I find," says the eldest sister, "if Betty is not in love, my brother is; I wonder he has not broke his mind to Betty, I warrant she will not say no."

"They that yield when they are asked," says Robin, "are one step before them that were never asked to yield, sister, and two steps before them that yield before they are asked; and that is an answer to you, sister."

This fired the sister, and she flew into a passion, and said, "Things were come to that pass, that it was time the wench, meaning me, was out of the family, and but that she was not fit to be turned out; she hoped her father and mother would consider of it, as soon as she could be removed."

Robin replied, "That was the business of the master and mistress of the family, who were not to be taught by one that had so little judgment as his eldest sister."

It run up a great deal farther; the sister scolded, Robin rallied and bantered, but poor Betty lost ground by it extremely in the family. I heard of it, and cried heartily, and the old lady came up to me, somebody having told her that I was so much concerned about it. I complained to her, that it was very hard the doctors should pass such a censure upon me, for which they had no ground, and that it was still harder, considering the circumstances I was under in the family; that I hoped I had done nothing to lessen her esteem for me, or given any occasion for the bickering between her sons and daughters, and I had more need think of a coffin than of being in love, and begged she would not let me suffer in her opinion for anybody's mistakes but my own.

She was sensible of the justice of what I said, but told me, since there had been such a clamour among them, and that her younger son talked after such a rattling way as he did; she desired I would be so faithful to her as to answer her but one question sincerely. I told her I would with all my heart, and with the utmost plainness and sincerity. Why then the question was, "Whether there was anything between her son Robert and me?" I told her, with all the pro-testation of sincerity that I was able to make, and as I might well do, that there was not, nor ever had been. I told her that Mr Robert had rattled and jested, as she knew it was his way, and that I took it always as I suppose he meant it, to be a wild airy way of discourse, that had no signification in it; and again assured her that there was not the least tittle of what she understood by it between us; and that those who had suggested it had done me a great deal of wrong, and Mr Robert no service at all.

The old lady was fully satisfied, and kissed me, spoke cheerfully to me, and bid me take care of my health, and want for nothing, and so took her leave; but when she came down, she found the brother and all his sisters together by the ears. They were angry even to passion at his upbraiding them with their being homely, and having never had any sweetheart, never having been asked the question, and their being so forward as almost to ask first. He rallied them upon the subject of Mrs Betty; how pretty, how good-humoured, how she sung better than they did, and danced better, and how much handsomer she was; and in doing this he omitted no ill-natured thing that could vex them, and, indeed, pushed too hard upon them. The old lady came down in the height of it, and to put a stop to it, told them all the discourse she had with me, and how I answered that there was nothing between Mr Robert and I.

"She is wrong there," says Robin, "for if there was not a great deal between us, we should be closer together than we are; I told her I loved her dearly," says he, "but I could never make the jade believe I was in earnest."

"I do not know how you should," says his mother, "nobody in their senses could believe you were in earnest to talk so to a poor girl, whose circumstances you know so well. But pr'ythee, son," adds she, "since you tell me that you cannot make her believe you were in earnest, what must we believe about it; for you ramble so in your discourse that nobody knows whether you are in earnest or in jest? But as I find the girl, by your confession, has answered truly, I wish you would do so too, and tell me seriously, so that I may depend upon it. Is there any thing in it, or no? Are you in earnest, or no? Are you distracted indeed, or are you not? It is a weighty question, and I wish you would make us easy about it."

"By my faith, madam," says Robin, "it is in vain to mince the matter, or tell any more lies about it, I am in earnest as much as a man is that is going to be hanged. If Mrs Betty would say she loved me, and that she would marry me, I'd have her to-morrow morning fasting; and say, 'To have and to hold,' instead of eating my breakfast."

"Well," says the mother, "then there is one son lost;" and she said it in a very mournful tone, as one greatly concerned at it.

"I hope not, madam," says Robin, "no man is lost when a good wife has found him."

"Why, but child," says the old lady, "she is a beggar."

"Why then, madam, she has the more need of charity," says Robin; "I will take her off the hands of the parish, and she and I will beg together."

"It's bad jesting with such things," says the mother.

"I do not jest, madam," says Robin, "we will come and beg your pardon, madam, and your blessing, madam, and my father's."

"This is all out of the way, son," says the mother, "if you are in earnest you are undone."

"I am afraid not," says he, "for I am really afraid she won't have me, after all my sister's huffing and blustering; I believe I shall never be able to persuade her to it."

"That is a fine tale, indeed, she is not so far out of her senses neither; Mrs Betty is no fool," says the younger sister, "do you think she has learnt to say no, any more than other people?"

"No, Mrs Mirth-wit," says Robin, "Mrs Betty's no fool, but Mrs Betty may be engaged some other way, and what then?"

"Nay," says the eldest sister, "we can say nothing to that. Who must it be to then? She is never out of doors, it must be between you."

"I have nothing to say to that," says Robin, "I have been examined enough; there is my brother, if it must be between us, go to work with him."

This stung the elder brother to the quick, and he concluded that Robin had discovered something. However, he kept himself from appearing disturbed. "Prythee," says he, "do not go to sham your stories off upon me, I tell you I deal in no such ware; I have nothing to say to Mrs Betty, nor any of the Miss Bettys in the parish; and with that he rose up and brushed off."

"No," says the eldest sister, "I dare answer for my brother, he knows the world better."

Thus the discourse ended; but it left the elder brother confounded. He concluded his brother had made a full discovery, and he began to doubt whether I had been concerned in it or not; but with all management he could not bring it about to get at me. At last, he was so perplexed that he was quite desperate, and resolved he would come into my chamber and see me, whatever came of it. In order to this, he contrived it so, that one day after dinner, watching his eldest sister till he could see her go up stairs, he runs after her. "Hark ye, sister," says he, "where is this sick woman? May not a body see her?"—"Yes," says the sister, "I believe you may, but let me go first a little, and I will tell you." So she ran up to the door and gave me notice; and presently called to him again. "Brother," says she, "you may come if you please;" so in he came, just in the same kind of rant.

"Well," says he, at the door as he came in, "where is this sick body that is in love? How do ye do, Mrs Betty?"

"I would have got out of my chair, but was so weak I could not for a good while; and he saw it and his sister too," and she said, "Come, do not strive to stand up, my brother desires no ceremony, especially now you are so weak."—"No, no, Mrs Betty, pray sit still," says he, and so sits himself down in a chair over against me, and appeared as if he was mighty merry.

He talked a deal of rambling stuff to his sister and me, sometimes of one thing, sometimes of another, on purpose to amuse his sister: and every now and then would turn it upon the old story, directing it to me. "Poor Mrs Betty," says he, "it is a sad thing to be in love. Why it has reduced you sadly." At last I spoke a little. "I am glad to see you so merry, sir," says I, "but I think the doctor might have found something better to do than to make his game at his patients. If I had been ill of no other distemper, I know the proverb too well to have let him come to me."—"What proverb," says he? "Oh! I remember it now; what,

'Where love is the case,
The doctor's an ass.'

"Is not that it, Mrs Betty?" I smiled, and said nothing. "Nay," says he, "I think the effect has proved it to be love; for it seems the doctor has been able to do you but little service, you mend very slowly they say, I doubt there is somewhat in it, Mrs Betty; I doubt you are sick of the incurables, and that is love." I smiled, and said, "No, indeed sir, that is none of my distemper."

We had a deal of such discourse, and sometimes other that signified as little. By and by he asked me to sing them a song; at which I smiled, and said my singing days were over. At last he asked me if he should play upon his flute to me. His sister said, "She believed it would hurt me, and that my head could not bear it." I bowed, and said, "No, it would not hurt me; and pray, madam," said I, "do not hinder it, I love the music of the flute very much." Then his sister said, "Well, do then, brother." With that he pulled out the key of his closet, "Dear sister," says he, "I am very lazy, do step to my closet and fetch my flute, it lies in such a drawer, naming a place where he was sure it was not, that she might be a little while a looking for it.

As soon as she was gone he related the whole story to me of the discourse his brother had about me, and of his pushing it at him, and his concern about it, which was the reason of his contriving this visit to me. I assured him I had never opened my mouth either to his brother or anybody else. I told him the dreadful exigence I was in; that my love to him, and his offering to have me forget that affection and remove it to another, had thrown me down; and that I had a thousand times wished I might die, rather than recover, and to have the same circumstances to struggle with as I had before; and that this backwardness to life had been the great reason of the slowness of my recovering. I added, that I foresaw that as soon as I was well I must quit the family; and that as for marrying his brother, I abhorred the thoughts of it, after what had been my case with him, and that he might depend upon it I would never see his brother again upon that subject. That if he would break all his vows and oaths and engagements with me, be that between his conscience and his honour and himself; but he should never be able to say that I, who he had persuaded to call myself his wife, and who had given him the liberty to use me as a wife, was not as faithful to him as a wife ought to be, whatever he might be to me.

He was going to reply, and had said that he was sorry I could not be persuaded, and was going to say more, but he heard his sister coming, and so did I; and yet I forced out these few words as a reply, "That I could never be persuaded to love one brother and marry another." He shook his head and said, "Then I am ruined," meaning himself, and that moment his sister entered the room, and told him she could not find the flute. "Well," says he, merrily, "this laziness will not do; so he gets up and goes himself to look for it, but comes back without it too; not but that he could have found it, but because his mind was a little disturbed, and he had no mind to play; and besides, the errand he sent his sister on was answered another way, for he only wanted an opportunity to speak to me, which he gained, though not much to his satisfaction.

I had, however, a great deal of satisfaction in having spoken my mind to him with freedom, and with such an honest plainness, as I have related; and though it did not at all work the way I desired, that is to say, to oblige the person to me the more, yet it took from him all possibility of quitting me but by a downright breach of honour, and giving up all the faith of a gentleman to me, which he had so often engaged, by, never to abandon me, but to make me his wife as soon as he came to his estate.

It was not many weeks after this before I was about the house again, and began to grow well; but I continued melancholy, silent, dull, and retired, which amazed the whole family, except he that knew the reason of it; yet it was a great while before he took any notice of it, and I, as backward to speak as he, carried respectfully to him, but never offered to speak a word to him that was particular of any kind whatsoever; and this continued for sixteen or seventeen weeks, so that as I expected every day to be dismissed the family on account of what distaste they had taken another way, in which I had no guilt, so I expected to hear no more of this gentleman, after all his solemn vows and protestations, but to be ruined and abandoned.

At last I broke the way myself in the family for my removing; for being talking seriously with the old lady one day about my own circumstances in the world, and how my distemper had left a heaviness upon my spirits, that I was not the same thing I was before, the old lady said, "I am afraid, Betty, what I have said to you about my son has had some influence upon you, and that you are melancholy on his account; pray will you let me know how the matter stands with you both, if it may not be improper? for as for Robin, he does nothing but rally and banter when I speak to him."

"Why truly, madam," said I, "the matter stands as I wish it did not, and I shall be very sincere with you in it, whatever befalls me for it; Mr Robert has several times proposed marriage to me, which is what I had no reason to expect, my poor circumstances considered; but I have always resisted him, and that, perhaps, in terms more positive than became me, considering the regard that I ought to have for every branch of your family. But," said I, "madam, I could never so far forget my obligations to you and all your house, to offer to consent to a thing which I know must needs be disobliging to you, and this I have made my argument to him, and have positively told him that I would never entertain a thought of that kind, unless I had your consent and his father's also, to whom I was bound by so many invincible obligations."

"And is this possible, Mrs Betty," says the old lady? "Then you have been much juster to us than we have been to you; for we have all looked upon you as a kind of a snare to my son, and I had a proposal to make to you for your removing for fear of it; but I had not yet mentioned it to you, because I thought ye were not thoroughly well, and I was afraid of grieving you too much, lest it should throw you down again; for we have all a respect for you still, though not so much as to have it be the ruin of my son; but if it be as you say, we have all wronged you very much."

"As to the truth of what I say, madam," said I, "I refer you to your son himself; if he will do me any justice, he must tell you the story just as I have told it."

Away goes the old lady to her daughters and tells them the whole story just as I had told it her, and they were surprised at it you may be sure, as I believed they would be. One said, she could never have thought it; another said, Robin was a fool; a third said, she would not believe a word of it, and she would warrant that Robin would tell the story another way; but the old gentleman, who was resolved to go to the bottom of it, before I could have the least opportunity of acquainting her son with what had passed, resolved too that she would talk with her son immediately, and to that purpose sent for him, for he was gone but to a lawyer's house in the town upon some petty business of his own, and upon her sending he returned immediately.

Upon his coming up to them, for they were all still together, "Sit down Robin," says the old lady, "I must have some talk with you."

"With all my heart, madam," says Robin, looking very merry; "I hope it is about a good wife, for I am at a great loss in that affair."

"How can that be," says his mother; "did not you say you resolved to have Mrs Betty?"

"Ay, madam," says Robin, "but there is one that has forbid the banns."

"Forbid the banns," says his mother, "who can that be?"

"Even Mrs Betty herself," says Robin.

"How so?" says his mother. "Have you asked her the question then?"

"Yes, indeed, madam," says Robin; "I have attacked her in form five times since she was sick, and am beaten off; the jade is so stout she will not capitulate, nor yield upon any terms, except such as I cannot effectually grant."

"Explain yourself," says the mother, "for I am surprised, I do not understand you; I hope you are not in earnest."

"Why, madam," says he, "the case is plain enough upon me; it explains itself: she won't have me, she says;—is not that plain enough? I think it is plain, and pretty rough too."

"Well, but," says the mother, "you talk of conditions that you cannot grant, what, does she want a settlement? Her jointure ought to be according to her portion; but what fortune does she bring you?"

"Nay, as to fortune," says Robin, "she is rich enough; I am satisfied in that point; but it is I that am not able to come up to her terms, and she is positive she will not have me without."

Here the sisters put in. "Madam," says the second sister, "it is impossible to be serious with him; he will never give a direct answer to anything: you had better let him alone, and talk no more of it to him; you know how to dispose of her out of his way, if you thought there was anything in it."

Robin was a little warmed with his sister's rudeness, but he was even with her; and yet with good manners too. "There are two sorts of people, madam," says he, "turning to his mother, that is, a wise body and a fool; it is a little hard I should engage with both of them together."

The younger sister then put in. "We must be fools indeed," says she, "in my brother's opinion, that he should think we can believe he has seriously asked Mrs Betty to marry him, and that she has refused him."

"Answer, and answer not," says Solomon, replied her brother. "When your brother had said to your mother, that he had asked her no less than five times, and that it was so, that she positively denied him, methinks a younger sister need not question the truth of it, when her mother did not."

"My mother, you see, did not understand it," says the second sister.

"There is some difference," says Robin, "between desiring me to explain it, and telling me she did not believe it."

"Well but, son," says the old lady, "if you are disposed to let us into the mystery of it, what were these hard conditions?"

"Yes, madam," says Robin, "I had done it before now if the teasers here had not worried me by way of interruption. The conditions are, that I bring my father and you to consent to it, and without that, she protests she will never see me more upon that head; and these conditions, as I said, I suppose I shall never be able to grant; I hope my warm sisters will be answered now, and blush a little; if not, I have no more to say till I hear farther."

This answer was surprising to them all, though less to the mother, because of what I had said to her; as to the daughters, they stood mute a great while; but the mother said with some passion, "Well, I had heard this before, but I could not believe it; but if it is so, then we have all done Betty wrong, and she has behaved better than I ever expected."

"Nay," says the eldest sister, "if it is so, she has acted handsomely indeed."

"I confess," says the mother, "it was none of her fault, if he was fool enough to take a fancy to her, but to give such an answer to him, shows more respect to your father and me than I can tell how to express; I shall value the girl the better for it as long as I know her."

"But I shall not," says Robin, "unless you will give your consent."

"I will consider of that awhile," says the mother, "I assure you, if there were not some other objections in the way, this conduct of hers would go a great way to bring me to consent."

"I wish it would go quite through with it," says Robin; "if you had as much thought about making me easy as you have about making me rich, you would soon consent to it."

"Why Robin," says the mother again, "are you really in earnest? Would you so fain have her as you pretend?"

"Really, madam," says Robin, "I think it is hard you should question me upon that head, after all I have said; I won't say that I will have her, how can I resolve that point, when you see I cannot have her without your consent? Besides, I am not bound to marry at all; but this I will say I am in earnest in, that I will never have anybody else if I can help it, so you may determine for me, Betty, or nobody, is the word; and the question which of the two shall be in your breast to decide, madam; provided only, that my good-humoured sisters may have no vote in it."

All this was dreadful to me, for the mother began to yield, and Robin pressed her home in it. On the other hand, she advised with the eldest son, and he used all the arguments in the world to persuade her to consent: alleging his brother's passionate love for me, and my generous regard to the family, in refusing my own advantage, upon such a nice point of honour, and a thousand such things. And as to the father, he was a man in a hurry of public affairs, and getting money, seldom at home, thoughtful of the main chance; but left all those things to his wife.

You may easily believe, that when the plot was thus, as they thought, broke out, and that every one thought they knew how things were carried, it was not so difficult, or so dangerous, for the elder brother, who nobody suspected of anything, to have a freer access to me than before. Nay, the mother, which was just as he wished, proposed it to him to talk with Mrs Betty. "For it may be, son," said she, "you may see farther into the thing than I, and see if you think she has been so positive as Robin says she has been, or no. This was as well as he could wish, and he as it were yielding to talk with me at his mother's request, she brought me to him into her own chamber; told me her son had some business with me at her request, and desired me to be very sincere with him, and then she left us together, and he went and shut the door after her.

He came back to me and took me in his arms and kissed me very tenderly; but told me he had a long discourse to hold with me, and it was now come to that crisis that I should make myself happy or miserable, as long as I lived: that the thing was now gone so far, that if I could not comply with his desire, we should be both ruined: then he told me the whole story between Robin, as he called him, and his mother, and sisters, and himself, as it is above. "And now, dear child," says he, "consider what it will be to marry a gentleman of a good family in good circumstances, and with the consent of the whole house, and to enjoy all that the world can give you: and what, on the other hand, to be sunk into the dark circumstances of a woman that has lost her reputation, and that though I shall be a private friend to you while I live, yet, as I shall be suspected always, so you will be afraid to see me, and I shall be afraid to own you."

He gave me no time to reply, but went on with me thus : " What has happened between us, child, so long as we both agree to do so, may be buried and forgotten. I shall always be your sincere friend, without any inclination to nearer intimacy, when you become my sister; and we shall have all the honest part of conversation without any reproaches between us, of having done amiss : I beg of you to consider it, and do not stand in the way of your own safety and prosperity; and to satisfy you that I am sincere," added he, " I here offer you 500*l.* in money to make you some amends for the freedoms I have taken with you, which we shall look upon as some of the follies of our lives, which it is hoped we may repent of."

He spoke this in so much more moving terms than it is possible for me to express, and with so much greater force of argument than I can repeat, that I only recommend it to those who read the story, to suppose, that, as he held me above an hour and a half in that discourse, so he answered all my objections, and fortified his discourse with all the arguments that human wit and art could devise.

I cannot say, however, that anything he said made impression enough upon me so as to give me any thought of the matter, till he told me at last very plainly, that if I refused, he was sorry to add, that he could never go on with me in that station as we stood before; that though he loved me as well as ever, and that I was as agreeable to him as ever, yet sense of virtue had not so far forsaken him as to suffer him to lie with a woman that his brother courted to make his wife; and if he took his leave of me with a denial in this affair, whatever he might do for me in the point of support grounded on his first engagement of maintaining me, yet he would not have me be surprised that he was obliged to tell me he could not allow himself to see me any more, and that indeed I could not expect it of him.

I received this last part with some tokens of surprise and disorder, and had much ado to avoid sinking down, for indeed I loved him to an extravagance not easy to imagine; but he perceived my disorder; he entreated me to consider seriously of it, assured me that it was the only way to preserve our mutual affection, that in this station we might love as friends with the utmost passion, and with a love of relation untainted; free from our just reproaches, and free from other people's suspicions; that he should ever acknowledge his happiness owing to me; that he would be a debtor to me as long as he had breath; thus he wrought up, in short, to a kind of hesitation in the matter; having the dangers on one side represented in lively figures, and indeed heightened by my imagination of being turned out to the wide world a mere cast-off whore, for it was no less, and perhaps exposed as such, with little to provide for myself; with no friend, no acquaintance in the whole world out of that town, and there I could not pretend to stay. All this terrified me to the last degree, and he took care upon all occasions to lay it home to me in the worst colours that it could be possible to be drawn in; on the other hand, he failed not to set forth the easy prosperous life which I was going to live.

He answered all that I could object from affection, and from former engagements, with telling me the necessity that was before us of taking other measures now; and as to his promises of marriage, the nature of things, he said, had put an end to that, by the probability of my being his brother's wife, before the time to which his promises all referred.

Thus, in a word, I may say, he reasoned me out of my reason; he conquered all my arguments, and I began to see a danger that I was in, which I had not considered of before, and that was of being dropped by both of them, and left alone in the world to shift for myself.

This, and his persuasions, at length prevailed with me to consent, though with so much reluctance, that it was easy to see I should go to church like a bear to the stake. I had some little apprehension about me too, lest my new spouse, who by the way I had not the least affection for, should he be skilful enough to challenge me on another account upon our first coming to bed together; but whether he did it with design or not I know not; but his elder brother took care to make him very much fuddled before he went to bed; so that I had the satisfaction of a drunken bedfellow the first night: how he did it I know not, but I concluded that he certainly contrived it that his brother might be able to make no judgment of the difference between a maid and a married woman; nor did he ever entertain any notions of it, or disturb his thoughts about it.

I should go back a little here to where I left off; the elder brother having thus managed me, his next business was to manage his mother, and he never left till he had brought her to acquiesce, and be passive in the thing, even without acquainting the father other than by post letters, so that she consented to our marrying privately, and leaving her to manage the father afterwards.

Then he cajoled with his brother, persuaded him what service he had done him, and how he had brought his mother to consent, which, though true, was not indeed done to serve him, but to serve himself; but thus diligently did he cheat him, and had the thanks of a faithful friend for shifting off his whore into his brother's arms for a wife. So certainly does interest banish all manner of affection, and so naturally do men give up honour and justice, humanity, and even Christianity, to secure themselves.

I must now come back to brother Robin, as we always called him; who having got his mother's consent as above, came big with the news to me, and told me the whole story of it with a sincerity so visible, that I must confess it grieved me that I must be the instrument to abuse so honest a gentleman; but there was no remedy; he would have me, and I was not obliged to tell him that I was his brother's whore, though I had no other way to put him off; so I came gradually into it to his satisfaction, and behold, we were married.

Modesty forbids me to reveal the secrets of the marriage bed, but nothing could happen more suitable to my circumstances than that, as above, my husband was so fuddled when he came to bed that he could not remember in the morning whether he had had any conversation with me or not, and I was obliged to tell him he had, though in reality he had not, that I might be sure he could make no inquiry about anything else.

It concerns the story in hand very little to enter into the farther particulars of the family, or of myself, for the five years that I lived with this husband; only to observe that I had two children by him, and at the end of five years he died. He had been really a good husband to me, and we lived very agreeably together; but as he had not received much from them, and had in the little time he lived acquired no great matters, so my circumstances were not great; nor was I much mended by the match. Indeed I had preserved the elder brother's bonds to me to pay me 500*l.*, which he offered me for my consent to marry his brother; and this, with what I had saved of the money he formerly gave me, and about as much more my husband, left me a widow with about 1200*l.* in my pocket.

My two children were indeed taken happily off my hands by the husband's father and mother, and that by the way was all they got by Mrs Betty.

I confess I was not suitably affected with the loss of my husband; nor indeed can I say that I ever loved him as I ought to have done, or as was proportionable to the good usage I had from him, for he was a tender, kind, good-humoured man as any woman could desire; but his brother being so always in my sight, at least while we were in the country, was a continual snare to me; and I never was in bed with my husband, but I wished myself in the arms of his brother, and though his brother never offered me the least kindness that way, after our marriage, but carried it just as a brother ought to do; yet it was impossible for me to do so to him. In short, I committed adultery and incest with him every day in my desires, which, without doubt, was as effectually criminal in the nature of the guilt as if I had actually done it.

Before my husband died his elder brother was married, and we being then removed to London, were written to by the old lady to come, and be at the wedding; my husband went, but I pretended indisposition, and that I could not possibly travel, so I staid behind; for, in short, I could not bear the sight of his being given to another woman, though I knew I was never to have him myself.

I was now left loose to the world, and being still young and handsome, as everybody said of me, and I assure you I thought myself so, and with a tolerable fortune in my pocket, I put no small value upon myself; I was courted by several very considerable tradesmen, and particularly very warmly by one, a linen-draper, at whose house after my husband's death I took a lodging, his sister being my acquaintance; here I had all the liberty and all the opportunity to be gay, and appear in company that I could desire; my landlord's sister being one of the maddest, gayest things alive, and not so much mistress of her virtue as I thought at first she had been. She brought me into a world of wild company, and even brought home several persons, such as she liked well enough to gratify, to see her pretty widow, so she was pleased to call me, and that name I got in a little time in public; now, as "fame and fools make an assembly," I was here wonderfully caressed, had abundance of admirers, and such as called themselves lovers; but I found not one fair proposal among them all; as for their common design, that I understood too well to be drawn into any more snares of that kind. The case was altered with me, I had money in my pocket, and had nothing to say to them. I had been tricked once by that cheat called Love, but the game was over; I was resolved now to be married, or nothing, and to be well married, or not at all.

I loved the company indeed of men of mirth and wit, men of gallantry and figure, and was often entertained with such, as I was also with others; but I found, by just observation, that the brightest men came upon the dullest errand, that is to say, the dullest as to what I aimed at; on the other hand, those who came with the best proposals, were the dullest and most disagreeable part of the world; I was not averse to a tradesman, but then I would have tradesman, forsooth, that was something of a gentleman too: that when my husband had a mind to carry me to court, or to the play, he might become a sword, and look as like a gentleman as another man, and not be one that had the mark of his apron-strings upon his coat, or the mark of his hat upon his wig; that should look as if he was set on to his sword, when his sword was put on him, and that carried his trade in his countenance.

Well, at last I found this amphibious creature, this land-water thing, called a gentleman tradesman, and as a just plague upon my folly, I was caught in the very snare, which as I might say, I laid for myself, I say laid for myself, for I was not trepanned I, confess, but I betrayed myself.

This was a draper too, for though my comrade would have brought me to a bargain with her brother; yet when it came to the point, it was it seems, for a mistress, not a wife, and I kept true to this notion, that a woman should never be kept for a mistress that had money to keep herself.

Thus my pride, not my principle, my money, not my virtue, kept me honest; though, as it proved, I found I had much better have been sold by my she comrade to her brother, than have sold myself as I did to a tradesman that was a rake gentleman shopkeeper, and beggar all together.

But I was hurried on (by my fancy to a gentleman) to ruin myself in the grossest manner that ever woman did; for my new husband coming to a lump of money at once, fell into such a profusion of expense, that all I had, and all he had before, if he had anything worth mentioning, would not have held it out above one year.

He was very fond of me for about a quarter of a year, and what I got by that was, that I had the pleasure of seeing a great deal of my money spent upon myself; and, as I may say, had some of the spending it too.

"Come, my dear," says he to me one day, "shall we go and take a turn into the country for about a week?"

"Aye, my dear," says I, "whither would you go?"—"I care not whither," says he, "but I have a mind to look like quality for a week; we will go to Oxford," says he. "How," says I, "shall we go, I am no horsewoman, and it is too far for a coach."

"Too far," says he, "no place is too far for a coach and six. If I carry you out, you shall travel like a duchess."

"Hum," says I, "my dear, it's a frolic, but if you have a mind to it I don't care."

Well, the time was appointed, we had a rich coach, very good horses, a coachman, postillion, and two footmen in very good liveries; a gentleman on horseback, and a page with a feather in his hat upon another horse: the servants all called him "my lord," and the innkeepers, you may be sure did the like, and I was "her honour the countess;" and thus we travelled to Oxford, and a very pleasant journey we had; for, give him his due, not a beggar alive knew better how to be a lord than my husband. We saw all the rarities at Oxford, talked with two or three fellows of colleges, about putting out a young nephew, that was left to his lordship's care for the university, and of their being his tutors. We diverted ourselves with bantering several other poor scholars, with hopes of being at least his lordship's chaplain, and putting on a scarf. Thus having lived like quality indeed as to expense, we went away for Northampton, and, in a word, in about twelve days' ramble, came home again to the tune of about 93*l.* expense.

Vanity is the perfection of a fop; my husband had this excellence, that he valued nothing of expence, and as his history, you may be sure, has very little weight in it, it is enough to tell you, that in about two years and a quarter he broke, and was not so happy as to get over into the Mint, but got into a spunging-house, being arrested in an action too heavy for him to give bail to, so he sent for me to come to him.

It was no surprise to me, for I had foreseen some time that all was going to wreck, and had been taking care to reserve something, though it was not much, for myself. But when he sent for me, he behaved better than I expected, and told me plainly he had played the fool and suffered himself to be surprised, which he might have prevented; that now he foresaw he could not stand it, and therefore he would have me go home, and in the night take away everything I had in the house of any value and secure it; and after that, he told me that if I could get away 100*l.* or 200*l.* in goods out of the shop, I should do it; "Only," says he, "let me know nothing of it, neither what you take, or whither you carry it; for as for me," says he, "I am resolved to get out of this house and begone; and if you never hear of me more, my dear," says he, "I wish you well; I am only sorry for the injury I have done you." He said some very handsome things to me, indeed, at parting; for I told you he was a gentleman, and that was all the benefit I had of his being so; that he used me very handsomely, and with good manners upon all occasions, even to the last, only spent all I had, and left me to rob the creditors for something to subsist on.

However, I did as he bade me, that you may be sure, and having thus taken my leave of him, I never saw him more; for he found means to break out of the bailiff's house that night or the next, and got over into France; and for the rest, the creditors scrambled for it as well as they could. How I knew not, for I could come at no knowledge of anything more than this: that he came home about three o'clock in the morning, caused the rest of his goods to be removed into the Mint, and the shop to be shut up; and having raised what money he could get together, he got over, as I said, to France, from whence I had one or two letters from him, and no more.

I did not see him when he came home, for he having me such instructions as above, and I having made the best of my time, I had no more business back again at the house, not knowing but I might have been stopped there by the creditors; for a commission of bankrupt, being soon after issued, they might have stopped me by orders from the commissioners. But my husband having so dextrously got out of the bailiff's house, by letting himself down in a most desperate manner, from almost the top of the house to the top of another building, and leaping from thence, which was almost two stories, and which was enough, indeed, to have broken his neck; he came home and got away his goods before the creditors could come to seize, that is to say, before they could get out the commission, and be ready to send their officers to take possession.

My husband was so civil to me, for still I say he was much of a gentleman, that in the first letter he wrote me from France, he let me know where he had pawned twenty pieces of fine holland for 30*l.*, which were really worth above 90*l.*, and enclosed me the token, and an order for the taking them up, paying the money, which I did, and made in time above 100*l.* of them, having leisure to cut them and sell them, some and some to private families, as opportunity offered.

However, with all this, and all that I had secured before, I found upon casting things up, my case was very much altered, and my fortune much lessened, for including the hollands, and a parcel of fine muslins, which I carried off before, and some plate, and other things, I found I could hardly muster up 500*l.*, and my condition was very odd, for though I had no child (I had had one by my gentleman draper, but it was buried), yet I was a widow bewitched, I had a husband, and no husband, and I could not pretend to marry again, though I knew well enough my husband would never see England any more, if he lived fifty years. Thus I say, I was restrained from marriage, what offer soever might be made me; and I had not one friend to advise with, in the condition I was in, at least not one I durst trust the secret of my circumstances to, for if the commissioners were to have been informed where I was, I should have been fetched up and examined upon oath, and all I had saved be taken away from me.

Upon these apprehensions the first thing I did, was to go quite out of my knowledge, and go by another name. This I did effectually, for I went into the Mint too, took lodgings in a very private place, dressed me up in the habit of a widow, and called myself Mrs Flanders.

Here, however, I concealed myself, and though my new acquaintance knew nothing of me, yet I soon got a great deal of company about me, and whether it be that women are scarce among the sort of people that generally are to be found there; or that some consolations, in the miseries of the place, are more requisite than on other occasions, I soon found an agreeable woman was exceedingly valuable among the sons of affliction there; and that those that wanted money to pay half a crown in the pound to their creditors, and that run in debt at the sign of the Bull for their dinners, would yet find money enough for a supper if they liked the woman.

However, I kept myself safe yet, though I began like my Lord Rochester's mistress, that loved his company, but would not admit him farther, to have the scandal of a WHORE, without the joy; and upon this score tired with the place, and indeed with the company too, I began to think of removing.

It was, indeed, a subject of strange reflection to me, to see men who were overwhelmed in perplexed circumstances; who were reduced some degrees below being ruined, whose families were objects of their own terror and other people's charity, yet while a penny lasted, nay, even beyond it, endeavouring to drown their sorrow in their wickedness, heaping up more guilt upon themselves, labouring to forget former things which now it was the proper time to remember, making more work for repentance, and sinning on as a remedy for sin past.

But it is none of my talent to preach; these men were too wicked even for me; there was something horrid and absurd in their way of sinning, for it was all a force even upon themselves; they did not only act against conscience, but against nature; they put a rape upon their temper to drown the reflections which their circumstances continually gave them, and nothing was more easy than to see how sighs would interrupt their songs, and paleness and anguish sit upon their brows, in spite of the forced smiles they put on; nay, sometimes it would break out at their very mouths, when they had parted with their money for a lewd treat, or a wicked embrace. I have heard them, turning about, fetch a deep sigh, and cry "What a dog am I! Well Betty, my dear, I will drink thy health though," meaning the honest wife that perhaps had not half-a-crown for herself, and three or four children. The next morning they are at their penitentials again, and perhaps the poor weeping wife comes over to him, either brings him some account of what his creditors are doing, and how she and the children are turned out of doors, or some other dreadful news, and this adds to his self-reproaches; but when he has thought and pored on it till he is almost mad, having no principles to support him; nothing within him, or above him, to comfort him; but finding it all darkness on every side, he flies to the same relief again, viz. to drink it away, debauch it away, and falling into company of men in just the same condition with himself, he repeats the crime, and thus he goes on every day one step onward of his way to destruction.

I was not wicked enough for such fellows as these yet; on the contrary, I began to consider here very seriously what I had to do, how things stood with me, and what course I ought to take. I knew I had no friends, no, not one friend or relation in the world; and that little I had left apparently wasting, which, when it was gone, I saw nothing but misery and starving was before me. Upon these considerations, I say, and filled with horror at the place I was in, and the dreadful objects which I had always before me, I resolved to be gone.

I had made an acquaintance with a very sober good sort of a woman, who was a widow too like me, but in better circumstances. Her husband had been a captain of a merchant ship, and having had the misfortune to be cast away coming home on a voyage from the West Indies, which would have been very profitable, if he had come safe, was so reduced by the loss, that though he had saved his life then, it broke his heart, and killed him afterwards, and his widow being pursued by the creditors, was forced to take shelter in the Mint, she soon made things up with the help of friends, and was at liberty again; and finding that I rather was there to be concealed than by any particular prosecution, and finding also that I agreed with her, or rather she with me, in a just abhorrence of the place and of the company. She invited me to go home with her till I could put myself in some posture of settling in the world to my mind, withal telling me that it was ten to one but some good captain of a ship might take a fancy to me and court me in that part of the town where she lived.

I accepted her offer, and was with her half a year, and should have been longer, but in that interval what she proposed to me happened to herself, and she married very much to her advantage; but whose fortune soever was upon the increase, mine seemed to be upon the wane, and I found nothing present except two or three boatswains or such fellows; but as for the commanders they were generally of two sorts. 1st. Such as having good business, that is to say, a good ship, resolved not to marry but with advantage, that is, with a good fortune. 2d. Such as being out of employ wanted a wife to help them to a ship, I mean. (1.) A wife who, having some money, could enable them to hold, as they call it, a good part of a ship themselves, so as to encourage owners to come in; or, (2.) A wife who, if she had not money, had friends who were concerned in shipping, and so could help to put the young man into a good ship, which to them is as good as a portion, and neither of these was my case; so I looked like one that was to lie on hand.

This knowledge I soon learnt by experience, viz. that the state of things was altered as to matrimony, and that I was not to expect at London what I found in the country, that marriages were here the consequences of politic schemes for forming interests and carrying on business, and that love had no share or but very little in the matter.

That as my sister-in-law at Colchester had said, beauty, wit, manners, sense, good humour, good behaviour, education, virtue, piety, or any other qualification, whether of body or mind, had no power to recommend: that money only made a woman agreeable: that men chose mistresses indeed by the gust of their affection, and it was requisite to a whore to be handsome, well shaped, have a good mien and a graceful behaviour; but that for a wife no deformity would shock the fancy; no ill qualities, the judgment; the money was the thing; the portion was neither crooked nor monstrous, but the money was always agreeable, whatever the wife was.

On the other hand, as the market run on the men's side, I found the women had lost the privilege of saying no, that it was a favour now for a woman to have the question asked; and if any young lady had so much arrogance as to counterfeit a negative, she never had the opportunity given her of denying twice; much less of recovering that false step, and accepting what she had, but seemed to decline. The men had such choice everywhere, that the case of the women was very unhappy; for they seemed to ply at every door, and if the man was by great chance refused at one house, he was sure to be received at the next.

Besides this, I observed that the men made no scruple to set themselves out, and go a fortune hunting, as they call it, when they had really no fortune themselves to demand it, or merit to deserve it; and that they carried it so high, that a woman was scarce allowed to inquire after the character or estate of the person that pretended to her. This I had an example of in a young lady at the next house to me, and with whom I had contracted an intimacy; she was courted by a young captain, and though she had near 2,000*l.* to her fortune, she did but inquire of some of his neighbours about his character, his morals, or substance; and he took occasion at the next visit to let her know, truly, that he took it very ill, and that he should not give her the trouble of his visits any more. I heard of it, and as I had begun my acquaintance with her, I went to see her upon it. She entered into a close conversation with me about it, and unbosomed herself very freely. I perceived presently that though she thought herself very ill used, yet she had no power to resent it, and was exceedingly piqued that she had lost him; and particularly that another of less fortune had gained him.

I fortified her mind against such a meanness, as I called it; I told her, that as low as I was in the world, I would have despised a man that should think I ought to take him upon his own recommendation only, without having the liberty to inform myself of his fortune and of his character; also I told her, that as she had a good fortune, she had no need to stoop to the disaster of the times; that it was enough that the men could insult us that had but little money to recommend us; but if she suffered such an affront to pass upon her without resenting it, she would be rendered low-priced upon all occasions, and would be the contempt of all the women in that part of the town; that a woman can never want an opportunity to be revenged of a man that has used her ill; and that there were ways enough to humble such a fellow as that, or else certainly women were the most unhappy creatures in the world.

I found she was very well pleased with the discourse, and she told me seriously that she would be very glad to make him sensible of her just resentment, and either to bring him on again, or have the satisfaction of her revenge being as public as possible.

I told her, that if she would take my advice, I would tell her how she should obtain her wishes in both those things; and that I would engage to bring the man to her door again, and make him beg to be let in. She smiled at that, and soon let me see, that if he came to her door, her resentment was not so great as to give her leave to let him stand long there.

However, she listened very willingly to my offer of advice; so I told her, that the first thing she ought to do, was a piece of justice to herself; namely, that whereas she had been told by several people, that he had reported among the ladies, that he had left her, and pretended to give the advantage of the negative to himself, she should take care to have it well spread among the women, which she could not fail of an opportunity to do in a neighbourhood so addicted to family news as that she had lived in was, that she had inquired into his circumstances, and found he was not the man as to estate he pretended to be. "Let them be told, madam," said I, "that you had been well informed that he was not the man that you expected, and that you thought it was not safe to meddle with him, that you heard he was of an ill temper, and that he boasted how he had used the women ill upon many occasions, and that particularly he was debauched in his morals," &c. The last of which, indeed, had some truth in it; but, at the same time, I did not find that she seemed to like him much the worse for that part.

As I had put this into her head, she came most readily into it. Immediately she went to work to find instruments, and she had very little difficulty in the search; for telling her story in general to a couple of gossips in the neighbourhood, it was the chat of the tea-table all over that part of the town, and I met with it wherever I visited. Also, as it was known that I was acquainted with the young lady herself, my opinion was asked very often, and I confirmed it with all the necessary aggravations, and set out his character in the blackest colours; but then, as a piece of secret intelligence, I added, as what the other gossips knew nothing of, viz. that I had heard he was in very bad circumstances; that he was under a necessity of a fortune to support his interest with the owners of the ship he commanded. That his own part was not paid for, and if it was not paid quickly his owners would put him out of the ship, and his chief mate was likely to command it, who offered to buy that part which the captain had promised to take.

I added, for I confess I was heartily piqued at the rogue, as I called him, that I had heard a rumour, too, that he had a wife alive at Plymouth, and another in the West Indies, a thing which they all knew was not very uncommon for such kind of gentlemen.

This worked as we both desired it, for presently the young lady at next door, who had a father and mother that governed both her and her fortune, was shut up, and her father forbid him the house. Also, in one place more where we went, the woman had the courage, however strange it was, to say no, and he could try nowhere but he was reproached with his pride, and that he pretended not to give the women leave to inquire into his character, and the like.

Well, by this time he began to be sensible of his mistake, and having alarmed all the women on that side of the water, he went over to Ratcliff, and got access to some of the ladies there; but though the young women there too were, according to the fate of the day, pretty willing to be asked, yet such was his ill luck, that his character followed him over the water, and his good name was much the same there as it was on our side ; so that, though he might have had wives enough, yet it did not happen among the women that had good fortunes, which was what he wanted.

But this was not all ; she very ingeniously managed another thing herself, for she got a young gentleman, who was a relation, and was, indeed, a married man, to come and visit her two or three times a week in a fine chariot and good liveries ; and her two agents, and I also, presently spread a report all over that this gentleman came to court her ; that he was a gentleman of a thousand pounds a year, and that he was fallen in love with her ; and that she was going to her aunt's in the city, because it was inconvenient for the gentleman to come to her with his coach in Redriff, the streets being so narrow and difficult.

This took immediately ; the captain was laughed at in all companies, and was ready to hang himself ; he tried all the ways possible to come at her again, and wrote the most passionate letters to her in the world, excusing his former rashness ; and, in short, by great application, obtained leave to wait on her again, as he said, to clear his reputation.

At this meeting she had her full revenge of him ; for she told him she wondered what he took her to be, that she should admit any man to a treaty of so much consequence as that of marriage, without inquiring very well into his circumstances ; that if he thought she was to be huffed into wedlock, and that she was in the same circumstances her neighbours might be in, viz. to take up with the first good Christian that came, he was mistaken ; that, in a word, his character was really bad, or he was very ill beholding to his neighbours ; and that unless he could clear up some points, in which she had justly been prejudiced, she had no more to say to him, but to do herself justice, and give him the satisfaction of knowing, that she was not afraid to say no to him or any other man.

With that she told him what she had heard, or rather raised herself by my means, of his character ; his not having paid for the part he pretended to own of the ship he commanded ; of the resolution of his owners to put him out of the command, and to put his mate in his stead ; and of the scandal raised on his morals ; his having been reproached with such and such women ; and his having a wife at Plymouth, and another in the West Indies, and the like ; and she asked him, whether he could deny that she had good reason, if these things were not cleared up, to refuse him, and in the meantime insist upon having satisfaction in points so significant as they were ?

He was so confounded at her discourse, that he could not answer a word, and she almost began to believe that all was true, by his disorder, though at the same time she knew that she had been the raiser of all those reports herself.

After some time he recovered himself a little, and from that time became the most humble, the most modest, and most importunate man alive in his courtship.

She carried her jest on a great way ; she asked him if he thought she was so at her last shift, that she could or ought to bear with such treatment, and if he did not see that she did not want those who thought it worth their while to come farther to her than he did, meaning the gentleman who she had brought to visit her by way of a sham.

She brought him by these tricks to submit to all possible measures to satisfy her, as well of his circumstances as of his behaviour. He brought her undeniable evidence of his having paid for his part of the ship ; he brought her certificates from his owners, that the report of their intending to remove him from the command of the ship, and put his chief mate in, was false and groundless, in short, he was quite the reverse of what he was before.

Thus I convinced her, that if the men made their advantage of our sex in the affair of marriage, upon the supposition of there being such choice to be had, and of the women being so easy, it was only owing to this, that the women wanted courage to maintain their ground, and to play their part ; and that, according to my Lord Rochester,—

“ A woman's ne'er so ruin'd but she can Revenge herself on her undoer, man.”

After these things, this young lady played her part so well, that though she resolved to have him, and that indeed having him was the main bent of her design, yet she made his obtaining her be to him the most difficult thing in the world ; and this she did, not by a haughty, reserved carriage, but by a just policy, turning the tables upon him, and playing back upon him his own game ; for, as he pretended, by a kind of lofty carriage, to place himself above the occasion of a character, and to make inquiring into his character a kind of an affront to him, she broke with him upon that subject ; and at the same time that she made him submit to all possible inquiry after his affairs, she apparently shut the door against his looking into her own.

It was enough to him to obtain her for a wife : as to what she had, she told him plainly, that as he knew her circumstances, it was but just she should know his ; and though at the same time he had only known her circumstances by common fame, yet he had made so many protestations of his passion for her, that he could ask no more but her hand to his grand request, and the like ramble, according to the custom of lovers. In short, he left himself no room to ask any more questions about her estate, and she took the advantage of it like a prudent woman, for she placed part of her fortune so in trustees, without letting him know anything of it, that it was quite out of his reach, and made him very well content with the rest.

It is true, she was pretty well besides,—that is to say, she had about 1,400*l.* in money, which she gave him ; and the other, after some time, she brought to light, as a perquisite to herself, which he was to accept as a mighty favour, seeing, though it was not to be his, it might ease him in the article of her particular expenses ; and I must add, that by this conduct the gentleman himself became not only the more humble in his applications to her to obtain her, but also was much the more an obliging husband to her when he had her. I cannot but remind the ladies here, how much they place themselves below the common station of a wife, which, if I may be allowed not to be partial, is low enough already;—I say, they place themselves below their common station, and prepare their own mortifications, by their submitting so to be insulted by the men beforehand, which I confess I see no necessity of.

This relation may serve, therefore, to let the ladies see that the advantage is not so much on the other side as the men think it is; and though it may be true that the men have but too much choice among us, and that some women may be found who will dishonour themselves, be cheap, and easy to come at, and will scarce wait to be asked; yet if they will have women, as I may say, worth having, they may find them as un-matable as ever; and that those that are otherwise are a sort of people that have such deficiencies, when had, as rather recommend the ladies that are difficult, than encourage the men to go on with their easy courtship, and expect wives equally valuable that will come at first call.

Nothing is more certain than that the ladies always gain of the men by keeping their ground, and letting their pretended lovers see that they can resent being slighted, and that they are not afraid of saying no. They, I observe, insult us mightily with telling us of the number of women; that the wars and the sea, and trade, and other incidents have carried the men so much away that there is no proportion between the numbers of the sexes, and therefore the women have the disadvantage; but I am far from granting that the number of women is so great, or the number of men so small; but if they will have me tell the truth, the disadvantage of the women is a terrible scandal upon the men, and it lies here and here only; namely, that the age is so wicked, and the sex so debauched, that, in short, the number of such men as an honest woman ought to meddle with is small indeed, and it is but here and there that a man is to be found who is fit for an honest woman to venture upon.

But the consequence even of that too amounts to no more than this, that women ought to be the more nice, for how do we know the just character of the man that makes the offer? To say the woman should be the more easy on this occasion is to say we should be the forwarder to venture because of the greatness of the danger, which in my way of reasoning is very absurd.

On the contrary, the women have ten thousand times the more reason to be wary and backward, by how much the hazard of being betrayed is the greater; and would the ladies consider this and act the wary part, they would discover every cheat that offered; for, in short, the lives of very few men now-a-days will bear a character, and if the ladies do but make a little inquiry they will soon be able to distinguish the men, and deliver themselves. As for women that do not think their own safety worth their thought, that, impatient of their present state, resolve, as they call it, to take the first good Christian that comes, that runs into matrimony as a horse rushes into the battle, I can say nothing to them but this, that they are a sort of ladies that are to be prayed for among the rest of distempered people; and, to me, they look like people that venture their whole estates in a lottery where there is a hundred thousand blanks to a prize.

No man of common sense will value a woman the less for not giving up herself at the first attack, or for not accepting his proposal without inquiring into his person or character; on the contrary, he must think her the weakest of all creatures in the world, as the rate of men now goes, in short, he must have a very contemptible opinion of her capacities, nay, even of her understanding, that, having but one cast for her life, shall cast that life away at once, and make matrimony, like death, be a leap in the dark.

I would fain have the conduct of my sex a little regulated in this particular, which is the thing in which, of all the parts of life, I think at this time we suffer most in. It is nothing but lack of courage, the fear of not being married at all, and of that frightful state of life called an old maid, of which I have a story to tell by itself; this I say is the woman's snare, but would the ladies once but get above that fear and manage rightly, they would more certainly avoid it by standing their ground in a case so absolutely necessary to their felicity, than by exposing themselves as they do; and if they did not marry so soon as they may do otherwise, they would make themselves amends by marrying safer. She is always married too soon who gets a bad husband; and she is never married too late who gets a good one: in a word, there is no woman, deformity or lost reputation excepted, but if she manages well, may be married safely one time or another; but if she precipitates herself it is ten thousand to one but she is undone.

But I come now to my own case, in which there was at this time no little nicety. The circumstances I was in made the offer of a good husband the most necessary thing in the world to me, but I found soon that to be made cheap and easy was not the way. It soon began to be found that the widow had no fortune, and to say this, was to say all that was ill of me, for I began to be dropt in all the discourses of matrimony. Being well-bred, handsome, witty, modest, and agreeable, all which I had allowed to my character, whether justly or no, is not to the purpose: I say all these would not do without the dross, which was now become more valuable than virtue itself. In short, the widow, they said, had no money.

I resolved, therefore, as to the state of my present circumstances, that it was absolutely necessary to change my station, and make a new appearance in some other place where I was not known, and even to pass by another name if I found occasion.

I communicated my thoughts to my intimate friend, the captain's lady, who I so faithfully served in her case with the captain, and who was as ready to serve me in the same kind as I could desire: I made no scruple to lay my circumstances open to her, my stock was but low, for I had made but about 540*l.* at the close of my last affair, and I had wasted some of that; however, I had about 460*l.* left, a great many very rich clothes, a gold watch, and some jewels, though of no extraordinary value, and about 30*l.* or 40*l.* left in linen not disposed of.

My dear and faithful friend, the captain's wife, was so sensible of the service I had done her in the above affair, that she was not only a steady friend to me, but, knowing my circumstances, she frequently made me presents as money came into her hands, such as amounted to a maintenance, so that I spent none of my own; and at last she made this happy proposal to me, viz. that as we had observed, as above, how the men made no scruple to set themselves out as persons meriting a woman of fortune, when they had really no fortune of their own, it was but just to deal with them in their own way and if it was possible, to deceive the deceiver.

The captain's lady, in short, put this project into my head, and told me if I would be ruled by her I should certainly get a husband of fortune, without leaving him any room to reproach me with want of my own; I told her, as I had reason to do, that I would give up myself wholly to her directions, and that I would have neither tongue to speak, or feet to step in that affair but as she should direct me; depending that she would extricate one out of every difficulty that she brought me into, which she said she would answer for.

The first step she put me upon was to call her cousin, and go to a relation's house of hers in the country, where she directed me, and where she brought her husband to visit me, and calling me cousin, she worked matters so about that her husband and she together invited me most passionately to come to town and be with them, for they now lived in quite a different place from where they were before. In the next place she tells her husband that I had at least 1500*l.* fortune, and that after the death of some of my relations I was likely to have a great deal more.

It was enough to tell her husband this; there needed nothing on my side; I was but to sit still and wait the event, for it presently went all over the neighbourhood that the young widow at Capt. —'s was a fortune, that she had at least 1500*l.* and perhaps a great deal more, and that the captain said so: and if the captain was asked at any time about me he made no scruple to affirm it, though he knew not one word of the matter other than that his wife had told him so; and in this he thought no harm, for he really believed it to be so because he had it from his wife; so slender a foundation will those fellows build upon if they do but think there is a fortune in the game. With the reputation of this fortune I presently found myself blessed with admirers enough, and that I had my choice of men, as scarce as they said they were, which, by the way, confirms what I was saying before. This being my case, I who had a subtle game to play, had nothing now to do but to single out from them all the properest man that might be for my purpose; that is to say, the man who was most likely to depend upon the hearsay of a fortune, and not inquire too far into the particulars; and unless I did this I did nothing, for my case could not bear much inquiry.

I picked out my man without much difficulty by the judgment I made of his way of courting me; I had let him run on with his protestations and oaths that he loved me above all the world; that if I would make him happy that was enough; all which I knew was upon supposition, nay, it was upon a full satisfaction, that I was very rich, though I never told him a word of it myself.

This was my man, but I was to try him to the bottom, and indeed in that consisted my safety, for if he baulked I knew I was undone, as sure as he was undone if he took me; and if I did not make some scruple about his fortune it was the way to lead him to raise some about mine; and first, therefore, I pretended on all occasions to doubt his sincerity, and told him perhaps he only courted me for my fortune; he stopped my mouth in that part with the thunder of his protestations as above, but still I pretended to doubt.

One morning he pulls off his diamond ring and writes upon the glass of the sash in my chamber this line:

"You I love, and only you alone."

I read it, and asked him to lend me his ring, with which I wrote under it thus:

"And so in love says every one."

He takes his ring again, and writes another line thus:

"Virtue alone is an Estate."

I borrowed it again, and I wrote under it,

"But money's virtue; gold is Fate."

He coloured as red as fire to see me turn so quick upon him, and in a kind of rage told me he would conquer me, and writes again thus:

"I scorn your gold, and yet I love."

I ventured all upon the last cast of poetry, as you will see, for I wrote boldly under his last,

"I'm poor: let's see how kind you'll prove."

This was a sad truth to me, whether he believed me or no I could not tell; I supposed then that he did not. However he flew to me, took me in his arms, and kissing me very eagerly, and with the greatest passion imaginable he held me fast till he called for a pen and ink, and then told me he could not wait the tedious writing on the glass, but pulling out a piece of paper, he began and wrote again,

"Be mine, with all your poverty."

I took the pen and followed him immediately thus:

"Yet secretly you hope I lie."

He told me that was unkind, because it was not just, and that I put him upon contradicting me, which did not consist with good manners, any more than with his affection; and therefore, since I had insensibly drawn him into this poetical scribble, he begged I would not oblige him to break it off, so he writes again,

"Let love alone be our debate."

I wrote again,

"She loves enough that does not hate."

This he took for a favour, and so laid down the cudgels, that is to say, the pen; I say he took it for a favour, and a mighty one it was, if he had known all. However he took it as I meant it, that is, to let him think I was inclined to go on with him, as indeed I had all the reason in the world to do, for he was the best humoured merry sort of fellow that I ever met with; and I often reflected on myself how doubly criminal it was to deceive such a man ; but that necessity which pressed me to a settlement suitable to my condition, was my authority for it, and certainly his affection to me, and the goodness of his temper, however they might argue against using him ill, yet they strongly argued to me that he would better take the disappointment than some fiery-tempered wretch, who might have nothing to recommend them but those passions which would serve only to make a woman miserable all her days.

Besides, though I had jested with him, as he supposed it, so often about my poverty, yet when he found it to be true, he had foreclosed all manner of objection, seeing whether he was in jest or in earnest, he had declared he took me without any regard to my portion ; and whether I was in jest or in earnest, I had declared myself to be very poor ; so that in word I had him fast both ways, and though he might say afterwards he was cheated, yet he could never say that I had cheated him.

He pursued me close after this, and as I saw there was no need to fear losing him, I played the indifferent part with him longer than prudence might otherwise have dictated to me. But I considered how much this caution and indifference would give me the advantage over him when I should come to be under the necessity of owning my own circumstances to him ; and I managed it the more warily, because I found he inferred from thence, as indeed he ought to do, that I either had the more money, or the more judgment, and would not venture at all.

I took the freedom one day, after we had talked pretty close to the subject, to tell him that it was true I had received the compliment of a lover from him ; namely, that he would take me without inquiring into my fortune, and I would make him a suitable return in this, viz. that I should make as little inquiry into his as consisted with reason, but I hoped he would allow me to ask a few questions, which he should answer or not as he thought fit ; and that I would not be offended if he did not answer me at all ; one of these questions related to our manner of living, and the place where, because I had heard he had a great plantation in Virginia, and that he had talked of going to live there, and I told him I did not care to be transported.

He began from this discourse to let me voluntarily into all his affairs, and to tell me in a frank open way all his circumstances, by which I found he was very well to pass in the world ; but that great part of his estate consisted of three plantations which he had in Virginia, which brought him in a very good income, generally speaking, to the tune of 300*l.* a year ; but that, if he was to live upon them, would bring him in four times as much. Very well, thought I, you shall carry me thither as soon as you please, though I won't tell you so beforehand.

I jested with him extremely about the figure he would make in Virginia, but I found he would do anything I desired, though he did not seem glad to have me undervalue his plantations ; so I turned my tale ; I told him I had good reason not to desire to go there to live, because if his plantations were worth so much there, I had not a fortune suitable to a gentleman of 1,200*l.* a year, as he said his estate would be.

He replied generously he did not ask what my fortune was, he had told me from the beginning he would not. and he would be as good as his word ; but whatever it was, he assured me he would never desire me to go to Virginia with him, or go thither himself without me, unless I was perfectly willing and made it my choice.

All this, you may be sure, was as I wished, and indeed nothing could have happened more perfectly agreeable ; I carried it on so far as this with a sort of indifference that he often wondered at more than at first, but which was the only support of his courtship, and I mention it the rather to intimate again to the ladies, that nothing but want of courage for such an indifference makes our sex so cheap, and prepares them to be ill used as they are. Would they venture the loss of a pretending fop now and then, who carries it high upon the point of his own merit, they would certainly be slighted less and courted more. Had I discovered really and truly what my great fortune was, and that in all I had not full 500*l.* when he expected 1,500*l.*, yet I had hooked him so fast, and played him so long, that I was satisfied he would have had me in my worst circumstances ; as indeed it was less a surprise to him, when he learnt the truth, than it would have been, because having not the least blame to lay on me, who had carried it with an air of indifference to the last, he could not say one word, except that indeed he thought it had been more, but that if it had been less he did not repent his bargain, only that he should not be able to maintain me so well as he intended.

In short we were married, and very happily married on my side I assure you, as to the man, for he was the best-humoured man that ever a woman had ; but his circumstances were not so good as I imagined, as, on the other hand, he had not bettered himself by marrying so much as he expected.

When we were married I was shrewdly put to it to bring him that little stock I had, and to let him see it was no more ; but there was a necessity for it, so I took my opportunity one day when we were alone, to enter into a short dialogue with him about it. "My dear," said I, "we have been married a fortnight ; is it not time to let you know whether you have got a wife with something or with nothing?"

"Your own time for that, my dear," says he. "I am satisfied that I have got the wife I love ; I have not troubled you much," says he "with my inquiries after it."

"That is true," said I, "but I have a great difficulty upon me about it, which I scarce know how to manage."

"What is that, my dear?" says he.

"Why," says I, "it is a little hard upon me, and it is harder upon you. I am told that Captain —— (meaning my friend's husband) has told you I had a great deal more money than I ever pretended to have, and I am sure I never employed him to do so."

"Well," says he, "Captain —— may have told me so, but what then ? if you have not so much, that may lie at his door ; but you never told me what you had, so I have no reason to blame you if you have nothing at all."

"That is so just," said I, "and so generous, that it makes my having but a little a double affliction to me."

"The less you have, my dear," says he, "the worse for us both; but I hope your affliction you speak of, is not caused for fear I should be unkind to you for want of a portion; no, no; if you have nothing, tell me plainly and at once: I may perhaps tell the Captain he has cheated me, but I can never say you have cheated me, for did you not give it under your hand that you were poor, and so I ought to expect you to be?"

"Well," said I, "my dear, I am glad I have not been concerned in deceiving you before marriage; if I deceive you since, it's never the worse. That I am poor is too true, but not so poor as to have nothing, neither;" so I pulled out some bank-bills and gave him about a hundred and sixty pounds. "There is something, my dear," says I, "and not quite all neither."

I had brought him so near to expecting nothing by what I said before, that the money, though the sum was small in itself, was doubly welcome to him; he owned it was more than he looked for, and that he did not question by my discourse to him, but that my fine clothes, gold watch, and a diamond ring or two, had been all my fortune.

I let him please himself with that 160*l.* two or three days, and having been abroad that day, and as if I had been to fetch it, I brought him a hundred pounds more home in gold, and told him there was a little more portion for him; and in short, in about a week more I brought him 180*l.* more, and about 60*l.* in linen, which I made him believe I had been obliged to take with the 100*l.* which I gave him in gold, as a composition for a debt of 600*l.*, being little more than five shillings in the pound, and overvalued too.

"And now my dear," says I to him, "I am very sorry to tell you, that there is all, and that I have given you my whole fortune. I added, that if the person who had my 600*l.* had not abused me, I had been worth 1,000*l.* to him, but that as it was, I had been faithful to him, and reserved nothing to myself, but if it had been more he should have had it.

He was so obliged by the manner, and so pleased with the sum, for he had been in a terrible fright lest it had been nothing at all, that he accepted it very thankfully. And thus I got over the fraud of passing for a fortune without money, and cheating a man into marrying me on pretence of a fortune; which, by the way, I take to be one of the most dangerous steps a woman can take, and in which she runs the most hazard of being ill-used afterwards.

My husband, to give him his due, was a man of infinite good nature, but he was no fool; and finding his income not suited to the manner of living which he had intended, if I had brought him what he expected, and being under a disappointment in his return of his plantation in Virginia, he discovered many times his inclination of going over to Virginia to live upon his own; and often would be magnifying the way of living there, how cheap, how plentiful, how pleasant, and the like.

I began presently to understand his meaning, and I took him up very plainly one morning, and told him that I did so; that I found his estate turned to no account at this distance compared to what it would do if he lived upon the spot, and that I found he had a mind to go and live there; and I added, that I was sensible he had been disappointed in a wife; and that, finding his expectations not answered that way, I could do no less to make him amends than tell him that I was very willing to go over to Virginia with him and live there.

He said a thousand kind things to me upon the subject of my making such a proposal to him. He told me, that however he was disappointed in his expectations of a fortune, he was not disappointed in a wife, and that I was all to him that a wife could be, and he was more than satisfied in the whole when the particulars were put together; but that this offer was so kind that it was more than he could express.

To bring the story short, we agreed to go. He told me that he had a very good house there, that it was well-furnished, that his mother was alive and lived in it, and one sister, which was all the relations he had; that as soon as he came there his mother would remove to another house which was her own for life, and his after her decease, so that I should have all the house to myself; and I found all this to be exactly as he had said.

To make this part of the story short, we put on board the ship which we went in a large quantity of good furniture for our house, with stores of linen and other necessities, and a good cargo for sale, and away we went.

To give an account of the manner of our voyage, which was long and full of dangers, is out of my way. I kept no journal, neither did my husband; all that I can say is, that after a terrible passage, frightened twice with dreadful storms, and once with what was still more terrible, I mean a pirate, who came on board and took away almost all our provisions, and which would have been beyond all to me, they having taken my husband to go along with them, but by entreaties were prevailed with to leave him. I say, after all these terrible things, we arrived in York River, in Virginia, and coming to our plantation, we were received with all the demonstrations of tenderness and affection by my husband's mother that were possible to be expressed.

We lived here altogether, my mother-in-law, at my entreaty, continuing in the house, for she was too kind a mother to be parted with; my husband likewise continued the same as at first, and I thought myself the happiest creature alive, when an odd and surprising event put an end to all that felicity in a moment, and rendered my condition the most uncomfortable, if not the most miserable, in the world.

My mother was a mighty cheerful, good-humoured old woman—I may call her old woman, for her son was above thirty—I say, she was very pleasant, good company, and used to entertain me in particular with abundance of stories to divert me, as well of the country we were in as of the people.

Among the rest she often told me how the greatest part of the inhabitants of the colony came thither in very indifferent circumstances from England; that, generally speaking, they were of two sorts, either, first, such as were brought over by masters of ships to be sold as servants:—"Such we call them, my dear," says she, "but they are more properly called slaves." Or second, such as are transported from Newgate and other prisons, after having been found guilty of felony and other crimes punishable with death.

"When they come here," says she, "we make no difference, the planters buy them and they work together in the field till their time is out; when it is expired," said she, "they have encouragement given them to plant for themselves, for they have a certain number of acres of land allotted them by the country, and they go to work to clear and cure the land, and then to plant it with tobacco and corn for their own use; and as the tradesmen and merchants will trust them with tools and clothes and other necessities upon the credit of their crop before it is grown, so they again plant every year a little more than the year before, and so buy whatever they want with the crop that is before them."

"Hence, child," said she, "many a Newgate bird becomes a great man, and we have," continued she, "several justices of the peace, officers of the train bands, and the magistrates of the towns they live in, that have been burnt in the hand."

She was going on with that part of the story, when her own part in it interrupted her, and with a great deal of good humoured confidence she told me she was one of the second sort of inhabitants herself; that she came away openly, having ventured too far in a particular case, so that she was become a criminal; "and here is the mark of it, child," says she, and pulling off her glove, "look ye here," says she, turning up the palm of her hand, and showed me a very fine white arm and hand, but branded in the inside of the hand, as in such cases it must be.

This story was very moving to me, but my mother, smiling, said, "You need not think such a thing strange, daughter, for as I told you, some of the best men in this country are burnt in the hand, and they are not ashamed to own it; there is Major ——," says she, "he was an eminent pick-pocket; there is Justice Ba——r, was a shoplifter; and both them were burnt in the hand, and I could name you several, such as they are."

We had frequent discourses of this kind, and abundance of instances she gave me of the like; after some time, as she was telling some stories of one that was transported but a few weeks ago, I began in an intimate kind of way to ask her to tell me something of her own story, which she did with the utmost plainness and sincerity; how she had fallen into very ill company in London in her young days, occasioned by her mother sending her frequently to carry victuals and other relief to a kinswoman of hers who was a prisoner in Newgate, and who lay in a miserable starving condition, was afterwards condemned to be hanged, but having got a respite by pleading her belly, died afterwards in the prison.

Here my mother-in-law ran out in a long account of the wicked practices in that dreadful place, and how it ruined more young people than all the towns beside; "and child," says my mother, "perhaps you may know little of it, or it may be, heard nothing about it," says she; "we all know here, that there are more thieves and rogues made by that one prison of Newgate, than by all the clubs and societies of villains in the nation; it is that cursed place," says my mother, "that half peoples this colony."

Here she went on with her own story so long and in so particular a manner, that I began to be very uneasy, but coming to one particular that required telling her name, I thought I should have sunk down in the place. She perceived I was out of order, and asked me if I was not well, and what ailed me? I told her I was so affected with the melancholy story she had told, and the terrible things she had gone through, that it had overcome me, and I begged of her to talk no more of it.

"Why, my dear," says she, very kindly, "what need these things trouble you? These passages were long before your time, and they give me no trouble at all now; nay I look back on them with a particular satisfaction, as they have been a means to bring me to this place?" Then she went on to tell me how she very luckily fell into a good family, where behaving herself well, and her mistress dying, her master married her, by whom she had my husband and his sister, and that by her diligence and good management after her husband's death she had improved the plantations to such a degree as they then were, so that most of the estate was of her getting, not her husband's, for she had been a widow upwards of sixteen years.

I heard this part of the story with very little attention, because I wanted much to retire and give vent to my passions, which I did soon after, and let any one judge what must be the anguish of my mind when I came to reflect that this was certainly no more or less than my own mother, and I had now had two children, and was now big with another by my own brother, and lay with him still every night.

I was now the most unhappy of all women in the world. O, had the story never been told me all had been well; it had been no crime to have lain with my husband, since as to his being my relation I had known nothing of it.

I had now such a load on my mind that it kept me perpetually waking; to reveal it, which would have been some ease to me, I could not find would be to any purpose, and yet to conceal it would be the next to impossible; nay, I did not doubt but I should talk of it in my sleep and tell my husband of it whether I would or no; if I discovered it the least thing I could expect was to lose my husband, for he was too nice and too honest a man to have continued my husband after he had known I had been his sister, so that I was perplexed to the last degree.

I leave it to any one to judge what difficulties were presented to my view. I was away from my native country, at a distance prodigious, and the return to me unpassable; I lived very well, but in a circumstance unsufferable in itself. If I had discovered myself to my mother it might be difficult to convince her of the particulars, and I had no way to prove them. On the other hand, if she had questioned or doubted me I had been undone, for the bare suggestion would have immediately separated me from my husband, without gaining my mother or him, who would have been neither a husband or brother; so that between the surprise on one hand and the uncertainty on the other, I had been sure to be undone.

In the mean time, as I was but too sure of the fact, I lived therefore in an open avowed incest and whoredom, and all under the appearance of an honest wife: and though I was not so much touched with the crime of it, yet the action had something in it shocking to nature, and made my husband, as he thought himself, even nauseous to me.

However, upon the most sedate consideration, I resolved that it was absolutely necessary to conceal it all, and not to make the least discovery of it either to mother or husband; and thus I lived with the greatest pressure imaginable for three years more, but had no more children.

During this time my mother used to be frequently telling me old stories of her former adventures, which, however, were no way pleasant to me; for by it, though she did not tell it me in plain terms, yet I could easily understand, joined with what I had heard myself, of my first tutors, that in her younger days she had been both whore and thief; but I verily believe she had lived to repent sincerely of both, and that then she was a very pious, sober and religious woman.

Well, let her life have been what it would then, it was certain that my life was very uneasy to me; for I lived, as I have said, but in the worst sort of whoredom, and as I could expect no good of it, so really no good issue came of it, and all my seeming prosperity wore off and ended in misery and destruction. It was sometime indeed before it came to this; for, but I know not by what ill fate guided, everything went wrong with us afterwards, and that which was worse, my husband grew strangely altered; froward, jealous, and unkind; and I was as impatient of bearing his carriage as the carriage was unreasonable and unjust. These things proceeded so far, that we came at last to be on such ill terms with one another, that I claimed a promise of him which he entered willingly into with me, when I consented to come from England with him, viz., that if I found the country not to agree with me, or that I did not like to live there, I should come away to England again when I pleased, giving him a years' warning to settle his affairs.

I say I now claimed this promise of him, and I must confess I did it not in the most obliging terms neither; but I insisted that he treated me ill, that I was remote from my friends, and could do myself no justice, and that he was jealous without cause, my conversation having been unblameable, and he having no pretence for it; and that to remove to England would take away all occasion from him.

I insisted so peremptorily upon it, that he could not avoid coming to a point, either to keep his word with me or to break it; and this, notwithstanding he used all the skill he was master of, and employed his mother and other agents to prevail with me to alter my resolutions; indeed the bottom of the thing lay at my heart, and that made all his endeavours fruitless, for my heart was alienated from him as a husband; I loathed the thoughts of bedding with him, and used a thousand pretences of illness and humour to prevent his touching me, fearing nothing more than to be with child again by him, which, to be sure, would have prevented, or at least delayed, my going over to England.

However, at last I put him so out of humour, that he took up a rash and fatal resolution that, in short, I should not go to England; and though he had promised me, yet it was an unreasonable thing for me to desire it, that it would be ruinous to his affairs, would unhinge his whole family, and be next to an undoing him in the world; that, therefore, I ought not to desire it of him, and that no wife in the world that valued her family and her husband's prosperity would insist upon such a thing.

This plunged me again; for when I considered the thing calmly, and took my husband, as he really was, a diligent careful man in the main work of laying up an estate for his children, and that he knew nothing of the dreadful circumstances that he was in; I could not but confess to myself that my proposal was very unreasonable, and what no wife that had the good of her family at heart would have desired.

But my discontents were of another nature; I looked upon him no longer as a husband, but as a near relation, the son of my own mother, and I resolved some how or other to be clear of him, but which way I did not know, nor did it seem possible.

It is said by the ill-natured world of our sex, that if we are set on a thing, it is impossible to turn us from our resolutions: in short, I never ceased poring upon the means to bring to pass my voyage, and came that length with my husband at last, as to propose going without him. This provoked him to the last degree, and he called me not only an unkind wife, but an unnatural mother, and asked me how I could entertain such a thought without horror, as that of leaving my two children (for one was dead) without a mother, and to be brought up by strangers, and never to see them more? It was true, had things been right, I should not have done it, but now, it was my real desire never to see them, or him either, any more; and as to the charge of unnatural I could easily answer it to myself, while I knew that the whole relation was unnatural in the highest degree in the world.

However it was plain there was no bringing my husband to anything; he would neither go with me, or let me go without him, and it was quite out of my power to stir without his consent, as any one that knows the constitution or the country I was in, knows very well.

We had many family quarrels about it, and they began in time to grow up to a dangerous height; for as I was quite estranged from my husband, as he was called, in affection, so I took no heed to my words, but sometimes gave him language that was provoking. And, in short, I strove all I could to bring him to a parting with me, which was what above all things in the world I desired most.

He took my carriage very ill, and indeed he might well do so, for at last I refused to bed with him, and carrying on the breach upon all occasions to extremity, he told me once he thought I was mad, and if I did not alter my conduct, he would put me under cure; that is to say, into a madhouse. I told him he should find I was far enough from being mad, and that it was not in his power, or any other villains, to murder me. I confess at the same time I was heartily frightened at his thoughts of putting me into a madhouse, which would at once have destroyed all the possibility of breaking the truth out, whatever the occasion might be; for that then no one would have given credit to a word of it.

This therefore brought me to a resolution, whatever came of it, to lay open my whole case; but which way to do it, or to whom, was an inextricable difficulty, and took me up many months to resolve; in the mean time, another quarrel with my husband happened, which came up to such a mad extreme as almost pushed me on to tell it out all to his face; but though I kept it in so as not to come to the particulars, I spoke so much as put him into the utmost confusion, and in the end brought out the whole story.

He began with a calm expostulation upon my being so resolute to go to England, I defended it; and one hard word bringing on another, as is usual in all family strife, he told me I did not treat him as if he was my husband, or talk of my children, as if I was a mother, and in short, that I did not deserve to be used as a wife: that he had used all the fair means possible with me; that he had argued with all the kindness and calmness that a husband or a Christian ought to do, and that I made him such a vile return, that I treated him rather like a dog than a man, and rather like the most contemptible stranger than a husband; that he was very loth to use violence with me, but that in short, he saw a necessity of it now, and that for the future he should be obliged to take such measures as should reduce me to my duty.

My blood was now fired to the utmost, though I knew what he had said was very true, and nothing could appear more provoked; I told him for his fair means and his foul, they were equally contemned by me; that for my going to England, I was resolved on it come what would; and that as to treating him not like a husband, and not showing myself a mother to my children, there might be something more in it than he understood at present; but, for his farther consideration, I thought fit to tell him thus much, that he neither was my lawful husband, nor they lawful children, and that I had reason to regard neither of them more than I did.

I confess I was moved to pity him when I spoke it, for he turned as pale as death, and stood mute as one thunder struck, and once or twice I thought he would have fainted; in short, it put him in a fit of something like an apoplex. He trembled, sweat or dew ran off his face, and yet he was as cold as a clod, so that I was forced to run and fetch something for him to keep life in him; when he recovered from that, he grew sick and vomited, and in a little after was put to bed and in the next morning was, as he had been indeed all night, in a violent fever.

However it went off again, and he recovered, though but slowly, and when he came to be a little better, he told me I had given him a mortal wound with my tongue, and he had but one thing to ask before he desired an explanation.

I interrupted him, and told him I was sorry I had gone so far, since I saw what disorder it put him into, but I desired him not to talk to me of explanations, for that would but make things worse.

This heightened his impatience, and indeed perplexed him beyond all bearing; for now he began to suspect that there was some mystery yet unfolded, but could not make the least guess at the real particulars of it. All that run in his brain was, that I had another husband alive, which I could not say in fact might not be true; but I assured him, however, there was not the least of that in it. And indeed, as to my other husband he was effectually dead in law to me, and had told me I should look on him as such, so I had not the least uneasiness on that score.

But now I found the thing too far gone to conceal it much longer, and my husband himself gave me an opportunity to ease myself of the secret much to my satisfaction. He had laboured with me three or four weeks, but to no purpose, only to tell him, whether I had spoken those words only as the effect of passion, or to put him in a passion; or whether there was any thing of truth in the bottom of them? But I continued inflexible, and would explain nothing, unless he would first consent to my going to England, which he would never do, he said while he lived; on the other hand I said it was in my power to make him willing when I pleased, nay, to make him entreat me to go; and this increased his curiosity, and made him importunate to the highest degree. But it was all to no purpose.

At length he tells all this story to his mother, and sets her upon me to get the main secret out of me, and she used her utmost skill with me indeed; but I put her to a full stop at once, by telling her that the reason and mystery of the whole matter lay in herself, and that it was my respect to her that had made me conceal it, and that in short I could go no farther, and therefore conjured her not to insist upon it.

She was struck dumb at this suggestion, and could not tell what to say or to think; but laying aside the supposition as a policy of mine, continued her importunity on account of her son, and if possible to make up the breach between us two. "As to that, I told her, that it was indeed a good design in her, but that it was impossible to be done; and that if I should reveal to her the truth of what she desired, she would grant it to be impossible, and cease to desire it." At last I seemed to be prevailed on by her importunity, and told her I dared trust her with a secret of the greatest importance, and she would soon see that it was so, and that I would consent to lodge it in her breast, if she would engage solemnly not to acquaint her son with it without my consent.

She was long in promising this part, but rather than not come at the main secret she agreed to that too, and after a great many other preliminaries, I began and told her the whole story. First, I told her how much she was concerned in all the unhappy breach which had happened between her son and me, by telling me her own story, and her London name; and that the surprise she saw I was in, was upon that occasion: then I told her my own story and my name, and assured her by such other tokens as she could not deny, that I was no other, nor more nor less than her own child—her daughter born of her body in Newgate—the same that had saved her from the gallows by being in her belly, and the same that she left in such and such hands when she was transported.

It is impossible to express the astonishment she was in; she was not inclined to believe the story, or to remember the particulars, for she immediately foresaw the confusions that must follow in the family upon it; but everything concurred so exactly with the stories she had told me of herself, and which, if she had not told me, she would perhaps have been content to have denied, that she had stopped her own mouth, and she had nothing to do but to take me about the neck and kiss me, and cry most vehemently over me, without speaking one word for a long time together.

At last she broke out, "Unhappy child!" says she, "what miserable chance could bring thee hither? And in the arms of my own son too! Dreadful girl!" says she, "why we are all undone! Married to thy own brother! Three children, and two alive, all of the same flesh and blood! My son and my daughter lying together as husband and wife! All confusion and distraction for ever! Miserable family! what will become of us? What is to be said? What is to be done?" and thus she run on for a great while, nor had I any power to speak, or if I had I did not know what to say, for every word wounded me to the soul.

With this kind of amazement on our thoughts we parted for the first time, though my mother was more surprised than I was, because it was more news to her than to me. However, she promised again to me at parting, that she would say nothing of it to her son till we had talked of it again.

It was not long, you may be sure, before we had a second conference upon the same subject; when, as if she had been willing to forget the story she had told me of herself, or to suppose that I had forgot some of the particulars, she began to tell them with alterations and omissions: but I refreshed her memory, and set her to rights in many things which I supposed she had forgot, and then came in so opportunely with the whole history, that it was impossible for her to go from it; and then she fell into her rhapsodies again, and exclamations at the severity of her misfortunes.

When these things were a little over with her, we fell into a close debate about what should be first done before we gave an account of the matter to my husband, but to what purpose could be all consultations. We could neither of us see our way through it, nor see how it could be safe to open such a scene to him. It was impossible to make any judgment, or give any guess at what temper he would receive it in, or what measures he would take upon it; and if he should have so little government of himself as to make it public, we easily foresaw that it would be the ruin of the whole family, and expose my mother and me to the last degree; and if at last he should take the advantage the law would give him, he might put me away with disdain, and leave me to sue for the little portion that I had, and perhaps waste it all in the suit, and then be a beggar. The children would be ruined too, having no legal claim to any of his effects; and thus I should see him perhaps in the arms of another wife in a few months, and be myself the most miserable creature alive.

My mother was as sensible of this as I, and upon the whole, we knew not what to do. After some time, we came to more sober resolutions; but then it was with this misfortune too, that my mother's opinion and mine were quite different from one another, and indeed inconsistent with one another: for my mother's opinion was, that I should bury the whole thing entirely, and continue to live with him as my husband, till some other event should make the discovery of it more convenient; and that, in the meantime, she would endeavour to reconcile us together again, and restore our mutual comfort and family peace; that we might lie as we used to do together, and so let the whole matter remain a secret as close as death: "For child," says she, "we are both undone if it comes out."

To encourage me to this, she promised to make me easy in my circumstances as far as she was able, and to leave me what she could at her death, secured for me separately from my husband; so that if it should come out afterwards, I should not be left destitute, but be able to stand on my own feet, and procure justice from him.

This proposal did not agree at all with my judgment of the thing, though it was very fair and kind in my mother; but my thoughts run quite another way.

As to keeping the thing in our own breasts, and letting it all remain as it was, I told her it was impossible; and I asked her how she could think I could bear the thoughts of lying with my own brother? In the next place I told her that her being alive was the only support of the discovery, and that while she owned me for her child, and saw reason to be satisfied that I was so, nobody else would doubt it; but if that she should die before the discovery, I should be taken for an impudent creature that had forged such a thing to go away from my husband, or should be counted crazed and distracted: then I told her how he had threatened already to put me into a madhouse, and what concern I had been in about it; and how that was the thing that drove me to the necessity of discovering it to her as I had done.

From all which I told her, that I had on the most serious reflection I was able to make in the case, come to this resolution, which I hoped she would like, as a medium between both, viz. that she would use her endeavours with her son to give me leave to go for England, as I had desired, and to furnish me with a sufficient sum of money, either in goods along with me, or in bills for my support there, all along suggesting, that he might one time or other think it proper to come over to me.

This was my scheme, and my reasons were good. I was really alienated from him in consequence of these things; indeed, I mortally hated him as a husband, and it was impossible to remove that rivetted aversion I had to him. At the same time, it being an unlawful, incestuous living, added to that aversion, and everything added to make cohabiting with him the most nauseous thing to me in the world, and I think verily it was come to such a height, that I could almost as willingly have embraced a dog as have let him offer the least thing of that kind to me; for which reason I could not bear the thoughts of coming between the sheets with him. I cannot say I was right in point of policy in carrying it such a length,—while, at the same time, I did not resolve to discover the thing to him, but I am giving an account of what was, not of what ought or ought not to be.

In this directly opposite opinion to one another my mother and I continued a long time, and it was impossible to reconcile our judgments; many disputes we had about it, but we could never either of us yield our own, or bring over the other.

I insisted on my aversion to lying with my own brother; and she insisted upon its being impossible to bring him to consent to my going from him to England; and in this uncertainty we continued, not differing so as to quarrel, or any thing like it; but so as not to be able to resolve what we should do to make up the terrible breach that was before us.

At last I resolved on a desperate course, and told my mother my resolution, viz. that in short, I would tell him of it myself. My mother was frightened to the last degree at the very thoughts of it; but I bid her be easy, told her I would do it gradually and softly, and with all the art and good humour I was mistress off, and time it also as well as I could, taking him in good humour too: I told her I did not question but if I could be hypocrite enough to feign more affection to him than I really had, I should succeed in all my designs, and we might part by consent, and with a good agreement, for I might love him well enough for a brother, though I could not for a husband.

All this while he lay at my mother to find out, if possible, what was the meaning of that dreadful expression of mine, as he called it, I mentioned before; namely, that I was not his lawful wife, nor my children his legal children: my mother put him off, told him she could bring me to no explanations, but found there was something that disturbed me very much, and she hoped she should get it out of me in time, and in the meantime recommended to him earnestly to use me more tenderly, and win me with his usual good carriage; told him of his terrifying and affrighting me with his threats of sending me to a madhouse, and the like, and advised him not to make a woman desperate on any account whatever.

He promised her to soften his behaviour, and bid her assure me that he loved me as well as ever, and that he had no such design as that of sending me to a madhouse, whatever he might say in his passion; also he desired my mother to use the same persuasions to me too, that our affection might be renewed, and we might live together in a good understanding as we used to do.

I found the effects of this treaty presently; my husband's conduct was immediately altered.

and he was quite another man to me; nothing could be kinder and more obliging than he was to me upon all occasions; and I could do no less than make some return to it, which I did as well as I could; but it was but in an awkward manner at best, for nothing was more frightful to me than his caresses, and the apprehensions of being with child again by him, was ready to throw me into fits; and this made me see that there was an absolute necessity of breaking the case to him without any more delay, which however I did with all the caution and reserve imaginable.

He had continued his altered carriage to me near a month, and we began to live a new kind of life with one another; and could I have satisfied myself to have gone on with it, I believe it might have continued as long as we continued alive together. One evening as we were sitting and talking very friendly together under a little awning, which served us as an arbour, at the entrance from our house into the garden, he was in a very pleasant agreeable humour, and said abundance of kind things to me, relating to the pleasure of our present good agreement, and the disorders of our past breach, and what a satisfaction it was to him, that we had room to hope we should never have any more of it.

I fetched a deep sigh, and told him there was nobody in the world could be more delighted than I was in the good agreement we had always kept up, or more afflicted with the breach of it, and should be so still, but I was sorry to tell him that there was an unhappy circumstance in our case, which lay too close to heart, and which I knew not how to break to him, that rendered my part of it very miserable, and took from me all the comfort of the rest.

He importuned me to tell him what it was; I told him I could not tell how to do it, that while it was concealed from him I alone was unhappy; but if he knew it also we should be both so; and that, therefore, to keep him in the dark about it was the kindest thing that I could do; and it was on that account alone that I kept a secret from him, the very keeping of which I thought would first or last be my destruction.

It is impossible to express his surprise at this relation, and the double importunity which he used with me to discover it to him. He told me I could not be called kind to him, nay, could not be faithful to him if I concealed it from him; I told him I thought so too, and yet I could not do it. He went back to what I had said before to him, and told me he hoped it did not relate to what I had said in my passion; and that he had resolved to forget all that, as the effect of a rash provoked spirit. I told him I wished I could forget it all too, but that it was not to be done; the impression was too deep, and I could not do it, it was impossible.

He then told me he was resolved not to differ with me in anything, and that, therefore, he would importune me no more about it, resolving to acquiesce in whatever I did or said; only begged I would then agree, that whatever it was, it should no more interrupt our quiet, and our mutual kindness.

This was the most provoking thing he could have said to me, for I really wanted his farther importunities, that I might be prevailed with to bring out that which indeed it was like death to me to conceal; so I answered him plainly, that I could not say I was glad not to be importuned, though I could not tell how to comply; "but come, my dear," said I, "what conditions will you make with me upon the opening this affair to you?"—"Any conditions in the world," said he, "that you can in reason desire of me." "Well," said I, "come, give it me under your hand, that if you do not find I am in any fault, or that I am willingly concerned in the causes of the misfortune that is to follow, you will not blame me; use me the worse, do me any injury, or make me the sufferer for that which is not my fault."

"That," says he, "is the most reasonable demand in the world: not to blame you for that which is not your fault; "give me a pen and ink," says he; "so I ran and fetched a pen, ink, and paper, and he wrote the conditions down in the very words I had proposed it, and signed it with his name; "well," says he, "what is next, my dear?"

"Why," says I, "the next is, that you will not blame me for not discovering the secret of it to you as soon as I knew it."

"Very just again," says he, "with all my heart." So he wrote down that also, and signed it.

"Well, my dear," says I, "then I have but one condition more to make with you, and that is, that, as there is nobody concerned in it but you and I, you shall not discover it to any person in the world except your own mother; and that in all the measures you shall take upon the discovery, as I am equally concerned in it with you, though as innocent as yourself, you shall do nothing in a passion, nothing to my prejudice, or to your mother's prejudice, without my knowledge and consent."

This a little amazed him; and he wrote down the words distinctly, but read them over and over before he signed them, hesitating at them several times, and repeating them; "my mother's prejudice! and your prejudice! what mysterious thing can this be?" However, at last, he signed it.

"Well," says I, "my dear, I will ask no more under your hand; but as you are to bear the most unexpected and surprising thing that perhaps ever befel any family in the world, I beg you to promise me you will receive it with composure and a presence of mind suitable to a man of sense."

"I will do my utmost," says he; "upon condition you will keep me no longer in suspense, for you terrify me with all these preliminaries."

"Well, then," says I, "it is this, as I told you before in a heat, that I was not your lawful wife, and that our children were not legal children; so I must let you know now in calmness, and in kindness, but with affliction enough, that I am your own sister, and you my own brother, and that we are both the children of our mother now alive, and in the house, who is convinced of the truth of it in a manner not to be denied or contradicted."

I saw him turn pale, and look wild, and I said—"Now, remember your promise, and receive it with presence of mind; for who could have said more to prepare you for it than I have done? However, I called a servant, and got him a small glass of rum, which is the usual dram of the country, for he was just fainting away.

When he was a little recovered I said to him, "This story you may be sure requires a long explanation, and therefore have patience and compose your mind to hear it out and I will make it as short as I can, and with this I told him what I thought was needful of the fact, and particularly how my mother came to discover it to me as above; and now my dear," says I, "you will see reason for my capitulations, and that I neither have been the cause of this matter nor could be so, and that I could know nothing of it before now."

"I am fully satisfied of that," says he, "but it is a dreadful surprise to me. However, I know a remedy that shall put an end to all your difficulties without your going to England."

"That would be as strange," said I, as all the rest—"

"No, no," says he, "I will make it easy; there is nobody in the way of it all but myself."

He looked a little disordered when he said this, but I did not apprehend anything from it at that time, believing, as it used to be said, that they who do these things never talk of them; or that they who talk of such things never do them.

But things were not come to their height with him, and I observed he became pensive and melancholy, and in a word, as I thought, a little distempered in his head; I endeavoured to talk him into temper, and to reason him into a kind of scheme for our government in the affair, and sometimes he would be well, and talk with some courage about it; but the weight of it lay too heavy upon his thoughts, and in short, it went so far that he made two attempts upon himself, and in one of them had actually strangled himself, and had not his mother come into the room in the very moment, he had died; but with the help of a negro servant she cut him down and recovered him.

Things were now come to a lamentable height in the family. My pity for him now began to revive that affection which at first I really had for him, and I endeavoured sincerely by all the kind carriage I could to make up the breach; but in short it had gotten too great a head, it preyed upon his spirits and it threw him into a long lingering consumption, though it happened not to be mortal. In this distress I did not know what to do as his life was apparently declining, and I might perhaps have married again there very much to my advantage; it had been certainly my business to have staid in the country; but my mind was restless too and uneasy; I hankered after coming to England and nothing would satisfy me without it.

In short, by an unwearied importunity my husband, who was apparently decaying, as I observed, was at last prevailed with, and so my own fate pushing me on, the way was made clear for me, and my mother concurring, I obtained a very good cargo for my coming to England.

When I parted with my brother, for such I am now to call him, we agreed that after arrived he should pretend to have an account that I was dead in England, and so might marry again when he would; he promised and engaged to me to correspond with me as a sister, and to assist and support me as long as I lived; and that if he died before me he would leave sufficient to his mother to take care of me still in the name of a sister, and he was in some respect careful of me when he heard of me; but it was so oddly managed that I felt the disappointments very sensibly afterwards, as you shall hear in its time.

I came away in the month of August, after I had been eight years in that country, and now a new scene of misfortunes attended me, which perhaps few women have gone through the like of.

We had an indifferent good voyage till we came just upon the coast of England, and where we arrived in two-and-thirty days, but were then ruffled with two or three storms, one of which drove us away to the coast of Ireland, and we put in at Kinsale. We remained there about thirteen days, got some refreshment on shore and put to sea again, though we met with very bad weather again, in which the ship sprung her mainmast, as they called it, for I knew not what they meant. But we got at last into Milford Haven, in Wales, where, though it was remote from our port, yet, having my foot safe upon the firm ground of my native country, the Isle of Britain, I resolved to venture it no more upon the waters, which had been so terrible to me, so getting my clothes and money on shore, with my bills of lading and other papers, I resolved to come for London and leave the ship to get her port as she could; the port whither she was bound was to Bristol, where my brother's chief correspondent lived.

I got to London in about three weeks, where I heard a little while after that the ship was arrived in Bristol, but at the same time had the misfortune to know that by the violent weather she had been in, and the breaking of her mainmast, she had great damage on board, and that a great part of her cargo was spoiled.

I had now a new scene of life upon my hands, and a dreadful appearance it had. I was come away with a kind of final farewell. What I brought with me was indeed considerable had it come safe, and by the help of it I might have married again tolerably well; but as it was I was reduced to between two or three hundred pounds in the whole, and this without any hope of recruit. I was entirely without friends, nay, even so much as without acquaintance, for I found it was absolutely necessary not to revive former acquaintances: and as for my subtle friend that set me up formerly for a fortune, she was dead, and her husband also, as I was informed upon sending a person, unknown, to inquire.

The looking after my cargo of goods soon after obliged me to take a journey to Bristol, and during my attendance upon that affair I took the diversion of going to the Bath, for as I was still far from being old, so my humour, which was always gay, continued so to an extreme; and being now as it were a woman of fortune, though I was a woman without a fortune, I expected something or other might happen in my way that might mend my circumstances, as had been my case before.

The Bath is a place of gallantry enough; expensive and full of snares: I went thither indeed in the view of taking anything that might offer; but I must do myself that justice as to protest I knew nothing amiss, I meant nothing but in an honest way; nor had I any thoughts about me at first that looked the way which afterwards I suffered them to be guided.

Here I stayed the whole latter season, as it is called there, and contracted some unhappy acquaintance, which rather prompted the follies I fell afterwards into than fortified me against them. I lived pleasantly enough, kept good company, that is to say, gay, fine company; but had the discouragement to find this way of living sunk me exceedingly, and that as I had no settled income, so spending upon the main stock was but a certain kind of bleeding to death, and this gave me many sad reflections in the intervals of my other thoughts. However I shook them off, and still flattered myself that something or other might offer for my advantage.

But I was in the wrong place for it; I was not now at Redriff, where, if I had set myself tolerably up, some honest sea-captain or other might have talked with me upon honourable terms of matrimony. But I was at the Bath, where men find a mistress sometimes, but very rarely look for a wife, and consequently all the particular acquaintance a woman can expect to make there must have some tendency that way.

I had spent the first season well enough, for though I had contracted some acquaintance with a gentleman who came to the Bath for his diversion, yet I had entered into no felonious treaty, as it might be called. I had resisted some casual offers of gallantry, and had managed that way well enough; I was not wicked enough to come into the crime for the mere vice of it, and I had no extraordinary offers made me that tempted me with the main thing which I wanted.

However, I went this length the first season, viz. I contracted an acquaintance with a woman in whose house I lodged, who, though she did not keep an ill house, as we call it, yet had none of the best principles in herself: I had on all occasions behaved myself so well as not to get the least slur upon my reputation on any account whatever, and all the men that I had conversed with were of so good reputation that I had not given the least reflection by conversing with them; nor did any of them seem to think there was room for a wicked correspondence, if they had any of them offered it; yet there was one gentleman, as above, who always singled me out for the diversion of my company, as he called it, which, as he was pleased to say, was very agreeable to him, but at that time there was no more in it.

I had many melancholy hours at the Bath after all the company was gone, for though I went to Bristol sometimes for the disposing my effects, and for recruits of money, yet I chose to come back to Bath for my residence, because, being on good terms with the woman in whose house I lodged in the summer, I found that during the winter I lived rather cheaper there than I could do anywhere else; here, I say, I passed the winter as heavily as I had passed the autumn cheerfully; but having contracted a nearer intimacy with the said woman in whose house I lodged, I could not avoid communicating to her something of what lay hardest upon my mind, and particularly the narrowness of my circumstances, and the loss of my fortune by the damage of my goods by sea: I told her also that I had a good mother and a brother in Virginia in good circumstances, and as I had really written back to my mother in particular to represent my condition, and the great loss I had received, which indeed came to almost 500*l.*, so did not fail to let my new friend know that I expected a supply from thence, and so indeed I did; and as the ships went from Bristol to York river in Virginia, and back again generally in less time than from London, and that my brother corresponded chiefly at Bristol, I thought it was much better for me to wait here for my returns than to go London, where also I had not the least acquaintance.

My new friend appeared sensibly affected with my condition, and indeed was so very kind as to reduce the rate of my living with her to so low a price during the winter, that she convinced me she got nothing by me; and as for lodging during the winter, I paid nothing at all.

When the spring season came on she continued to be as kind to me as she could, and I lodged with her for a time, till it was found necessary to do otherwise; she had some persons of character that frequently lodged in her house, and in particular the gentleman who, as I said, singled me out for his companion the winter before; and he came down again with another gentleman in his company and two servants, and lodged in the same house: I suspected that my landlady had invited him thither, letting him know that I was still with her, but she denied it, and protested to me that she did not, and he said the same.

In a word, this gentleman came down and continued to single me out for his peculiar confidence as well as conversation. He was a complete gentleman, that must be confessed, and his company was very agreeable to me, as mine, if I might believe him, was to him. He made no profession to me but of an extraordinary respect, and he had such an opinion of my virtue that, as he often professed, he believed if he should offer anything else I should reject him with contempt. He soon understood from me that I was a widow that had arrived at Bristol from Virginia by the last ships; and that I waited at Bath till the next Virginia fleet should arrive, by which I expected considerable effects. I understood by him, and by others of him, that he had a wife, but that the lady was distempered in her head, and was under the conduct of her own relations, which he consented to, to avoid any reflections that might, as was not unusual in such cases, be cast on him for mismanaging her cure; and in the meantime he came to Bath to divert his thoughts from the disturbance of such a melancholy circumstance as that was.

My landlady, who of her own accord encouraged the correspondence on all occasions, gave me an advantageous character of him, as of a man of honour and of virtue, as well as of a great estate; and indeed I had a great deal of reason to say so of him too; for though we lodged both on a floor, and he had frequently come into my chamber, even when I was in bed, and I also into his when he was in bed, yet he never offered anything to me farther than a kiss, or so much as solicited me to anything till long after, as you shall hear.

I frequently took notice to my landlady of his exceeding modesty, and she again used to tell me she believed it was so from the beginning. However, she used to tell me that she thought I ought to expect some gratification from him for my company, for indeed he did, as it were, engross me, and I was seldom from him.

I told her I had not given him the least occasion to think I wanted it, or that I would accept of it from him; she told me she would take that part upon her, and she did so, and managed it so dexterously, that the first time we were together alone, after she had talked with him, he began to inquire a little into my circumstances, as how I had subsisted myself since I came on shore? and whether I did not want money?

I stood off very boldly; I told him that though my cargo of tobacco was damaged, yet that it was not quite lost; that the merchant I had been consigned to had so honestly managed for me that I had not wanted; and that I hoped, with frugal management, I should make it hold out till more should come, which I expected by the next fleet. That in the meantime I had retrenched my expenses, and whereas I kept a maid last season, now I lived without; and whereas I had a chamber and a dining-room then on the first floor, as he knew, I now had but one room up two pair of stairs, and the like; but I live, said I, as well satisfied now as I did then; adding, that his company had been a means to make me live much more cheerfully than otherwise I should have done, for which I was much obliged to him; and so I put off all room for any offer for the present. However, it was not long before he attacked me again, and told me he found that I was backward to trust him with the secret of my circumstances, which he was sorry for; assuring me that he inquired into it with no design to satisfy his own curiosity, but merely to assist me, if there was any occasion; but since I would not own myself to stand in need of any assistance, he had but one thing more to desire of me, and that was, that I would promise him that when I was any way straightened, or like to be so, I would frankly tell him of it, and that I would make use of him with the same freedom that he made the offer, adding, that I should always find I had a true friend, though perhaps I was afraid to trust him.

I omitted nothing that was fit to be said by one infinitely obliged, to let him know that I had a due sense of his kindness; and indeed, from that time, I did not appear so much reserved to him as I had done before, though still within the bounds of the strictest virtue on both sides; but how free soever our conversation was, I could not arrive at that sort of freedom which he desired, viz. to tell him I wanted money, though I was secretly very glad of his offer.

Some weeks passed after this, and still I never asked him for money; when my landlady, a cunning creature, who had often pressed me to it, but found that I could not do it, makes a story of her own inventing, and comes in bluntly to me when we were together.

"O widow," said she, "I have bad news to tell you this morning."

"What is that," said I, "are the Virginia ships taken by the French?" for that was my fear.

"No, no," says she, "but the man you sent to Bristol yesterday for money is come back, and says he has brought you none."

Now I could by no means like her project; I thought it looked too much like prompting him, which indeed he did not want, and I saw clearly that I should lose nothing by being backward to ask, so I took her up short; "I can't imagine why he should say so to you," said I, "for I assure you he brought me all the money I sent him for, and here it is," said I, pulling out my purse with about twelve guineas in it, and added, "I intend you shall have most of it by and by."

He seemed displeased a little at her talking as she did at first, as well as I, taking it as I fancied he would, as something forward of her; but when he saw me give such an answer, he came immediately to himself again. The next morning we talked of it again, when I found he was fully satisfied; and smiling said, he hoped I would not want money and not tell him of it, and I had promised him otherwise. I told him I had been very much dissatisfied at my landlady's talking so publicly the day before of what she had nothing to do with; but I supposed she wanted what I owed her, which was about eight guineas, which I had resolved to give her, and had accordingly given it her the same night she talked so foolishly.

He was in a mighty good humour when he heard me say I had paid her, and it went off into some other discourse at that time; but the next morning having heard me up about my room before him, he called to me, and I answering, he asked me to come into his chamber. He was in bed when I came in, and he made me come and sit down on his bed-side, for he said he had something to say to me which was of some moment. After some very kind expressions, he asked me if I would be very honest to him, and give a sincere answer to one thing he would desire of me.

After some little cavil with him at the word sincere, and asking him if I had ever given him any answers which were not sincere, I promised him I would; why then his request was, he said, to let him see my purse; I immediately put my hand into my pocket, and laughing at him, pulled it out, and there was in it three guineas and a half; then he asked me if there was all the money I had? I told him no, laughing again, not by a great deal.

Well then, he said, he would have me promise to go and fetch him all the money I had, every farthing. I told him I would, and I went into my chamber, and fetched him a little private drawer, where I had about six guineas more, and some silver, and threw it down upon the bed, and told him there was all my wealth, honestly to a shilling. He looked a little at it, but did not tell it, and huddled it all into the drawer again, and reaching his pocket, pulled out a key, and bid me then open a little walnut-tree box he had upon the table, and bring him such a drawer, which I did, in which drawer there was a great deal of money in gold, I believe near two hundred guineas, but I knew not how much. He took the drawer, and taking my hand, made me put it in, and take a whole handful; I was backward at that, but he held my hand hard in his hand, and put it into the drawer, and made me take out as many guineas almost as I could well take up at once.

When I had done so he made me put them into my lap, and took my little drawer, and poured out all my own money among his, and bad me get me gone, and carry it all home into my own chamber.

I relate this story the more particularly because of the good humour there was in it, and to show the temper with which we conversed. It was not long after this, but he began every day to find fault with my clothes, with my laces, and head-dresses; and, in a word, pressed me to buy better, which by the way I was willing enough to do, though I did not seem to be so, for I loved nothing in the world better than fine clothes; I told him I must housewife the money he had lent me, or else I should not be able to pay him again. He then told me in a few words, that as he had a sincere respect for me, and knew my circumstances, he had not lent me that money, but given it me, and that he thought I had merited it from him, by giving him my company so entirely as I had done.

After this he made me take a maid and keep house and his friend that came with him to the Bath, being gone, he obliged me to diet him, which I did very willingly, believing, as it appeared, that I should lose nothing by it, nor did the woman of the house fail to find her account in it too.

We had lived thus near three months when the company beginning to wear away at the Bath, he talked of going away, and fain he would have me to go to London with him.

I was not very easy in that proposal, not knowing what posture I was to live in there, or how he might use me. But while this was in debate he fell very sick; he had gone out to a place in Somersetshire called Shepton, where he had some business, and was there taken very ill, and so ill that he could not travel; so he sent his man back to the Bath to beg me that I would hire a coach and come over to him. Before he went he had left all his money and other things of value with me, and what to do with them I did not know, but I secured them as well as I could, and locked up the lodgings and went to him, where I found him very ill indeed. I persuaded him to be carried in a litter to the Bath, where there was more help and better advice to be had.

He consented, and I brought him to the Bath, which was about fifteen miles, as I remember. Here he continued very ill of a fever, and kept his bed five weeks, all which time I nursed him and tended him myself, as much and as carefully as if I had been his wife. Indeed if I had been his wife I could not have done more; I sat up with him so much and so often, that at last indeed he would not let me sit up any longer, and then I got a pallet bed into his room and lay in it just at his bed's feet.

I was indeed sensibly affected with his condition, and with the apprehension of losing such a friend as he was, and was like to be, to me, and I used to sit and cry by him many hours together. However, at last he grew better, and gave hopes that he would recover, as indeed he did, though very slowly.

Were it otherwise than what I am going to say, I should not be backward to disclose it, as it is apparent I have done in other cases in this account; but I affirm, that through all the conversation, abating the freedom of coming into the chamber when he or I was in bed, and abating the necessary offices of attending him night and day when he was sick, there had not passed the least immodest word or action between us. O! that it had been so to the last.

After some time he gathered strength, and grew well apace, and I would have removed my pallet bed, but he would not let me till he was able to venture himself without anybody to sit up with him, and then I removed to my own chamber.

He took many occasions to express his sense of my tenderness and concern for him; and when he grew quite well he made me a present of fifty guineas for my care, and, as he called it, for hazarding my life to save his.

And now he made deep protestations of a sincere, inviolable affection for me; but all along attested it to be with the utmost reserve for my virtue, and his own. I told him I was fully satisfied of it; he carried it that length that he protested to me, that if he was naked in bed with me, he would as sacredly preserve my virtue, as he would defend it if I was assaulted by a ravisher; I believed him, and told him I did so; but this did not satisfy him; he would, he said, wait for some opportunity to give me an undoubted testimony of it.

It was a great while after this that I had occasion, on my own business, to go to Bristol, upon which he hired me a coach, and would go with me, and did so; and now indeed our intimacy increased; from Bristol he carried me to Gloucester, which was merely a journey of pleasure to take the air; and here it was our hap to have no lodging in the inn but in one large chamber with two beds in it. The master of the house going up with us to show his rooms, and coming into that room, said very frankly to him—"Sir, it is none of my business to inquire whether the lady be your spouse or no, but if not, you may lie as honestly in these two beds as if you were in two chambers;" and with that he pulls a great curtain which drew quite across the room, and effectually divided the beds. "Well," says my friend, very readily, "these beds will do, and as for the rest, we are too near akin to lie together, though we may lodge near one another;" and this put an honest face on the thing too. When we came to go to bed he decently went out of the room till I was in bed, and then went to bed in the bed on his own side of the room, but lay there talking to me a great while.

At last, repeating his usual saying, that he could lie in the bed naked with me and not offer me the least injury; he starts out of his bed—"And now, my dear," says he, "you shall see how just I will be to you, and that I can keep my word, and away he comes to my bed."

I resisted a little, but I must confess I should not have resisted him much, if he had not made those promises at all; so after a little struggle, as I said, I lay still, and let him come to bed; when he was there he took me in his arms, and so I lay all night with him, but he had no more to do with me, or offered anything to me other than embracing me, as I say, in his arms, no, not the whole night, but rose up and dressed him in the morning, and left me as innocent for him as I was the day I was born.

This was a surprising thing to me, and perhaps may be so to others who know how the laws of nature work; for he was a strong, vigorous, brisk person; nor did he act thus on a principle of religion at all, but of mere affection; insisting on it, that though I was to him the most agreeable woman in the world, yet because he loved me he could not injure me.

I own it was a noble principle; but as it was what I never understood before, so it was to me perfectly amazing. We travelled the rest of the journey as we did before, and came back to the Bath, where, as he had opportunity to come to me when he would, he often repeated the moderation, and I frequently lay with him, and he with me; and although all the familiarities between man and wife were common to us, yet he never once offered to go any farther, and he valued himself much upon it; I do not say that I was so wholly pleased with it as he thought I was; for I own I was much wickeder than he, as you shall hear presently.

We lived thus near two years, only with this exception, that he went three times to London in that time, and once he continued there four months; but, to do him justice, he always supplied me with money to subsist me very handsomely.

Had we continued thus, I confess we had had much to boast of; but, as wise men say, it is ill venturing too near the brink of a command, so we found it; and here again I must do him the justice to own that the first breach was not on his part; it was one night that we were in bed together warm and merry, and having drank, I think a little more wine that night, both of us than usual, though not in the least to disorder either of us, when after some other follies, which I cannot name, and being clasped close in his arms, I told him (I repeat it with shame and horror of soul) that I could find in my heart to discharge him of his engagement for one night and no more.

He took me at my word immediately; and after that there was no resisting him. Neither, indeed, had I any mind to resist him any more, let what would come of it.

Thus the government of our virtue was broken, and I exchanged the place of friend for that unmusical, harsh-sounding title of whore. In the morning we were both at our penitentials. I cried very heartily; he expressed himself very sorry; but that was all either of us could do at that time; and the way being thus cleared, and the bars of virtue and conscience being thus removed, we had the less difficulty afterwards to struggle with.

It was but a dull kind of conversation that we had together for all the rest of that week ; I looked on him with blushes ; and every now and then started that melancholy objection,—what if I should be with child now ? What will become of me then ? He encouraged me by telling me that as long as I was true to him he would be so to me ; and since it was gone such a length (which indeed he never intended), yet if I was with child he would take care of that and of me too. This hardened us both ; I assured him if I was with child, I would die for want of a midwife rather than name him as the father of it ; and he assured me I should never want if I should be with child. These mutual assurances hardened us in the thing ; and after this we repeated the crime as often as we pleased, till at length, as I had feared, so it came to pass, and I was indeed with child.

After I was sure it was so, and I had satisfied him of it too, we began to think of taking measures for the managing it, and I proposed trusting the secret to my landlady, and asking her advice, which he agreed to ; a woman (as I found) who was used to such things, and made light of it. She said she knew it would come to that at last, and made us very merry about it. As I said above, we found her an experienced old lady at such work ; she undertook every thing, engaged to procure a midwife and nurse ; to satisfy all inquiries ; and bring us off with reputation, and she did so very dexterously indeed.

When I grew near my time she desired my gentleman to go away to London, or make as if he did so ; when he was gone, she acquainted the parish officers that there was a lady ready to lie in at her house, but that she knew her husband very well, and gave them, as she pretended, an account of his name, which she called Sir Walter Cleave ; telling them, that he was a very worthy gentleman, and that she would answer for all inquiries and the like. This satisfied the parish officers presently, and I lay in with as much credit as I could have done if I had been my Lady Cleave ; and was assisted in my travail by three or four of the best citizens' wives of Bath, who lived in the neighbourhood, which, however, made me a little the more expensive to him. I often expressed my concern to him about it, but he bid me not be concerned at it.

As he had furnished me very sufficiently with money for the extraordinary expenses of my lying in, I had every thing very handsome about me ; but I did not affect to be gay or extravagant neither ; besides, knowing my own circumstances, and knowing the world as I have done, and that such kind of things do not often last long, I took care to lay up as much money as I could for a wet day, as I called it, making him believe it was all spent upon the extraordinary appearance of things in my lying-in.

By this means, and including what he had given me as above, I had at the end of my lying-in about two hundred guineas by me, including also what was left of my own.

I was brought to bed of a fine boy indeed, and a charming child it was ; and when he heard of it he wrote me a very kind obliging letter about it, and then told me he thought it would look better for me to come away for London as soon as I was up and well ; that he had provided apartments for me at Hammersmith, as if I came thither only from London, and that after a little while I should go back to the Bath, and he would go with me.

I liked this offer very well, and accordingly hired a coach on purpose, and taking my child and a wet nurse to tend and suckle it, and a maid servant with me, away I went for London.

He met me at Reading in his own chariot, and taking me into that, left the servant and the child in the hired coach, and so he brought me to my new lodgings at Hammersmith ; with which I had abundance of reason to be very well pleased, for they were very handsome rooms, and I was very well accommodated.

And now I was indeed in the height of what I might call my prosperity, and I wanted nothing but to be a wife, which however could not be in this case, there was no room for it ; and therefore on all occasions I studied to save what I could, as I have said above, against a time of scarcity ; knowing well enough that such things as these do not always continue, that men that keep mistresses often change them, grow weary of them, or jealous of them, or something or other happens to make them withdraw their bounty ; and sometimes the ladies that are thus well used are not careful by a prudent conduct to preserve the esteem of their persons, or the nice article of their fidelity, and then they are justly cast off with contempt.

But I was secured in this point, for as I had no inclination to change, so I had no manner of acquaintance in the whole house, and so no temptation to look any farther ; I kept no company but in the family where I lodged, and with a clergyman's lady at next door ; so that when he was absent I visited nobody, nor did he ever find me out of my chamber or parlour whenever he came down ; if I went anywhere to take the air it was always with him.

The living in this manner with him, and his with me, was certainly the most undesigned thing in the world ; he often protested to me, that when he became first acquainted with me, and even to the very night when we first broke in upon our rules, he never had the least design of lying with me ; that he always had a sincere affection for me, but not the least real inclination to do what he had done. I assured him I never suspected him ; that if I had, I should not so easily have yielded to the freedoms which brought it on, but that it was all a surprise, and was owing to the accident of our having yielded too far to our mutual inclinations that night ; and indeed I have often observed since, and leave it as a caution to the readers of this story, that we ought to be cautious of gratifying our inclinations in loose and lewd freedoms, lest we find our resolutions of virtue fail us in the juncture when their assistance should be most necessary.

It is true, and I have confessed it before, that, from the first hour I began to converse with him, I resolved to let him lie with me, if he offered it ; but it was because I wanted his help and assistance, and I knew no other way of securing him than that. But when we were that night together, and, as I have said, had gone such a length, I found my weakness; the inclination was not to be resisted, but I was obliged to yield up all even before he asked it.

However, he was so just to me that he never upbraided me with that; nor did he ever express the least dislike to my conduct on any occasion, but always protested he was as much delighted with my company as he was the first hour we came together; I mean came together as bed-fellows.

It is true that he had no wife, that is to say, she was no wife to him, and so I was in no danger that way; but the just reflections of conscience oftentimes snatch a man, especially a man of sense, from the arms of a mistress, as it did him at last, though on another occasion.

On the other hand, though I was not without secret reproaches of my own conscience for the life I led, and that even in the greatest height of the satisfaction I ever took, yet I had a terrible prospect of poverty and starving, which lay on me as a frightful spectre, so that there was no looking behind me. But as poverty brought me into it, so fear of poverty kept me in it, and I frequently resolved to leave it quite off, if I could but come to lay up money enough to maintain me. But these were thoughts of no weight, and whenever he came to me they vanished; for his company was so delightful that there was no being melancholy when he was there. The reflections were all the subjects of those hours when I was alone.

I lived six years in this happy but unhappy condition, in which time I brought him three children, but only the first of them lived; and though I removed twice in those six years, yet I came back the sixth year to my first lodgings at Hammersmith. Here it was that I was one morning surprised with a kind but melancholy letter from my gentleman; intimating that he was very ill, and was afraid he should have another fit of sickness, but that his wife's relations being in the house with him, it would not be practicable to have me with him, which, however, he expressed his great dissatisfaction in, and that he wished I could be allowed to tend and nurse him as I did before.

I was very much concerned at this account, and was very impatient to know how it was with him. I waited a fortnight or thereabout, and heard nothing, which surprised me, and I began to be very uneasy indeed. I think, I may say, that for the next fortnight I was near to distracted. It was my particular difficulty, that I did not know directly where he was; for I understood at first he was in the lodgings of his wife's mother; but having removed myself to London, I soon found, by the help of the direction I had for writing my letters to him, how to inquire after him, and there I found he was at a house in Bloomsbury, whither he had, a little before he fell sick, removed his whole family; and that his wife and wife's mother were in the same house, though the wife was not suffered to know that she was in the same house with her husband.

Here I also soon understood that he was at the last extremity, which made me almost at the last extremity too, to have a true account. One night I had the curiosity to disguise myself as a servant-maid, in a round cap and straw bonnet, and went to the door, as sent by a lady of his neighbourhood where he lived before, and giving her master and mistress's service, I said I was sent to know how Mr ——— did, and how he had rested that night. In delivering this message I got the opportunity I desired; for, speaking with one of the maids, I held a gossip's tale with her, and heard all the particulars of his illness, which I found was a pleurisy, attended with a cough and fever. She told me also who was in the house, and how his wife was, who, by her relation, they were in hopes would recover her understanding; but as to the gentleman himself, in short, she told me, the doctors said, there was very little hope of him; that in the morning they thought he had been dying, and that he was but little better then, for they did not expect he would live over the next night.

This was heavy news for me, and I began now to see an end to my prosperity, and to see that it was well I had played the good housewife, and saved something while he was alive, for I had no view of my own living before me.

It lay very heavy upon my mind, too, that I had a son, a fine lovely boy, above five years old, and no provision made for it, at least that I knew of. With these considerations, and a sad heart, I went home that evening, and began to cast with myself how I should live, and in what manner to bestow myself for the residue of my life.

You may be sure I could not rest without inquiring very quickly what was become of him; and not venturing to go myself, I sent several sham messengers, till, after a fortnight's waiting longer, I found there was hopes of his life, though he was still very ill; then I abated my sending any more to the house, and in some time after I learnt in the neighbourhood that he was about house, and then he was abroad again.

I made no doubt then but that I should soon hear of him, and began to comfort myself with my circumstances being, as I thought, recovered; but with much surprise and amazement I waited near two months and heard nothing but that, being recovered, he was gone into the country for the air, and for the better recovery after his distemper. After this it was yet two months more, and then I understood he was come to his city house again, but still I heard nothing from him.

I had written several letters for him, and directed them as usual, but found two or three of them had been called for, but not the rest. I wrote again in a more pressing manner than ever, and in one of them let him know that I must be forced to wait on him myself, representing my circumstances, the rent of lodgings to pay, and the provision for the child wanting, and my own deplorable condition, destitute of subsistence after his most solemn engagement to take care of and provide for me. I took a copy of this letter, and finding it lay at the house near a month, and was not called for, I found means to have the copy of it put into his own hands at a coffee-house, where I had by inquiry found he used to go.

This letter forced an answer from him, by which, though I found I was to be abandoned, yet I found he had sent a letter to me some time before, desiring me to go down to the Bath again, its contents I shall come to presently.

It is true that sick-beds are the times when such correspondence as this is looked on with different countenance, and seen with other eyes than we saw them with, or than they appeared with before. My lover had been at the gates of death, at the very brink of eternity; and it seems had been struck with a due remorse, and with sad reflections upon his past life of gallantry and levity; and among the rest, this criminal correspondence with me, which was neither more or less than a long continued life of adultery had represented itself, as it really was, and not as it had been formerly thought by him to be, and he looked upon it now with a just and a religious abhorrence.

I cannot but observe also, and leave it for the direction of my sex in such cases of pleasure, that whenever sincere repentance succeeds such a crime as this, there never fails to attend a hatred of the object; and the more the affection might seem to be before, the hatred will be the more in proportion. It will always be so, indeed it can be no otherwise; for there cannot be a true and sincere abhorrence of the offence and the love to the cause of it remain, there will with an abhorrence of the sin be found a detestation of the fellow sinner; you can expect no other.

I found it so here, though good manners and justice in this gentleman kept him from carrying it to any extreme; but the short history of his part in this affair was thus; he perceived by my last letter, and by all the rest, which he went for after, that I was not gone to the Bath, and that his first letter had not come to my hand, upon which he writes me this following:

"Madam,

"I am surprised that my letter, dated the 8th of last month, did not come to your hand; I give you my word it was delivered at your lodgings, and to the hands of your maid.

"I need not acquaint you with what has been my condition for some time past, and how I have been at the edge of the grave: I am, by the unexpected and undeserved mercy of heaven, restored again. In the condition I have been in, it cannot be strange to you that our unhappy correspondence has not been the least of the burthens which lay upon my conscience; I need say no more, those things that must be repented of, must be also reformed.

"I wish you would think of going back to the Bath. I inclose you here a bill for 50*l.* for clearing yourself at your lodgings, and carrying you down, and hope it will be no surprise to you to add, that on this account only, and not for any offence given me on your side, I can see you no more. I will take due care of the child; leave him where he is, or take him with you, as you please. I wish you the like reflections, and that they may be to your advantage. I am," &c.

I was struck with this letter as with a thousand wounds; the reproaches of my own conscience were such as I cannot express, for I was not blind to my own crime; and I reflected that I might with less offence have continued with my brother, and lived with him as a wife, since there was no crime in our marriage on that score, neither of us knowing it.

But I never once reflected that I was all this while a married woman, a wife to Mr — the linen draper, who, though he had left me by the necessity of his circumstances, had no power to discharge me from the marriage contract which was between us, or to give me a legal liberty to marry again; so that I had been no less than a whore and an adultress all this while; I then reproached myself with the liberties I had taken, and how I had been a snare to this gentleman, and that, indeed, I was principal in the crime; that now he was mercifully snatched out of the gulph by a convincing work upon his mind, but that I was left as if I was forsaken of God's grace, and abandoned by heaven to a continuing in my wickedness.

Under these reflections I continued very pensive and sad for near a month, and did not go down to the Bath, having no inclination to be with the woman who I was with before; lest, as I thought, she should prompt me to some wicked course of life again, as she had done; and besides, I was very loath she should know I was cast off as above.

And now I was greatly perplexed about my little boy; it was death to me to part with the child, and yet when I remembered the danger of being one time or other left with him to keep, without a maintenance to support him, I then resolved to leave him where he was; but then I concluded also to be near him myself too, that I might have the satisfaction of seeing him without the care of providing for him.

I sent my gentleman a short letter therefore, that I had obeyed his orders in all things but that of going back to the Bath, which I could not think of for many reasons. That, however, parting from him was a wound to me that I could never recover, and yet that I was fully satisfied his reflections were just, and would be very far from desiring to obstruct his reformation or repentance.

Then I represented my own circumstances to him in the most moving terms that I was able. I told him that that those unhappy distresses which first moved him to a generous and an honest friendship for me, would, I hoped, move him to a little concern for me now; though the criminal part of our correspondence, which I believed neither of us intended to fall into at that time, was broken off; that I desired to repent as sincerely as he had done, but entreated him to put me in some condition, that I might not be exposed to the temptations which the devil never fails to excite us to, from the frightful prospect of poverty and distress; and if he had the least apprehensions of my being troublesome to him, I begged he would put me in a posture to go back to my mother in Virginia, from whence he knew I came, and that would put an end to all his fears on that account. I concluded, that if he would send me fifty more to facilitate my going away, I would send him back a general release, and would promise never to disturb him more with any importunities; unless it were to hear of the well-doing of the child, who, if I found my mother living, and my circumstances able, I would send for to come over to me, and take him also effectually off his hands.

This was, indeed, all a cheat thus far, viz. that I had no intention to go to Virginia, as the account of my former affairs there may convince anybody of; but the business was to get this last fifty pounds of him, if possible, knowing well enough it would be the last penny I was ever to expect.

However, the argument I used, namely, of giving him a general release, and never troubling him any more, prevailed effectually with him, and he sent me a bill for the money by a person who brought with him a general release for me to sign, and which I frankly signed, and received the money; and thus, though full sore against my will, a final end was put to this affair.

And here I cannot but reflect upon the unhappy consequence of too great freedoms between persons situated as we were, upon the pretence of innocent intentions, love of friendship, and the like; for the flesh has generally so great a share in those friendships, that it is great odds but inclination prevails at last over the most solemn resolutions; and that vice breaks in at the breaches of decency, which really innocent friendship ought to preserve with the greatest strictness; but I leave the readers of these things to their own just reflections, which they will be more able to make effectual than I, who so soon forgot myself, and am therefore but a very indifferent monitor.

I was now a single person again, as I may call myself; I was loosed from all the obligations either of wedlock or mistress-ship in the world; except my husband the linen-draper, who I having not now heard from in almost fifteen years, nobody could blame me for thinking myself entirely freed from.

I now began to cast up my accounts; I had by many letters, and much importunity, and with the intercession of my mother too, I had a second return of some goods from my brother, as I now call him, in Virginia, to make up the damage of the cargo I brought away with me, and this too was upon the condition of my sealing a general release to him, and to send it him by his correspondent at Bristol, which though I thought hard of, yet I was obliged to promise to do. However, I managed so well in this case, that I got my goods away before the release was signed, and then I always found something or other to say to evade the thing, and to put off the signing it at all; till at length I pretended I must write to my brother, and have his answer, before I could do it.

Including this recruit, and before I got the last fifty, I found my strength to amount, put all together, to about 400*l.*, so that with that I had above 450*l.* I had saved about 100*l.* more, but I met with a disaster with that, which was this, that a goldsmith in whose hands I had trusted it, broke, so I lost 70*l.* of my money, the man's composition not making above 30*l.* out of this 100*l.* I had a little plate, but not much, and was well enough stocked for clothes and linen.

With this stock I had the world to begin again; but you are to consider that I was not now the same woman as when I lived at Redriff; for first of all I was near twenty years older, and did not look the better for my age, nor for my rambles to Virginia and back again; and though I omitted nothing that might set me out to advantage, except painting, for that I never stooped to, and had pride enough to think that I did not want it, yet there would always be some difference seen between five and twenty and two and forty.

I cast about innumerable ways for my future state of life, and began to consider very seriously what I should do, but nothing offered; I took care to make the world take me for something more than I was, and had it given out that I was a fortune, and that my estate was in my own hands, the last of which was very true, the first of it was as above. I had no acquaintance, which was one of my worst misfortunes, and the consequence of that was, I had no adviser, at least who could advise and assist together; and above all, I had nobody to whom I could in confidence commit the secret of any circumstances to, and could depend upon for their secrecy and fidelity; and I found by experience, that to be friendless is the worst condition, next to being in want, that a woman can be reduced to. I say a woman, because it is evident men can be their own advisers and their own directors, and know how to work themselves out of difficulties and into business better than women; but if a woman has no friend to communicate her affairs to, and to advise and assist her, it is ten to one but she is undone; nay, and the more money she has the more danger she is in of being wronged and deceived; and this was my case in the affair of the hundred pounds which I left in the hands of the goldsmith as above, whose credit, it seems, was upon the ebb before; but I that had no knowledge of things, and nobody to consult with, knew nothing of it, and so lost my money.

When a woman is thus left desolate and void of council, she is just like a bag of money or a jewel dropped on the highway, which is a prey to the next comer. If a man of virtue and upright principles happens to find it, he will have it cried, and the owner may come to hear of it again; but how many times shall such a thing fall into the hands that will make no scruple of seizing it for their own, to once that it shall come into good hands?

This was evidently my case, for I was now a loose unguided creature, and had no help, no assistance, no guide for my conduct. I knew what I aimed at, and what I wanted, but knew nothing how to pursue the end by direct means. I wanted to be placed in a settled state of living, and had I happened to meet with a sober good husband, I should have been as faithful and true a wife to him as virtue itself could have formed. If I had been otherwise, the vice came in always at the door of necessity, not at the door of inclination; and I understood too well, by the want of it, what the value of a settled life was, to do any thing to forfeit the felicity of it; nay, I should have made the better wife for all the difficulties I had passed through, by a great deal; nor did I, in any of the times that I had been a wife, give my husbands the least uneasiness on account of my behaviour.

But all this was nothing, I found no encouraging prospect; I waited; I lived regularly, and with as much frugality as became my circumstances, but nothing offered; nothing presented, and the main stock wasted apace, and what to do I knew not; the terror of approaching poverty lay hard upon my spirits. I had some money, but where to place it I knew not, nor would the interest of it maintain me, at least not in London.

At length a new scene opened. There was in the house where I lodged a north countrywoman that passed for a gentlewoman, and nothing was more frequent in her discourse than her account of the cheapness of provisions, and the easy way of living in her country; how plentiful and how cheap everything was; what good company they kept, and the like; till at last I told her she almost tempted me to go and live in her country, for I that was a widow, though I had sufficient to live on, yet had no way of increasing it, and that London was an expensive and extravagant place; that I found I could not live here under a hundred pounds a year, unless I kept no company, no servant, made no appearance, and buried myself in privacy, as if I was obliged to it by necessity.

I should have observed, that she was always made to believe, as everybody else was, that I was a great fortune, or at least that I had 3000*l.* or 4000*l.*, if not more, and all in my own hands; and she was mighty sweet upon me when she thought me inclined in the least to go into her country. She said she had a sister lived near Liverpool, that her brother was a considerable gentleman there, and had a great estate also in Ireland; that she would go down there in about two months, and if I would give her my company thither, I should be as welcome as herself for a month or more, as I pleased, till I should see how I liked the country; and if I thought fit to live there, she would undertake they would take care, though they did not entertain lodgers themselves, to recommend me to some agreeable family, where I should be placed to my content.

If this woman had known my real circumstances, she would never have laid so many snares, and taken so many weary steps, to catch a poor desolate creature that was good for little when it was caught; and, indeed, I, whose case was almost desperate, and thought I could not be much worse, was not very anxious about what might befall me, provided they did me no personal injury; so I suffered myself, though not without a great deal of invitation, and great professions of sincere friendship and real kindness, I say I suffered myself to be prevailed upon to go with her, and accordingly I packed up my baggage, and put myself in a posture for a journey, though I did not absolutely know whither I was to go.

And now I found myself in great distress; what little I had in the world was all in money, except as before, a little plate, some linen, and my clothes; as for household stuff I had little or none, for I had lived always in lodgings; but I had not one friend in the world with whom to trust that little I had, or to direct me how to dispose of it, and this perplexed me night and day. I thought of the bank and of the other companies in London, but I had no friend to commit the management of it to; and to keep and carry about with me bank bills, tallies, orders, and such things, I looked upon it as unsafe; that if they were lost my money was lost, and then I was undone; and, on the other hand, I might be robbed, and perhaps murdered, in a strange place for them. This perplexed me strangely, and what to do I knew not.

It came into my thoughts one morning that I would go to the bank myself, where I had often been to receive the interest of some bills I had, which had interest payable on them, and where I had found the clerk, to whom I applied myself, very honest and just to me, and particularly so fair one time, that when I had mis-told my money and taken less than my due, and was coming away, he set me to rights and gave me the rest, which he might have put into his own pocket.

I went to him and represented my case very plainly, and asked if he would trouble himself to be my adviser, who was a poor friendless widow and knew not what to do. He told me, if I desired his opinion of anything within the reach of his business, he would do his endeavours that I should not be wronged, but that he would also help me to a good sober person who was a grave man of his acquaintance, who was a clerk in such business too, though not in their house, whose judgment was good, and whose honesty I might depend upon; "for," added he, "I will answer for him, and for every step he takes; if he wrongs you, madam, of one farthing, it shall lie at my door; I will make it good; and he delights to assist people in such cases; he does it as an act of charity."

I was a little at a stand at this discourse, but after some pause I told him I had rather have depended upon him, because I had found him honest; but if that could not be, I would take his recommendation sooner than any one else. "I dare say, madam," says he, "that you will be as well satisfied with my friend as with me." It seems he had his hands full of the business of the bank. I had engaged to meddle with no other business than that of his office. He added, that his friend should take nothing off me for his advice or assistance, and this indeed encouraged me very much.

He appointed the same evening, after the bank was shut and business over, for me to meet him and his friend; and, indeed, as soon as I saw his friend, and he began but to talk of the affair, I was fully satisfied that I had a very honest man to deal with; his countenance spoke it, and his character, as I heard afterwards, was everywhere so good that I had no room for any more doubts upon me.

After the first meeting, in which I only said what I had said before we parted, and he appointed me to come the next day to him, telling me, I might in the meantime satisfy myself or him by inquiry, which, however, I knew not how well to do, having no acquaintance myself.

Accordingly I met him the next day, when I entered more freely with him into my case; I told him my circumstances at large; that I was a widow come over from America, perfectly desolate and friendless; that I had a little money, and but a little, and I was almost distracted for fear of losing it, having no friend in the world to trust with the management of it; that I was going into the north of England to live cheap, that my stock might not waste; that I would willingly lodge my money in the bank, but that

I durst not carry the bills about me, and the like, as above, and how to correspond about it, or with who, I knew not.

He told me I might lodge the money in the bank as an account, and its being entered in the books would entitle me to the money at any time, and if I was in the north I might draw bills on the cashier, and receive it when I would; but that then it would be esteemed as running cash, and the bank would give no interest for it; that I might buy stock with it, and so it would lie in store for me, but that then, if I wanted to dispose of it, I must come up to town on purpose to transfer it, and even it would be with some difficulty I should receive the half-yearly dividend, unless I was here in person, or had some friend I could trust with having the stock in his name to do it for me, and that would have the same difficulty in it as before; and with that he looked hard at me and smiled a little. At last, says he, "Why do you not get a head steward, madam, that may take you and your money together into keeping, and then you would have the trouble taken off your hands?"

"Ay, sir, and the money too it may be," said I, "for truly I find the hazard that way is as much as it is the other way;" but I remember, I said, secretly to myself, I wish you would ask me the question fairly, I would consider very seriously on it before I said no.

He went on a good way with me, and I thought once or twice he was in earnest, but to my real affliction, I found at last he had a wife; but when he owned he had a wife he shook his head, and said, with some concern, that indeed he had a wife and no wife. I began to think he had been in the condition of my late lover, and that his wife had been distempered, or lunatic, or some such thing. However, we had not much more discourse at that time, but he told me he was in too much hurry of business then, but that if I would come home to his house after their business was over, he would by that time consider what might be done for me, to put my affairs in a posture of security. I told him I would come, and desired to know where he lived. He gave me a direction in writing, and when he gave it me he read it to me, and said, "There it is, madam, if you dare trust yourself with me."

"Yes, sir," said I, "I believe I may venture to trust you with myself, for you have a wife you say, and I do not want a husband; besides, I dare trust you with my money, which is all I have in the world, and if that were gone, I might trust myself anywhere."

He said some things in jest that were very handsome and mannerly, and would have pleased me very well if they had been in earnest; but that passed over, I took the directions, and appointed to attend him at his house at seven o'clock the same evening.

When I came he made several proposals for my placing my money in the bank, in order to my having interest for it; but still some difficulty or other came in the way, which he objected as not safe; and I found such a sincere disinterested honesty in him, that I began to muse with myself, that I had certainly found the honest man I wanted, and that I could never put myself into better hands; so I told him with a great deal of frankness, that I had never met with man or woman yet that I could trust, or in whom I could think myself safe, but that I saw he was so disinterestedly concerned for my safety, that I said I would freely trust him with the management of that little I had, if he would accept to be steward for a poor widow that could give him no salary.

He smiled, and standing up with great respect, saluted me. He told me he could not but take it very kindly that I had so good an opinion of him; that he would not deceive me; that he would do anything in his power to serve me and expect no salary; but that he could not by any means accept of a trust, that it might bring him to be suspected of self-interest, and that if I should die he might have disputes with my executors, which he should be very loath to encumber himself with.

I told him if those were all his objections I would soon remove them, and convince him that there was not the least room for any difficulty; for that, first, as for suspecting him, if ever I should do it, now was the time to suspect him, and not put the trust into his hands, and whenever I did suspect him, he could but throw it up then and refuse to go any farther. Then, as to executors, I assured him I had no heirs, nor any relations in England, and I would have neither heirs or executors but himself, unless I should alter my condition before I died, and then his trust and trouble should cease together, which, however, I had no prospect of yet; but I told him, if I died as I was, it should be all his own, and he would deserve it by being so faithful to me as I was satisfied he would be.

He changed his countenance at this discourse, and asked me how I came to have so much good will for him, and looking very much pleased, said, he might very lawfully wish he was a single man for my sake.

I smiled and told him, that as he was not, my offer could have no design upon him in it, and to wish as he did was not to be allowed, it was criminal to his wife.

He told me I was wrong; "for," says he, "madam, as I said before, I have a wife and no wife, and it would be no sin to me to wish her hanged, if that were all."

"I know nothing of your circumstances that way, sir," said I; "but it cannot be innocent to wish your wife dead."

"I tell you," says he again, "she is a wife and no wife; you do not know what I am, or what she is."

"That is true," said I, "sir, I do not know what you are; but I believe you to be an honest man, and that is the cause of all my confidence in you."

"Well, well," says he, "and so I am, I hope, too, but I am something else too, madam, for," says he, "to be plain with you, I am a cuckold, and she is a whore." He spoke it in a kind of a jest, but it was with such an awkward smile, that I perceived it was what stuck very close to him, and he looked dismally when he said it.

"That alters the case indeed, sir," said I, "as to that part you were speaking of; but a cuckold you know may be an honest man, it does not alter that case at all. Besides, I think," said I,

"since your wife is so dishonest to you, you are too honest to her to own her for your wife; but that," said I, "is what I have nothing to do with."

"Nay," says he, "I do think to clear my hands of her, for, to be plain with you, madam," added he, "I am no contented cuckold neither; on the other hand, I assure you it provokes me to the highest degree, but I cannot help myself; she that will be a whore, will be a whore."

I waived the discourse, and began to talk of my business, but I found he could not have done with it, so I let him alone, and he went on to tell me all the circumstances of his case, too long to relate here particularly, that having been abroad out of England some time before he came to the post he was in, she had had two children in the meantime by an officer of the army; and that when he came to England, and, upon her submission, took her again, and maintained her very well, yet she ran away from him with a linen-draper's apprentice; robbed him of what she could come at, and continued to live from him still; "so that, madam," says he, "she is a whore not by necessity, which is the common bait of your sex, but by inclination, and for the sake of the vice."

Well, I pitied him, and wished him well rid of her, and still would have talked of my business, but it would not do; at last he looks steadily at me, "Look you, madam," says he, "you came to ask advice of me, and I will serve you as faithfully as if you were my own sister; but I must turn the tables, since you oblige me to do it, and are so friendly to me, and I think I must ask advice of you; tell me what must a poor abused fellow do with a whore? What can I do to do myself justice upon her?"

"Alas! sir," says I, "it is a case too nice for me to advise in, but it seems she is run away from you, so you are rid of her fairly; what can you desire more?"

"Ay, she is gone indeed," said he, "but I am not clear of her for all that."

"That's true," says I; "she may indeed run you into debt, but the law has furnished you with methods to prevent that also; you may cry her down, as they call it."

"No, no," says he, "that is not the case; I have taken care of all that; 'tis not that part I speak of, but I would be rid of her, that I might marry again."

"Well, sir," says I, "then you must divorce her; if you can prove what you say, you may certainly get that done, and then, I suppose, you are free."

"That is very tedious and expensive," says he.

"Why," says I, "if you can get any woman you like to take your word, I suppose your wife would not dispute their liberty with you that she takes herself."

"Ay," says he, "but it would be hard to bring an honest woman to do that; and for the other sort," says he, "I have had enough of her to meddle with any more whores."

It occurred to me presently, I would have taken your word with all my heart, if you had but asked me the question; but that was to myself; to him I replied, "Why, you shut the door against any honest woman accepting you, for you condemn all that I should venture upon you at once, and conclude, that really, a woman that takes you now, cannot be honest."

"Why," says he, "I wish you would satisfy me that an honest woman would take me, I would venture it," and then turns short upon me, "will you take me, madam?"

"That is not a fair question," says I, "after what you have said; however, lest you should think I wait only for a recantation of it, I shall answer you plainly, no, not I; my business is of another kind with you, and I did not expect you would have turned my serious application to you in my own distracted case into a comedy."

"Why, madam," says he, "my case is as distracted as yours can be, and I stand in as much need of advice as you do, for I think, if I have not relief somewhere, I shall be mad myself, and I know not what course to take, I protest to you."

"Why, sir," says I, "it is easier to give advice in your case, much easier than it is in mine."

"Speak then," says he, "I beg of you, for now you encourage me."

"Why," says I, "if your case is so plain as you say it is, you may be legally divorced, and then you may find honest women enough to ask the question of fairly; the sex is not so scarce that you can want a wife."

"Well then," said he, "I am in earnest, I will take your advice; but shall I ask you one question seriously beforehand?"

"Any question," said I, "but that you did before."

"No, that answer will not do," said he, "for, in short, that is the question I shall ask."

"You may ask what question you please; but you have my answer to that already. Besides, sir," said I, "can you think so ill of me as that I would give any answer to such a question beforehand? Can any woman alive believe you in earnest, or think you design anything but to banter her?"

"Well, well," says he, "I do not banter you; I am in earnest: consider of it."

"But, sir," says I, a little gravely, "I came to you about my own business; I beg of you let me know what you will advise me to do?"

"I will be prepared," says he, "against you come again."

"Nay," says I, "you have forbid my coming any more."

"Why so," said he, and looked a little surprised.

"Because," said I, "you cannot expect I should visit you on the account you talk of."

"Well," says he, "you shall promise me to come again, however, and I will not say any more of it till I have gotten the divorce, but I desire you will prepare to be better conditioned when that is done, for you shall be the woman, or I will not be divorced at all. Why, I owe it to your unlooked-for kindness, if it were to nothing else, but I have other reasons too."

He could not have said anything in the world that pleased me better; however, I knew that the way to secure him was to stand off while the thing was so remote as it appeared to be, and that it was time enough to accept of it when he was able to perform it; so I said very respectfully to him it was time enough to consider of these things when he was in a condition to talk of them; in the meantime I told him I was going a great way from him, and he would find objects enough to please him better. We broke off here for the present, and he made me promise him to come again the next day for his resolutions upon my own business, which after some pressing I did; though, had he seen farther into me, I wanted no pressing on that account.

I came the next evening accordingly, and brought my maid with me, to let him see that I kept a maid, but I sent her away as soon as I was gone in. He would have had me let the maid have stayed, but I would not, but ordered her to come for me again about nine o'clock; but he forbid that, and told me he would see me safe home himself, which I was not very well pleased with, supposing that he might do that to inquire into my character and circumstances.

However, I ventured that; for all that the people there or thereabout knew of me was to my advantage, and all the character he had of me, after he had inquired, was, that I was a woman of fortune, and that I was a very modest, sober body; which, whether true or not in the main, yet you may see how necessary it is for all women who expect anything in the world to preserve the character of their virtue, even when perhaps they may have sacrificed the thing itself.

I found, and was not a little pleased with it, that he had provided a supper for me: I found also he lived very handsomely, and had a house very handsomely furnished, all which I was rejoiced at indeed, for I looked upon it as all my own.

We had now a second conference upon the subject matter of the last conference. He laid his business very home indeed; he protested his affection to me, and indeed I had no room to doubt it. He declared that it began from the first moment I talked with him, and long before I had mentioned leaving my effects with him. It is no matter when it begun, thought I, if it will but hold it will be well enough. He then told me how much the offer I had made of trusting him with my effects, and leaving them to him, had engaged him; so I intended it should, thought I, but then I thought you had been a single man too. After we had supped, I observed he pressed me very hard to drink two or three glasses of wine, which, however, I declined; but drank one glass or two. He then said he had a proposal to make to me, which I should promise him I would not take ill, if I should not grant it. I told him I hoped he would make no dishonourable proposal to me, especially in his own house; and that if it was such, I desired he would not propose it, that I might not be obliged to offer any resentment to him that did not become the respect I professed for him, and the trust I had placed in him in coming to his house; and begged of him he would give me leave to go away, and accordingly began to put on my gloves and prepare to be gone, though, at the same time, I no more intended it than he intended to let me.

Well, he importuned me not to talk of going; he assured me he had no dishonourable thing in his thoughts about me, and was very far from offering anything to me that was dishonourable, and if I thought so, he would choose to say no more of it.

That part I did not relish at all. I told him I was ready to hear anything he had to say, depending that he would say nothing unworthy of himself, or unfit for me to hear. Upon this he told me his proposal was this,—that I would marry him, though he had not yet obtained the divorce from the whore his wife; and to satisfy me that he meant honourably, he would promise not to desire me to live with him, or go to bed to him, till the divorce was obtained. My heart said yes to this offer at first word, but it was necessary to play the hypocrite a little more with him, so I seemed to decline the motion with some warmth, and besides a little condemning the thing as unfair, told him, that such a proposal could be of no signification, but to entangle us both in great difficulties; for if he should not at last obtain the divorce, yet we could not dissolve the marriage, neither could we proceed in it; so that, if he was disappointed in the divorce, I left him to consider what a condition we should both be in.

In short, I carried on the argument against this so far, that I convinced him it was not a proposal that had any sense in it. Well, then, he went from it to another, and that was, that I would sign and seal a contract with him, conditioning to marry him as soon as the divorce was obtained, and to be void if he could not obtain it.

I told him such a thing was more rational than the other. But as this was the first time that ever I could imagine him weak enough to be in earnest in this affair, I did not choose to say yes at first asking, I would consider of it.

I played with this lover as an angler does with a trout. I found I had him fast on the hook, so I jested with his new proposal, and put him off. I told him he knew little of me, and bade him inquire about me; I let him also go home with me to my lodgings, though I would not ask him to go in, for I told him it was not decent.

In a word, I ventured to avoid signing a contract, and the reason why I did it was, because the lady that had invited me to go with her into Lancashire insisted so positively upon it, and promised me such great fortunes and fine things there, that I was tempted to go and try. "Perhaps," said I, "I may mend myself very much;" and then I made no scruple of quitting my honest citizen, who I was not so much in love with as not to leave him for a richer."

In a word, I avoided signing the contract; but told him I would go into the north, that he should know where to write to me on the business I had entrusted with him; that I would give him a sufficient pledge of my respect for him, for I would leave almost all I had in the world in his hands; and I would thus far give him my word, that as soon as he had sued out a divorce from his first wife, if he would send me an account of it, I would come up to London, and that then we would talk seriously of the matter.

It was a base design I went with, that I must confess, though I was invited thither with a design much worse than mine was, as the sequel will discover.

Well, I went with my friend, as I called her, into Lancashire. All the way we went she caressed me with the utmost appearance of a sincere, undissembled affection; treated me, except my coach hire, all the way; and her brother brought a gentleman's coach to Warrington to receive us, and we were carried from thence to Liverpool with as much ceremony as I could desire. We were also entertained at a merchant's house in Liverpool three or four days very handsomely. I forbear to tell his name, because of what followed. Then she told me she would carry me to an uncle's house of hers, where we should be nobly entertained. She did so; her uncle, as she called him, sent a coach and four horses for us, and we were carried near forty miles, I know not whither.

We came, however, to a gentleman's seat, where was a numerous family, a large park, extraordinary company indeed, and where she was called cousin. I told her if she had resolved to bring me into such company as this, she should have let me have prepared myself, and have furnished myself with better clothes. The ladies took notice of that, and told me very genteelly, they did not value people in their country so much by their clothes as they did in London; that their cousin had fully informed them of my quality, and that I did not want clothes to set me off. In short, they entertained me not like what I was, but like what they thought I had been, namely, a widow, a lady of a great fortune.

The first discovery I made here was, that the family were all Roman Catholics, and the cousin too. Nothing in the world could behave better to me, and I had all the civility shown me that I could have had if I had been of their opinion. The truth is, I had not so much principle of any kind as to be nice in point of religion, and I presently learned to speak favourably of the Romish Church; particularly, I told them I saw little but the prejudice of education in all the differences that were among Christians about religion, and if it had so happened that my father had been a Roman Catholic, I doubted not that I should have been as well pleased with their religion as my own.

This obliged them in the highest degree, and as I was besieged day and night with good company and pleasant discourse, so I had two or three old ladies that lay at me on the subject of religion too. I was so complaisant, that though I would not completely engage, yet I made no scruple to be present at their mass, and to conform to all their gestures as they showed me the pattern; but I would not come too cheap, so that I only in the main encouraged them to expect I would turn Roman Catholic if I was instructed in the Catholic doctrine, as they called it, and so the matter rested.

I stayed here about six weeks; and then my conductor led me back to a country village about six miles from Liverpool, where her brother, as she called him, came to visit me in his own chariot, and in a very good figure, with two footmen in a good livery, and the next thing was to make love to me. As it had happened to me, one would think I could not have been cheated, and, indeed, I thought so myself, having a safe card at home, which I resolved not to quit unless I could mend myself very much. However, in all appearance, this brother was a match worth listening to; and the least his estate was valued at was a thousand a year, but the sister said it was worth fifteen hundred a year, and lay most of it in Ireland.

I, that was a great fortune, and passed for such, was above being asked how much my estate was; and my false friend, taking it upon a foolish hearsay, had raised it from five hundred to five thousand, and by the time she came into the country she called it fifteen thousand. The Irishman, for such I understood him to be, was stark mad at this bait. In short, he courted me, made me presents, and run in debt like a madman for the expenses of his equipage and of his courtship. He had, to give him his due, the appearance of an extraordinary fine gentleman; he was tall, well-shaped, and had an extraordinary address; talked as naturally of his park and his stables, of his horses, his game-keepers, his woods, his tenants, and his servants, as if we had been in the mansion-house, and I had seen them all about me.

He never so much as asked me about my fortune or estate; but he assured me that when we came to Dublin he would jointure me in six hundred pounds a year in good land; and that he would enter into a deed of settlement, or contract here, for the performance of it.

This was such language, indeed, as I had not been used to, and I was here beaten out of all my measures. I had a she devil in my bosom, every hour telling me how great her brother lived. One time she would come for my orders, how I would have my coaches painted and how lined; and another time what clothes my page should wear. In short, my eyes were dazzled, I had now lost my power of saying no, and, to cut the story short, I consented to be married; but, to be the more private, we were carried farther into the country, and married by a Romish clergyman, which I was assured would marry us as effectually as a church of England parson.

I cannot say but I had some reflections in this affair, upon the dishonourable forsaking my faithful citizen; who loved me sincerely, and who was endeavouring to quit himself of a scandalous whore, by whom he had been indeed barbarously used, and promised himself infinite happiness in his new choice; which choice was now giving up herself to another in a manner almost as scandalous as hers could be.

But the glittering show of a great estate, and of fine things, which the deceived creature that was now my deceiver represented every hour to my imagination, hurried me away and gave me no time to think of London, or of anything there, much less of the obligation I had to a person of infinitely more real merit than what was now before me.

But the thing was done, I was now in the arms of my new spouse, who appeared still the same as before; great even to magnificence, and nothing less than 1000*l.* a year could support the ordinary equipage he appeared in.

After we had been married about a month he began to talk of my going to West Chester, in order to embark for Ireland. However, he did not hurry me, for we stayed near three weeks longer, and then he sent to Chester for a coach to meet us at the Black Rock, as they called it, over against Liverpool. Thither we went in a fine boat they call a pinnace, with six oars, his servants, and horses, and baggage going in the ferry-boat. He made his excuse to me, that he had no acquaintance at Chester, but he would go before and get some handsome apartment for me at a private house. I asked him how long we should stay at Chester? He said, not at all any longer than one night or two, but he would immediately hire a coach to go to Holyhead. Then I told him he should by no means give himself the trouble to get private lodgings for one night or two, for that Chester being a great place, I made no doubt but that there would be very good inns and accommodation enough; so we lodged at an inn in the West street, not far from the cathedral, I forget what sign it was at.

Here my spouse, talking of my going to Ireland, asked me if I had no affairs to settle at London before we went off. I told him no, not of any great consequence, but what might be done as well by letters from Dublin. "Madam," says he, very respectfully, "I suppose the greatest part of your estate, which my sister tells me is most of in money in the Bank of England, lies secure enough; but in case it be required transferring, or any way altering its property, it might be necessary to go up to London, and settle those things before we went over."

I seemed to look strange at it, and told him I knew not what he meant; that I had no effects in the Bank of England that I knew of, and I hoped he could not say that I had ever told him had.

"No," he said. "I had not told him so, but his sister had said the greatest part of my estate lay there. And I only mentioned it, my dear," said he, "that if there was any occasion to settle it, or order anything about it, we might not be obliged to the hazard and trouble of another voyage back again," for, he added, that he did not care to venture me too much upon the sea.

I was surprised at this talk, and began to consider very seriously what the meaning of it must be; and it presently occurred to me that my friend, who called him brother, had represented me in colours which were not my due; and I thought, since it was come to that pitch, that I would know the bottom of it before I went out of England, and before I should put myself into I knew not whose hands, in a strange country.

Upon this I called his sister into my chamber the next morning, and letting her know the discourse her brother and I had been upon the evening before, I conjured her to tell me what she had said to him, and upon what foot it was that she had made this marriage.

She owned that she had told him that I was a great fortune, and said that she was told so in London.

"Told so!" says I, warmly; "did I ever tell you so?"

"No," she said, "it was true I did not tell her so, but I had said several times that what I had was in my own disposal."

"I did so," returned I, very quickly and hastily, "but I never told you I had anything called a fortune, no, not that I had 100*l.* or the value of 100*l.* in the world; and how did it consist with my being a fortune," said I, "that should come here into the north of England with you, only upon the account of living cheap?"

At these words, which I spoke warm, and sighed, my husband, and her brother, as she called him, came into the room; and I desired him to come and sit down, for I had something of moment to say before them both, which it was absolutely necessary he should hear.

He looked a little disturbed at the assurance with which I seemed to speak it, and came and sat down by me, having first shut the door; upon which I began, for I was very much provoked, and turning myself to him,

"I am afraid," says I, "my dear," for I spoke with kindness on his side, "that you have a very great abuse put upon you, and an injury done you never to be repaired, in your marrying me, which, however, as I have had no hand in it, I desire I may be fairly acquitted of it; and that the blame may lie where it ought to lie and nowhere else, for I wash my hands of every part of it."

"What injury can be done me, my dear," says he, "in marrying you? I hope it is to my honour and advantage every way."

"I will soon explain it to you," says I, "and I fear you will have no reason to think yourself well used. But I will convince you, my dear," says I again, "that I have had no hand in it," and there I stopped awhile.

He looked now scared and wild, and began, I believe, to suspect what followed; however, looking towards me, and saying only, "Go on," he sat silent, as if to hear what I had more to say; so I went on.

"I asked you last night," said I, speaking to him, "if ever I made any boast to you of my estate, or ever told you I had any estate in the Bank of England, or anywhere else, and you owned I had not, as is most true; and I desire you will tell me here, before your sister, if ever I gave you any reason from me to think so, or that ever we had any discourse about it;" and he owned again I had not; but said, I had appeared always as a woman of fortune, and he depended on it that I was so, and hoped he was not deceived.

"I am not inquiring yet whether you have been deceived or not," said I; "I fear you have, and I too; but I am clearing myself from the unjust charge of being concerned in deceiving you. I have been now asking your sister if ever I told her of any fortune or estate I had, or gave her any particulars of it, and she owns I never did. And pray, madam," said I, turning myself to her, "be so just to me, before your brother, to charge me, if you can, if ever I pretended to you that I had an estate; why, if I had, should I come down into this country with you on purpose to spare that little I had, and live cheap?"

She could not deny one word, but said she had been told in London that I had a very great fortune, and that it lay in the Bank of England.

"And now, dear sir," said I, turning myself to my new spouse again, "be so just to me as to tell me who has abused both you and me so much as to make you believe I was a fortune, and prompt you to court me to this marriage?"

He could not speak a word, but pointed to her, and after some more pause flew out in the most furious passion that ever I saw a man in my life; cursing her and calling her all the whores and hard names he could think of; and that she had ruined him, declaring that she had told him I had fifteen thousand pounds, and that she was to have five hundred pounds of him for procuring this match for him. He then added, directing his speech to me, that she was no sister of his, but had been his whore for two years before; that she had had one hundred pounds of him in part of this bargain, and that he was utterly undone if things were as I said; and in his raving he swore he would let her heart's blood out immediately, which frightened her and me too.

She cried, said she had been told so in the house where I lodged; but this aggravated him more than before, that she should put so far upon him, and run things such a length upon no other authority than a hearsay; and then turning to me again, said very honestly, he was afraid we were both undone; "for to be plain, my dear, I have no estate," says he, "what little I had, this devil has made me run out in waiting on you, in putting me into this equipage." She took the opportunity of his being earnest in talking with me, and got out of the room, and I never saw her more.

I was confounded now as much as he, and knew not what to say; I thought many ways that I had the worst of it, but his saying he was undone, and that he had no estate neither, put me into a mere distraction.

"Why," says I to him, "this has been a hellish juggle, for we are married here upon a double fraud; you are undone by the disappointment, it seems, and if I had had a fortune I had been cheated too, for you say you have nothing."

"You would indeed have been cheated, my dear," says he, "but you would not have been undone, for fifteen thousand pounds would have maintained us handsomely in this country; and I assure you," added he, "I had resolved to have dedicated every groat of it to you; I would not have wronged you of a shilling, and the rest I would have made up in my affection to you, and tenderness of you, as long as I lived."

This was very honest indeed, and I really believe he spoke as he intended, and that he was a man that was as well qualified to make me happy, as to his temper and behaviour, as any man ever was; but his having no estate, and being run in debt on this ridiculous account in the country, made all the prospect dismal and dreadful, and I knew not what to say, or what to think of myself.

I told him it was very unhappy, that so much love, and so much good nature, as I discovered in him, should be thus precipitated into misery; that I saw nothing before us but ruin; for as to me, it was my unhappiness that what little I had was not able to relieve us for a week, and with that I pulled out a bank bill of twenty pounds, and eleven guineas, which I told him I had saved out of my little income; and that by the account that creature had given me of the way of living in that country, I expected it would maintain me three or four years; that if it was taken from me I should be left destitute, and he knew what the condition of a woman among strangers must be if she had no money in her pocket. However, I told him if he would take it, there it was.

He told me with a great concern, and I thought I saw tears stand in his eyes, that he would not touch it, that he abhorred the thoughts of stripping me and making me miserable; that on the contrary, he had fifty guineas left, which was all he had in the world, and he pulled it out and threw it down on the table, bidding me take it, though he were to starve for the want of it.

I returned, with the same concern for him, that I could not bear to hear him talk so; that on the contrary, if he could propose any probable method of living, I would do any thing that became me on my part, and that I would live as close and as narrow as he could desire.

He begged of me to talk no more at that rate, for it would make him distracted; he said he was bred a gentleman, though he was reduced to a low fortune; and that there was but one way left which he could think of, and that would not do unless I could answer him one question, which however, he said he would not press me to. I told him I would answer it honestly; whether it would be to his satisfaction or no, that I could not tell.

"Why then, my dear, tell me plainly," says he, "will the little you have keep us together in any figure, or in any station or place, or will it not?"

It was my happiness hitherto that I had not discovered myself, or my circumstances at all. No, not so much as my name; and seeing there was nothing to be expected from him, however good humoured, and however honest he seemed to be, but to live on what I knew would soon be wasted, I resolved to conceal every thing but the bank bill and the eleven guineas which I had owned; and I would have been very glad to have lost that, and have been set down where he took me up. I had, indeed, another bank bill about me of thirty pounds, which was the whole of what I brought with me, as well to subsist on in the country, as not knowing what might offer; because this creature, the go-between that had thus betrayed us both, had made me believe strange things of marrying to my advantage in the country, and I was not willing to be without money whatever might happen. This bill I concealed, and that made me freer of the rest, in consideration of his circumstances, for I really pitied him heartily.

But to return to his question; I told him I never willingly deceived him, and I never would. I was very sorry to tell him that the little I had would not subsist us; that it was not sufficient to subsist me alone in the south country; and that this was the reason that made me put myself into the hands of that woman who called him brother, she having assured me that I might board handsomely at a town called Manchester, where I had not yet been, for about six pounds a year; and my whole income not being above fifteen pounds a year, I thought I might live easy upon it, and wait for better things.

He shook his head and remained silent, and a very melancholy evening we had; however, we supped together and lay together that night, and when we had almost supped he looked a little better and more cheerful, and called for a bottle of wine.

"Come, my dear," says he, "though the case is bad, it is to no purpose to be dejected—come, be as easy as you can, I will endeavour to find out some way or other to live; if you can but subsist yourself, that is better than nothing, I must try the world again; a man ought to think like a man. To be discouraged, is to yield to the misfortune." With this, he filled his glass and drank to me, holding my hand and pressing it hard in his hand all the while the wine went down, and protesting afterwards his main concern was for me.

It was really a true gallant spirit he was of, and it was the more grievous to me. 'Tis something of relief even to be undone by a man of honour rather than by a scoundrel; but here the greatest disappointment was on his side, for he had really spent a great deal of money, and it was remarkable on what poor terms she proceeded. First, the baseness of the creature herself is to be observed, who, for the getting of a hundred pounds herself, could be content to let him spend three or four more, though perhaps it was all he had in the world, and more than all, when she had not the least ground, more than a little tea-table chat, to say that I had an estate, or was a fortune, or the like. It is true, the design of deluding a woman of fortune, if I had been so, was base enough. The putting the face of great things upon poor circumstances was a fraud, and bad enough, but the case a little differed too, and that in his favour, for he was not a rake that made a trade to delude women, and, as some have done, get six or seven fortunes, one after another, and then rifle and run away from them; but he was already a gentleman, unfortunate and low, but had lived well; and though if I had had a fortune, I should have been enraged at the slut for betraying me,—yet, really for the man, her fortune would not have been ill-bestowed upon him, for he was a lovely person indeed; of generous principles, good sense, and of abundance of good humour.

We had a great deal of close conversation that night, for we neither of us slept much; he was as penitent for having put all those cheats upon me as if it had been felony, and that he was going to execution. He offered me again every shilling of the money he had about him, and said, he would go into the army and seek the world for more.

I asked him why he would be so unkind to carry me into Ireland, when I might suppose he could not have subsisted me there? He took me in his arms, "my dear," said he, "depend upon it, I never designed to go to Ireland at all, much less to have carried you thither; but came hither to be out of the observation of the people, who had heard what I pretended to, and withal, that nobody may ask me for money before I was furnished to supply them."

"But where, then," said I, "were we to have gone next?"

"Why, my dear," said he, "I will confess the whole scheme to you as I had laid it; I purposed here to ask you something about your estate, as you see I did, and when you, as I expected you would, had entered into some account with me of the particulars, I would have made an excuse to you, to have put off our voyage to Ireland for some time, and to have gone first towards London. Then, my dear," said he, "I resolved to have confessed all the circumstances of my own affairs to you, and let you know I had indeed made use of these artifices to obtain your consent to marry me, but have now nothing to do but to ask your pardon, and to tell you how abundantly, as I have said above, I would endeavour to make you forget what was past by the felicity of the days to come."

"Truly," said I to him, "I find you would soon have conquered me; and it is my affliction now that I am not in a condition to let you see how easily I should have been reconciled to you, and have passed by all the tricks you had put upon me, in recompence of so much good humour. But my dear," said I, "what can we do now? We are both undone, and what better are we for our being reconciled together, seeing we have nothing to live on."

We proposed a great many things, but nothing could offer where there is nothing to begin with. He begged me, at last, to talk no more of it, for he said I would break his heart; so we talked of other things a little, till at last he took a husband's leave of me, and so we went to sleep.

He rises before me in the morning, and indeed having lain awake almost all night I was very sleepy, and lay till near eleven o'clock. In this time he took his horses and three servants, and all his linen and baggage, and away he went, leaving a short but moving letter for me on the table, as follows:

"My Dear,

"I AM a dog, I have abused you, but I have been drawn in to do it by a base creature, contrary to my principle, and the general practice of my life. Forgive me, my dear! I ask your pardon with the greatest sincerity; I am the most miserable of men in having deluded you. I have been so happy as to possess you, and am now so wretched as to be forced to fly from you. Forgive me, my dear; once more, I say, forgive me! I am not able to see you ruined by me, and myself unable to support you. Our marriage is nothing, I shall never be able to see you again; I here discharge you from it; if you can marry to your advantage, do not decline it on my account. I here swear to you on my faith, and on the word of a man of honour, I will never disturb your repose if I should know of it, which is not likely. On the other hand, if you should not marry, and if good fortune should befall me, it shall be all yours wherever you are.

"I have put some of the stock of money I have left into your pocket; take places for yourself and your maid in the stage-coach, and go for London; I hope it will bear your charges thither, without breaking into your own. Again I sincerely ask your pardon, and will do so as often as I shall ever think of you.

"Adieu, my dear, for ever.

"I am yours most affectionately,

"J. E."

Nothing that ever befel me in my life sunk so deep into my heart as this farewell. I reproached him a thousand times, in my thoughts, for leaving me; for I would have gone with him through the world, if I had begged my bread. I felt in my pocket, and there I found ten guineas, his gold watch, and two little rings, one a small diamond ring, worth only about six pounds, and the other a plain gold ring.

I sat me down and looked upon these things two hours together, and scarcely spoke a word till my maid interrupted me by telling me my dinner was ready. I eat but little, and after dinner I fell into a vehement fit of crying, every now and then calling him by his name, which was James.

"O Jemmy!" said I, "come back, come back; I will give you all I have; I will beg, I will give you all I have; I will beg, I will starve with you!" and thus I ran raving about the room several times, and then sat down between whiles, and then walking about again, called him to come back, and then cried again; and thus I passed the afternoon till about seven o'clock, when it was near dusk in the evening, being August, when to my unspeakable surprise he comes back into the inn, but without a servant, and comes directly into my chamber.

It was in the greatest confusion imaginable, and so was I too; I could not imagine what should be the occasion of it, and began to be at odds with myself whether to be glad or sorry; but my affection biassed all the rest, and it was impossible to conceal my joy, which was too great for smiles, for it burst out into tears. He was no sooner entered the room, but he run to me and took me in his arms, holding me fast and almost stopping my breath with his kisses, but spoke not a word; at length I began:

"My dear," said I, "how could you go away from me?" to which he gave no answer, for it was impossible for him to speak.

When our extasies were a little over, he told me he was gone about fifteen miles, but it was not in his power to go any farther without coming back to see me again, and to take his leave of me once more.

I told him how I had passed my time, and how loud I had called him to come back again. He told me he heard me very plain upon Delamere Forest, at a place about twelve miles off. I smiled.

"Nay," says he, "do not think I am in jest; for if ever I heard your voice in my life, I heard you call me aloud, and sometimes I thought I saw you running after me."

"Why," said I, "what did I say?" for I had not named the words to him.

"You called aloud," says he, and said, "O Jemmy! O Jemmy! come back."

I laughed at him. "My dear," says he, "do not laugh, for depend upon it, I heard your voice as plain as you hear mine now; if you please,

I will go before a magistrate and make oath of it."

I then began to be amazed and surprised, and indeed frightened, and told him what I had really done, and how I had called after him as above.

When we had amused ourselves awhile about this, I said to him:

"Well, you shall go away from me no more; I'll go all over the world with you rather."

He told me it would be a very difficult thing for him to leave me, but since it must be, he hoped I would make it as easy to me as I could; but as for him, it would be his destruction; that he foresaw.

However, he told me that he considered he had left me to travel to London alone, which was too long a journey; and that as he might as well go that way as any way else, he was resolved to see me safe thither, or near it; and if he did go away then without taking his leave, I should not take it ill of him, and this he made me promise.

He told me how he had dismissed his three servants, sold their horses, and sent the fellows away to seek their fortunes, and all in a little time, at a town on the road, I know not where; and says he, "It cost me some tears, all alone by myself, to think how much happier they were than their master, for they could go to the next gentleman's house to seek for a service; whereas," said he, "I knew not whither to go, or what to do with myself."

I told him I was so completely miserable in parting with him, that I could not be worse; and that now he was come again I would not go from him, if he would take me with him, let him go whither he would, or do what he would; and in the meantime I agreed that we would go together to London; but I could not be brought to consent he should go away at last, and not take his leave of me, as he proposed to do; but told him, jesting, that if he did, I would call him back again as loud as I did before. Then I pulled out his watch and gave him back, and his two rings, and his ten guineas; but he would not take them, which made me very much suspect that he resolved to go off upon the road, and leave me.

The truth is, the circumstances he was in, the passionate expressions of his letter, the kind, gentlemanly treatment I had from him in all the affair, with the concern he showed for me in it, his manner of parting with that large share which he gave me of his little stock left; all these had joined to make such impressions on me, that I really loved him most tenderly, and I could not bear the thoughts of parting with him.

Two days after this we quitted Chester, I in the stage-coach, and he on horseback; I dismissed my maid at Chester. He was very much against my being without a maid, but she being a servant hired in the country, and I resolving to keep no servant at London, I told him it would have been barbarous to have taken the poor wench, and have turned her away as soon as I came to town; and it would also have been a needless charge on the road; so I satisfied him, and he was easy enough on that score.

He came with me as far as Dunstable, within thirty miles of London, and then he told me fate and his own misfortunes obliged him to leave me, and that it was not convenient for him to go to London, for reasons which it was of no value to me to know, and I saw him preparing to go. The stage-coach we were in did not usually stop at Dunstable, but I desiring it but for a quarter of an hour, they were content to stand at an inn-door awhile, and we went into the house.

Being in the inn, I told him I had but one favour more to ask of him, and that was, that since he could not go any further, he would give me leave to stay a week or two in the town with him, that we might in that time think of something to prevent such a ruinous thing to us both as a final separation would be, and that I had something of moment to offer to him, which perhaps he might find practicable and to our advantage.

This was too reasonable a proposal to be denied, so he called the landlady of the house and told her his wife was taken ill, that she should not think of going any further in the stage coach, which had tired her almost to death, and asked if she could not get us a lodging for two or three days at a private house, where I might rest me a little, for the journey had been too much for me. The landlady, a good sort of a woman, well bred, and very obliging, came immediately to see me, told me she had two or three very good rooms in a part of the house quite retired; and if I saw them, she did not doubt but I would like them; and I should have one of her maids that should do nothing else but be appointed to wait on me. This was so very kind, that I could not but accept of it, and thank her; so I went to look at the rooms and liked them very well, and indeed they were extraordinarily furnished, and very pleasant lodgings; so we paid the stage coach, took out our baggage, and resolved to stay here awhile.

Here I told him I would live with him now till all my money was spent, but would not let him spend a shilling of his own. We had some kind squabble about that, but I told him it was the last time I was like to enjoy his company, and I desired he would let me be master in that thing only, and he should govern in everything thing else, so he acquiesced.

Here one evening, taking a walk into the fields, I told him I would now make the proposal to him I had told him of. Accordingly, I related to him how I had lived in Virginia; that I had a mother I believed was alive there still, though my husband were dead some years. I told him that had not my effects miscarried, which by the way I magnified pretty much, I might have been fortune good enough to him to have kept us from being parted in this manner. Then I entered into the manner of people's going over to those countries to settle; how they had a quantity of land given them by the Constitution of the place,—and if not, that it might be purchased at so easy a rate that it was not worth naming.

I then gave him a full and distinct account of the nature of planting; how, with carrying over but two or three hundred pounds' value in English goods, with some servants and tools, a man of application would presently lay a foundation for a family, and in a few years would raise an estate.

I let him into the nature of the product of the earth, how the ground was cured and prepared, and what the usual increase of it was, and demonstrated to him that, in a very few years, with such a beginning, we should be as certain of being rich as we were now certain of being poor.

He was surprised at my discourse, for we made it the whole subject of our conversation for near a week together, in which time I laid it down in black and white, as we say, that it was morally impossible, with the supposition of any reasonably good conduct, but that we must thrive there and do very well.

Then I told him what measures I would take to raise such a sum as 300*l.* or thereabouts, and I argued with him how good a method it would be, to put an end to our misfortunes, and restore our circumstances in the world to what we had both expected; and, I added, that after seven years, we might be in a posture to leave our plantation in good hands, and come over again and receive the income of it, and live here and enjoy it, and I gave him examples of some that had done so, and lived now in very good figure in London.

In short, I pressed him so to it that he almost agreed to it; but still something or other drove it off again, till at last he turned the tables, and he began to talk almost to the same purpose of Ireland.

He told me that a man that could confine himself to a country life, and that could but find stock to enter upon any land, should have farms there for 50*l.* a-year, as good as were here let for 200*l.* a-year. That the produce was such, and so rich the land, that if much was not laid up, we were now to live as handsomely upon it as gentlemen of 300*l.* a year could do in England, and that he had laid a scheme to leave me in London and go over and try, and if he found he could lay a handsome foundation for living suitable to the respect he had for me, as he doubted not he should do, he would then come over and fetch me.

I was dreadfully afraid that upon such a proposal he would have taken me at my word, viz. to turn my little income into money, and let him carry it over to Ireland, and try his experiment with it; but he was too just to desire it, or to have accepted it if I had offered it, and he anticipated me in that, for he added, that he would go and try his fortune that way, and if he found he could do anything at it to live, then by adding mine to it when I went over, we should live like ourselves, but that he would not hazard a shilling of mine till he had made the experiment with a little; and he assured me, that if he found nothing to be done in Ireland, he would then come to me and join in my project of Virginia.

He was so earnest upon his project being to be tried first, that I did not withstand him. However, he promised to let me hear from him in a little time after his arriving there, to let me know whether his project answered his design; that if there was not a probability of success, I might take the occasion to prepare for another voyage, and then he assured me he would go with me to America with all his heart.

I could bring him to nothing further than this; and which entertained us for near a month, during which I enjoyed his company, which was the most entertaining that I ever met with in my life before. In this time he let me into part of the story of his own life, which was indeed surprising and full of an infinite variety, sufficient to fill up a much brighter story for its adventures and incidents than any I ever saw in print; but I shall have occasion to say more of him hereafter.

We parted at last, though with the utmost reluctance on my side; and indeed he took his leave very unwillingly too, but necessity obliged him, for his reasons were very good why he would not come to London, as I understood more fully some time afterwards.

I gave him a direction how to write to me, though still I reserved the grand secret, and never broke my resolution, which was not to let him ever know my true name, who I was, or where to be found. He likewise let me know how to write a letter to him, so that he said he would be sure to receive it.

I came to London the next day, but did not go directly to my old lodgings, but for another nameless reason took a private lodging in St John's-street—or, as it is vulgarly called, St Jones's, Clerkenwell; and here, being perfectly alone, I had leisure to sit down and reflect seriously upon the last seven months, ramble I had made, for I had been abroad no less. The pleasant hours I had with my last husband I looked back on with an infinite deal of pleasure, but that pleasure was very much lessened when I found some time after that I was really with child.

This was a perplexing thing, because of the difficulty which was before me, where I should get to lie in; it being one of the nicest things in the world, at that time of day, for a woman that was a stranger and had no friends to be entertained in that circumstance without security, which by the way I had not, neither could I procure any.

I had taken care all this while to preserve a correspondence with my honest friend at the Bank, or rather he took care to correspond with me, for he wrote to me once a week; and though I had not spent my money so fast as to want any from him, yet I often wrote also to let him know I was alive. I had left directions in Lancashire, so that I had these letters which he sent conveyed to me; and during my recess at St Jones's I received a very obliging letter from him, assuring me that his process for a divorce from his wife went on with success, though he met with some difficulties in it that he did not expect.

I was not displeased with the news that his process was more tedious than he expected; for though I was in no condition to have had him yet, not being so foolish as to marry him when I knew myself to be with child by another man, as some I know have ventured to do; yet I was not willing to lose him, and in a word resolved to have him if he continued in the same mind as soon as I was up again, for I saw apparently I should hear no more from my other husband; and as he had all along pressed me to marry, and had assured me he would not be at all disgusted at it, or ever offer to claim me again; so I made no scruple to resolve to do it if I could, and if my other friend stood to his bargain; and I had a great deal of reason to be assured that he would stand to it by the letters he wrote to me, which were the kindest and most obliging that could be.

I now grew big, and the people where I lodged perceived it, and began to take notice of it to me, and, as far as civility would allow, intimated that I must think of removing. This put me to extreme perplexity, and I grew very melancholy, for indeed I knew not what course to take; I had money, but no friends, and was like now to have a child upon my hands to keep, which was a difficulty I never had upon me yet, as the particulars of my story hitherto make appear.

In the course of this affair I fell very ill, and my melancholy really increased my distemper. My illness proved at length to be only an ague, but my apprehensions were really that I should miscarry; I should not say apprehensions, for indeed I would have been glad to miscarry, but I could never be brought to entertain so much as a thought of endeavouring to miscarry, or of taking anything to make me miscarry; I abhorred, I say, so much as the thought of it.

However, speaking of it in the house, the gentlewoman who kept the house proposed to me to send for a midwife; I scrupled at first, but after some time consented to it, but told her I had no particular acquaintance with any midwife, and so left it to her.

It seems the mistress of the house was not so great a stranger to such cases as mine was, as I thought at first she had been, as will appear presently, and she sent for a midwife of the right sort, that is to say, the right sort for me.

The woman appeared to be an experienced woman in her business, I mean as a midwife, but she had another calling too, in which she was as expert as most women, if not more. My landlady had told her I was very melancholy, and that she believed that had done me harm; and once, before me, said to her, "Mrs. B——," meaning the midwife, "I believe this lady's trouble is of a kind that is pretty much in your way; and therefore, if you can do anything more for her, pray do, for she is a very civil gentlewoman;" and so she went out of the room.

I really did not understand her, but my Mother Midnight began very seriously to explain what she meant as soon as she was gone: "Madam," says she, "you seem not to understand what your landlady means, and when you do understand it, you need not let her know at all that you do so. She means that you are under some circumstances that may render your lying-in difficult to you, and that you are not willing to be exposed; I need say no more, but tell you, that if you think fit to communicate so much of your case to me, if it be so, as is necessary, for I do not desire to pry into those things, I perhaps may be in a condition to assist you, and to make you perfectly easy, and remove all your dull thoughts upon that subject."

Every word this creature said was a cordial to me, and put new life and new spirit into my very heart; my blood began to circulate immediately, and I was quite another body; I eat my victuals again, and grew better presently after it. She said a great deal more to the same purpose, and then having pressed me to be free with her, and promised in the solemnest manner to be secret, she stopped a little, as if waiting to see what impression it made on me, and what I would say.

I was too sensible of the want I was in of such a woman, not to accept her offer; I told her my case was partly as she guessed, and partly not, for I was really married, and had a husband, though he was in such circumstances, and so remote at that time, as he could not appear publicly.

She took me short, and told me that was none of her business, all the ladies that came under her care were married women to her. "Every woman," says she, "that is with child has a father for it, and whether that father was a husband or no husband, was no business of hers; her business was to assist me in my present circumstances, whether I had a husband or no; for, madam," says she, "to have a husband that cannot appear, is to have no husband in the sense of the case, and therefore whether you are a wife or a mistress is all one to me."

I found presently, that whether I was a whore or a wife, I was to pass for a whore here, so I let that go; I told her it was true as she said, but that, however, if I must tell her my case, I must tell it her as it was. So I related it to her as short as I could, and I concluded it to her thus: "I trouble you with all this, madam", said I, "not that, as you said before, it is much to the purpose in your affair, but this is to the purpose, namely, that I am not in any pain about being seen, or being public or concealed, for it is perfectly indifferent to me; but my difficulty is, that I have no acquaintance in this part of the nation."

"I understand you, madam," says she, "you have no security to bring, to prevent the parish impertinences usual in such cases; and perhaps," says she, "do not know very well how to dispose of the child when it comes."

"The last," says I, "is not so much my concern as the first."

"Well, madam," answers the midwife, "dare you put yourself into my hands? I live in such a place; though I do not inquire after you, you may inquire after me. My name is B—; I live in such a street," naming the street, "at the sign of the Cradle; my profession is a midwife, and I have many ladies that come to my house to lie-in. I have given security to the parish in general terms, to secure them from any charge from whatsoever shall come into the world under my roof. I have but one question to ask in the whole affair, madam," says she, "and if that be answered, you shall be entirely easy for all the rest."

I presently understood what she meant, and told her, "Madam, I believe I understand you; I thank God, though I want friends in this part of the world, I do not want money, so far as may be necessary, though I do not abound in that either." This I added, because I would not make her expect great things.

"Well, madam," says she, "that is the thing indeed without which nothing can be done in these cases; and yet," says she "you shall see that I will not impose upon you, or offer anything that is unkind to you, and if you desire it, you shall know everything before hand, that you may suit yourself to the occasion, and be either costly or sparing, as you see fit."

"I told her, she seemed to be so perfectly sensible of my condition, that I had nothing to ask of her but this, that as I had told her that I had money sufficient, but not a great quantity, she should order it so that I might be as little superfluous of charge as possible."

She replied that she would bring in an account of the expenses of it in two or three shapes, and like a bill of fare, I should choose as I pleased, and I desired her to do so.

The next day she brought it and the copy of her three bills, which were as follows:

	£.	s.	d.
1. For three months, lodging in her house, including my diet, at 10s. per week.	6	0	0
2. For a nurse for the month, and using child-bed linen.	1	10	0
3. For a minister to christen the child, and to the godfathers and clerk.	1	10	0
4. For a supper at the christening, if I had five friends at it. . . .	1	0	0
5. For her fees as a midwife, and the taking the trouble off the parish.	3	3	0
6. For the maid-servant attending.	0	10	0
Total.	13	13	0

This was the first bill; the second was on the same terms:

1. For three months, lodging and diet, &c., at 20s. per week . . .	13	0	0
2. For a nurse for the month, and the use of linen and lace. . . .	2	10	0
3. For the minister to christen the child as above.	2	10	0
4. For a supper and for sweetmeats . . .	3	3	0
5. For her fees as above.	5	5	0
6. For a servant maid.	1	0	0
Total.	27	8	0

This was the second rate bill; the third, she said, was for a degree higher, and when the father or friends appeared.

1. For three months, lodging and diet, having two rooms and a garret for the servant.	30	0	0
2. For a nurse for the month, and the finest suit of child-bed linen.	4	4	0
3. For the minister to christen the child, &c.	2	10	0
4. For a supper, the gentlemen to send in the wine.	6	0	0
5. For my fees.	10	10	0
6. The maid, besides their own maid, only.	0	10	0
Total.	53	14	0

I looked upon all the three bills and smiled, and told her I did not see but that she was very reasonable in her demands, all things considered, and that I did not doubt but her accommodations were good.

She told me I should be judge of that when I saw them.

I told her, I was sorry to tell her that I feared I must be her lowest-rated customer, "and perhaps madam," said I, "you will make me the less welcome upon that account."

"Not at all," said she, "for where I have one of the third sort, I have two of the second, and four to one of the first, and get as much by them in proportion, as by any; but if you doubt my care of you, I will allow any friend you have to overlook, and see if you are well waited on or no."

Then she explained the particulars of her bills. "In the first place, madam," said she, "I would have you observe, that there is three months keeping you at just 10s. a week. I undertake to say you will not complain of my table. I suppose," says she, "you do not live cheaper where you are now."

"No, indeed," said I, "for I give 6s. a week for my chamber, and I find my own diet, which costs me a great deal more."

"Then, madam," says she, "if the child should not live, or should be dead-born, as you know sometimes happens, then there is the minister's article saved, and if you have no friends to come to you, you may save the expense of a supper: so that, take these articles out, madam," says she, "your lying in will not cost you more than 5*l.* 3s. in all, more than your ordinary charge of living."

This was the most reasonable thing that ever I heard of, so I smiled, and told her I would come, and be her customer; but I told her also, that as I had two months and more to go, I might perhaps be obliged to stay longer with her than three months, and desired to know if she would not be obliged to remove me before it was proper.

"No," she said, "because her house was large; and, besides, she never put anybody to remove, that had lain in, till they were willing to go; and if she had more ladies offered, she was not so ill beloved among her neighbours, but she could provide accommodation for twenty, if there was occasion."

I found she was an eminent lady in her way, and, in short, I agreed to put myself into her hands, and promised her. She then talked of other things, looked about in my accommodations, and found fault with my wanting attendance and conveniences, and that I should not be used so at her house.

I told her I was shy of speaking, for the woman of the house looked stranger, or at least I thought so, since I had been ill, because I was with child; and I was afraid she would put some affront or other upon me, supposing that I had been able to give but a slight account of myself.

"O dear," said she, "her ladyship is no stranger to these things; she has tried to entertain ladies in your condition several times, but could not secure the parish; and besides, she is not such a nice lady as you take her to be; however, since you are agoing, you shall not meddle with her, but I'll see you are a little better looked after while you are here than I think you are, and it shall not cost you the more neither."

I did not understand her at all; however, I thanked her, and so we parted: the next morning she sent me a chicken roasted and hot, and a pint bottle of sherry, and ordered the maid to tell me that she was to wait on me every day as long as I stayed there.

This was surprisingly good and kind, and I accepted it very willingly. At night she sent home again to know if I wanted anything, and to order the maid to come to me in the morning for dinner. The maid had orders to make me some chocolate in the morning before she came away, and at noon she brought me the sweetbread of a breast of veal whole, and a dish of soup, for my dinner; and after this manner she nursed me up at a distance, so that I was mightily well pleased and quickly well; for, indeed, my dejections before were a principal part of my illness.

I expected, as is usually the case among rich people, that the servant she sent me would have been some impudent brazen wench of Drury lane breeding, and I was very uneasy upon that account, so I would not let her lie in the house the first night, but had my eyes about me, as if she had been a public thief.

My gentlewoman guessed presently what was the matter, and sent her back with a short note, that I might depend on the honesty of her maid, that she would be answerable for her upon all accounts, and that she took no servants without good security. I was then perfectly easy, and indeed the maid's behaviour spoke for itself, for a modester, soberer, quieter girl, never came into anybody's family, and I found her so afterwards.

As soon as I was well enough to go abroad, I went with the maid to see the house, and to see the apartment I was to have; and everything was so handsome and so clean, that, in short, I had nothing to say, but was wonderfully pleased, and satisfied with what I had met with, which, considering the melancholy circumstances I was in, was far beyond what I looked for.

It might be expected that I should give some account of the nature of the wicked practice of this woman, in whose hands I was now fallen; but it would be but too much encouragement to the vice to let the world see what easy measures were here taken to rid the women's unwelcome burthen of a child clandestinely gotten. This grave matron had several sorts of practice, and this was one in particular, that if a child was born, though not in her house, for she had occasion to be called to many private labours, she had people at hand, who for a piece of money would take the child off their hands, and off from the hands of the parish too; and those children, as she said, were honestly provided for, and taken care of. What should become of them all, considering so many as by her account she was concerned with, I cannot conceive.

I had many times discourses upon that subject with her; but she was full of this argument, that she saved the life of many an innocent lamb, as she called them, which would otherwise perhaps have been murdered; and of many a woman, who, made desperate by the misfortune, would otherwise be tempted to destroy their children, and bring themselves to the gallows. I granted her that this was true, and a very commendable thing, provided the poor children fell into good hands afterwards, and were not abused, starved and neglected by the nurses that bred them up;

she answered, that she always took care of that, and had no nurses in her business but what were very good honest people, and such as might be depended upon.

I could say nothing to the contrary, and so was obliged to say, "Madam, I do not question you do your part honestly, but what those people do afterwards is the main question;" and she stopped my mouth again with saying, that she took the utmost care about it.

The only thing I found in all her conversation on these subjects, that gave me any distaste, was, that one time in discoursing about my being so far gone with child, and the time I expected to come, she said something that looked as if she could help me off with my burthen sooner, if I was willing; or, in English, that she could give me something to make me miscarry, if I had a desire to put an end to my troubles that way; but I soon let her see that I abhorred the thoughts of it; and to do her justice, she put it off so cleverly, that I could not say she really intended it, or whether she only mentioned the practice as a horrible thing; for she couched her words so well and took my meaning so quickly, that she gave her negative before I could explain myself.

To bring this part into as narrow a compass as possible, I quitted my lodging at St Jones's and went to my new governess, for so they called her in the house, and there I was indeed treated with so much courtesy, so carefully looked to, so handsomely provided, and every thing so well, that I was surprised at it, and could not at first see what advantage my governess made of it; but I found afterwards that she professed to make no profit of the lodgers' diet, nor indeed could she get much by it, but that her profit lay in the other articles of her management, and she made enough that way I assure you; for it is scarce credible what practice she had, as well abroad as at home, and yet all upon the private account, or, in plain English, the whoring account.

While I was in her house, which was near four months, she had no less than twelve ladies of pleasure brought to bed within doors, and I think she had two and thirty, or thereabouts, under her conduct without doors, whereof one, as nice as she was with me, was lodged with my old landlady at St Jones's.

This was a strange testimony of the growing vice of the age, and such an one that, as bad as I had been myself, it shocked my very senses; I began to nauseate the place I was in, and above all the wicked practice, and yet I must say that I never saw, or do I believe there was to be seen, the least indecency in the house the whole time I was there.

Not a man was ever seen to come up stairs except to visit the lying-in ladies within their month, nor then without the old lady with them, who made it a piece of the honour of her management that no man should touch a woman, no, not his own wife, within the month; nor would she permit any man to lie in her house upon any pretence whatever, no, not though she was sure it was with his own wife; and her general saying for it was, that she cared not how many children were born in her house but she would have none got there if she could help it.

It might, perhaps, be carried farther than was needful, but it was an error of the right hand if it was an error, for by this she kept up the reputation, such as it was, of her business, and obtained this character, that though she did take care of the women when they were debauched, yet she was not instrumental to their being debauched at all, and yet it was a wicked trade she drove too.

While I was here, and before I was brought to bed, I received a letter from my trustee at the bank full of kind obliging things, and earnestly pressing me to return to London. It was near a fortnight old when it came to me, because it had been first sent into Lancashire, and then returned to me. He concluded with telling me that he had obtained a decree, I think he called it, against his wife, and that he would be ready to make good his engagement to me if I would accept of him, adding a great many protestations of kindness and affection, such as he would have been far from offering if he had known the circumstances I had been in, and which, as it was, I had been very far from deserving.

I returned an answer to this letter, and dated it at Liverpool, but sent it by a messenger, alleging that it came in a cover to a friend in town. I gave him joy of his deliverance, but raised some scruples at the lawfulness of his marrying again, and told him I supposed he would consider very seriously upon that point before he resolved on it, the consequence being too great for a man of his judgment to venture rashly upon a thing of that nature; so concluded wishing him very well in whatever he resolved, without letting him into anything of my own mind, or giving any answer to his proposal of my coming to London to him, but mentioned at a distance my intention to return at the latter end of the year, this being dated in April.

I was brought to bed about the middle of May, and had another brave boy, and myself in as good condition as usual on such occasions. My governess did her part as a midwife with the greatest art and dexterity imaginable, and far beyond all that ever I had had any experience of before.

Her care of me in my travail, and after in my lying-in, was such that if she had been my own mother it could not have been better. Let none be encouraged in their loose practices from this dexterous lady's management, for she is gone to her place, and I dare say has left nothing behind her that can or will come up to it.

I think I had been brought to bed about twenty-two days when I received another letter from my friend at the bank, with the surprising news that he had obtained a final sentence of divorce against his wife, and had served her with it on such a day, and that he had such an answer to give to all my scruples about his marrying again as I could not expect, and as he had no desire of, for that his wife, who had been under some remorse before for her usage of him, as soon as she had the account that he had gained his point, had very unhappily destroyed herself that same evening.

He expressed himself very handsomely as to his being concerned at her disaster, but cleared himself of having any hand in it, and that he had only done himself justice in a case in which he was notoriously injured and abused. However, he said that he was extremely afflicted at it and had no view of any satisfaction left in this world but only in the hope that I would come and relieve him by my company; and then he pressed me violently, indeed, to give him some hopes that I would at least come up to town and let him see me, when he would farther enter into discourse about it.

I was exceedingly surprised at the news, and began now seriously to reflect on my present circumstances, and the inexpressible misfortune it was to me to have a child upon my hands, and what to do in it I knew not. At last I opened my case at a distance to my governess; I appeared melancholy and uneasy for several days, and she lay at me continually to know what troubled me. I could not for my life tell her that I had an offer of marriage after I had so often told her that I had a husband, so that I really knew not what to say to her. I owned I had something which very much troubled me, but at the same time told her I could not speak of it to any one alive.

She continued importuning me several days, but it was impossible, I told her, for me to commit the secret to anybody. This, instead of being an answer to her, increased her importunities; she urged her having been trusted with the greatest secrets of this nature; that it was her business to conceal everything, and that to discover things of that nature would be her ruin; she asked me if I had ever found her tatling of other people's affairs, and how could I suspect her? She told me to unfold myself to her was telling it to nobody; that she was silent as death; that it must be a very strange case indeed that she could not help me out of it; but to conceal it was to deprive myself of all possible help, or means of help, and to deprive her of the opportunity of serving me. In short, she had such a bewitching eloquence and so great a power of persuasion, that there was no concealing anything from her.

So I resolved to unbosom myself to her. I told her the history of my Lancashire marriage, and how both of us had been disappointed,—how we came together and how we parted,—how he absolutely discharged me, as far as lay in him, and gave me liberty to marry again, protesting that if he knew it he would never claim me or disturb or expose me; that I thought I was free, but was dreadfully afraid to venture, for fear of the consequences that might follow in case of a discovery.

Then I told her what a good offer I had; showed her my friend's two last letters inviting me to come to London, and let her see with what affection and earnestness they were written, but blotted out the name, and also the story about the disaster of his wife, only that she was dead.

She fell a-laughing at my scruples about marrying, and told me the other was no marriage, but a cheat on both sides; and that as we were parted by mutual consent, the nature of the contract was destroyed, and the obligation was mutually discharged. She had arguments for this at the tip of her tongue, and, in short, reasoned me out of my reason, not but that it was too by the help of my own inclination.

But then came the great and main difficulty, and that was the child. This she told me in so many words must be removed, and that so as that it should never be possible for any one to discover it. I knew there was no marrying without entirely concealing that I had had a child, for he would soon have discovered by the age of it that it was born, nay and gotten too, since my parley with him, and that would have destroyed all the affair.

But it touched my heart so forcibly to think of parting entirely with the child, and, for aught I knew, of having it murdered, or starved by neglect and ill-usage (which was much the same), that I could not think of it without horror. I wish all those women who consent to the disposing of their children out of the way, as it is called for decency's sake, would consider that it is only a contrived method for murder; that is to say, a killing their children with safety.

It is manifest to all that understand anything of children, that we are born into the world helpless and incapable either to supply our wants, or so much as to make them known, and that without help we must perish; and this help requires not only an assisting hand, whether of the mother or somebody else; but there are two things necessary in the assisting hand, that is care and skill, without both which half the children that are born would die, nay, though they were not to be denied food; and one half more of those that remained would be cripples or fools, lose their limbs, and perhaps their sense. I question not but that these are partly the reasons why affection was placed by nature in the hearts of mothers to their children, without which they never would be able to give themselves up, as it is necessary they should, to the care and waking pains needful to the support of their children.

Since this care is needful to the life of children, to neglect them is to murder them; again, to give them up to be managed by those people who have none of that needful affection placed by nature in them, is to neglect them in the highest degree; nay, in some it goes farther, and is a neglect in order to their being lost; so that it is even an intentional murder, whether the child lives or dies.

All those things represented themselves to my view, and that in the blackest and most frightful form; and as I was very free with my governess, whom I had now learned to call mother, I represented to her all the dark thoughts which I had upon me about it, and told her what distress I was in. She seemed graver by much at this part than at the other; but as she was hardened in these things beyond all possibility of being touched with the religious part, and the scruples about the murder, so she was equally impenetrable in that part which related to the affection.

She asked me if she had not been careful and tender of me in my lying-in, as if I had been her own child? I told her I owned she had.

"Well, my dear," says she, "and when you are gone, what are you to me? and what would it be to me if you were to be hanged? Do you think there are not women who, as it is their trade, and they get their bread by it, value themselves upon their being as careful of children as their own mothers can be, and understand it rather better? Yes, yes, child," says she, "fear it not. How were we nursed ourselves? Are you sure you was nursed up by your own mother? and yet you look fat and fair, child," says the old beldam, and with that she stroked me over the face. "Never be concerned, child," says she, going on in her drolling way; "I have no murderers about me; I employ the best and the honestest nurses that can be had, and have as few children miscarry under their hands as there would if they were all nursed by mothers; we want neither care nor skill."

She touched me to the quick when she asked me if I was sure that I was nursed by my own mother; on the contrary, I was sure I was not, and I trembled and looked pale at the very expression.

"Sure," said I to myself, "this creature cannot be a witch, or have any conversation with a spirit that can inform her what was done with me before I was able to know it myself;" and I looked at her as if I had been frightened; but reflecting that it could not be possible for her to know anything about me, that disorder went off, and I began to be easy, but it was not presently.

She perceived the disorder I was in, but she did not know the meaning of it; so she ran on in her wild talk upon the weakness of my supposing that children were murdered because they were not all nursed by the mothers, and to persuade me that the children she disposed of were as well used as if the mothers had the nursing of them themselves.

"It may be true, mother," says I, "for aught I know, but my doubts are very strongly grounded indeed."

"Come, then," says she, "let's hear some of them."

"Why first," says I, "you give a piece of money to these people to take the child off the parent's hands, and to take care of it as long as it lives; now we know, mother," said I, "that those are poor people, and their gain consists in being quit of the charge as soon as they can. How can I doubt but that, as it is best for them to have the child die, they are not over solicitous about its life?"

"This is all vapours and fancy," says the old woman; "I tell you their credit depends upon the child's life, and they are as careful as any mother of you all."

"O mother," says I, "if I was but sure my little baby would be carefully looked to and have justice done it, I should be happy indeed: but it is impossible I can be satisfied in that point unless I saw it, and to see it would be ruin and destruction to me, as now my case stands; so what to do I know not."

"A fine story!" says the governess; "you would see the child, and you would not see the child; you would be concealed and discovered both together; these are things impossible, my dear; so you must do as other conscientious mothers have done before you, and be contented with things as they must be, though they are not as you wish them to be."

I understood what she meant by conscientious mothers, she would have said conscientious whores; but she was not willing to disoblige me, for really in this case I was not a whore, because legally married, the force of my former marriage excepted.

However, let me be what I would, I was not come up to that pitch of hardness common to the profession, I mean to be unnatural, and regardless of the safety of my child; and I preserved this honest affection so long that I was upon the point of giving up my friend at the Bank, who lay so hard at me to come to him and marry him, that, in short, there was hardly any room to deny him.

At last my old governess came to me with her usual assurance. "Come, my dear," says she, "I have found out a way how you shall be at a certainty that your child shall be used well, and yet the people that take care of it shall never know you, or who the mother of the child is."

"O mother," says I, "if you can do so, you will engage me to you for ever."

"Well," says she, "are you willing to be at some small annual expense, more than what we usually give to the people we contract with?"

"Aye," says I, "with all my heart, provided I may be concealed."

"As to that," says the governess, "you shall be secure; for the nurse shall never so much as dare to inquire about you, and you shall once or twice a year go with me and see your child, and see how it is used, and be satisfied that it is in good hands, and nobody knowing who you are."

"Why," said I, "do you think that when I come to see my child I shall be able to conceal my being the mother of it? Do you think that possible?"

"Well, well," says my governess, "if you discover it the nurse shall be never the wiser, for she shall be forbid to ask any questions about you, or to take any notice; if she offers it she shall lose the money which you are to be supposed to give her, and the child be taken from her too."

I was very well pleased with this: so the next week a country woman was brought from Hertford, or thereabouts, who was to take the child off our hands entirely for ten pounds in money; but if I would allow five pounds a year more to her, she would be obliged to bring the child to my governess's house as often as we desired, or we should come down and look at it, and see how well she used it.

The woman was a very wholesome looking, likely woman, a cottager's wife; but she had very good clothes and linen, and everything well about her, and with a heavy heart and many a tear I let her have my child.

I had been down at Hertford, and looked at her and at her dwelling, which I liked well enough, and I promised her great things if she would be kind to the child. So she knew at first word that I was the child's mother; but she seemed to be so much out of the way, and to have no room to inquire after me, that I thought I was safe enough. So, in short, I consented to let her have the child, and I gave her ten pounds, that is to say, I gave it to my governess, who gave it to the poor woman before my face, she agreeing never to return the child back to me, or to claim anything more for its keeping or bringing up; only that I promised, if she took a great deal of care of it, I would give her something more as often as I came to see it; so that I was not bound to pay the five pounds, only that I promised my governess that I would do it. And thus my great care was over, after a manner, which, though it did not at all satisfy my mind, yet was the most convenient for me, as my affairs then stood, of any that could be thought on at that time.

I then began to write to my friend at the Bank in a more kindly style, and particularly about the beginning of July I sent him a letter, that I proposed to be in town some time in August. He returned me an answer in the most passionate terms imaginable, and desired me to let him have timely notice, and he would come and meet me two days' journey. This puzzled me scurvily, and I did not know what answer to make to it. Once I was resolved to take the stage coach to West Chester, on purpose only to have the satisfaction of coming back, that he might see me really come in the same coach; for I had a jealous thought, though I had no ground for it at all, lest he should think I was not really in the country, and it was no ill-grounded thought, as you shall hear presently.

I endeavoured to reason myself out of it, but it was in vain, the impression lay so strong on my mind that it was not to be resisted; at last it came as an addition to my new design of going in the country, that it would be an excellent blind to my old governess, and would cover entirely all my other affairs, for she did not know in the least whether my new lover lived in London or in Lancashire, and when I told her my resolution she was fully persuaded it was in Lancashire.

Having taken my measures for this journey I let her know it, and sent the maid that attended me from the beginning to take a place for me in the coach. She would have had me let the maid have waited on me down to the last stage, and come up again in the waggon, but I convinced her it would not be convenient. When I went away she told me she would enter into no measures for correspondence, for she saw evidently that my affection to my child would cause me to write to her, and visit her too when I came to town again. I assured her it would, and so took my leave, well satisfied to have been freed from such a house, however good my accommodations there had been, as I have related before.

I took the place in the coach, not to its full extent, but to a place called Stone, in Cheshire, I think it is, where I not only had no manner of business, but not so much as the least acquaintance with any person in the town or near it. But I knew that with money in the pocket one is at home anywhere, so I lodged there two or three days, until, watching my opportunity, I found room in another stage-coach, and took passage back again for London, sending a letter to my gentleman, that I should be such a certain day at Stony-Stratford, where the coachman told me he was to lodge.

It happened to be a chance coach that I had taken up, which, having been hired on purpose to carry some gentlemen to West Chester, who were going to Ireland, was now returning, and did not tie itself up to exact times or places as the stages did; so that, having been obliged to lie still a Sunday, he had time to get himself ready to come out, which otherwise he could not have done.

However, his warning was so short that he could not reach to Stony-Stratford time enough to be with me at night, but he met me at a place called Brickill the next morning, as we were just coming into the town.

I confess I was very glad to see him, for I had thought myself a little disappointed over night, seeing I had come so far to contrive my coming on purpose. He pleased me doubly, too, by the figure he came in, for he brought a very handsome (gentleman's) coach and four horses, with a servant to attend him.

He took me out of the stage coach immediately, which stopped at an inn in Brickill, and, putting into the same inn, he set up his own coach, and bespoke dinner. I asked him what he meant by that, for I was for going forward with the journey. He said, no; I had need of a little rest upon the road; and that was a very good sort of a house, though it was but a little town; so we would go no farther that night, whatever came of it.

I did not press him much; for, since he had come so far to meet me, and put himself to so much expense, it was but reasonable I should oblige him a little too, so I was easy as to that point.

After dinner we walked to see the town, to see the church, and to view the fields and the country, as is usual for strangers to do, and our landlord was our guide in going to see the church. I observed my gentleman inquired pretty much about the parson, and I took the hint immediately, that he certainly would propose to be married; and though it was a sudden thought, it followed presently, that in short I would not refuse him; for, to be plain with my circumstances, I was in no condition now to say no; I had no reason now to run any more such hazards.

But while these thoughts ran round in my head, which was the work but of a few moments, I observed my landlord took him aside, and whispered to him, though not very softly neither, for so much I overheard: "Sir, if you shall have occasion——" the rest I could not hear, but it seems it was to this purpose: "Sir, if you shall have occasion for a minister, I have a friend a little way off that will serve you, and be as private as you please."

My gentleman answered loud enough for me to hear, "Very well; I believe I shall."

I was no sooner come back to the inn, but he fell upon me with irresistible words; that since he had had the good fortune to meet me, and every thing concurred, it would be hastening his felicity if I would put an end to the matter just there.

"What do you mean?" says I, colouring a little: "What! in an inn and upon the road! Bless us all!" said I, as if I had been surprised, "how can you talk so?"

"O, I can talk so very well," says he; "I came a purpose to talk so, and I'll show you that I did;" and with that he pulls out a great bundle of papers.

"You fright me," said I. "What are these?"

"Don't be frightened, my dear," says he, and kissed me. This was the first time he had been so free to call me my dear; he then repeated it.

"Don't be frightened—you shall see what it is all;" then he laid them all abroad.

There was first the deed or sentence of divorce from his wife, and the full evidence of her playing the whore; then there was the certificates of the minister and churchwardens of the parish where she lived, proving that she was buried, and intimating the manner of her death; the copy of the coroner's warrant for a jury to sit upon her, and the verdict of the jury, who brought it in non compos mentis. All this was indeed to the purpose, and to give me satisfaction, though, by the way, I was not so scrupulous, had he known all, but that I might have taken him without it. However, I looked them all over as well as I could, and told him that this was all very clear indeed, but that he need not have given himself the trouble to have brought them out with him, for it was time enough.

"Well," he said, "it might be time enough for me, but no time but the present time was time enough for him."

There were other papers rolled up, and I asked him what they were.

"Why, ay," says he, "that is the question I wanted to have you ask me." So he unrolls them, and takes out a little chagreen case, and gives me out of it a very fine diamond ring. I could not refuse it if I had a mind to do so, for he put it upon my finger; so I made him a curtsy, and accepted it. Then he takes out another ring, "and this," says he, "is for another occasion;" so he puts that in his pocket.

"Well, but let me see it though," says I, and smiled. "I guess what it is—I think you are mad."

"I should have been mad if I had done less," says he, and still he did not show it me, and I had a great mind to see it; so I says, "Well, but let me see it."

"Hold," says he; "first look here." Then he took up the roll again and read it; and behold! it was a licence for us to be married.

"Why," says I, "are you distracted? Why, you were fully satisfied, sure, that I would comply, and yield at the first word, or resolved to take no denial."

"The last is certainly the case," said he.

"But you may be mistaken," said I.

"No, no," said he; "how can you think so? I must not be denied, I cannot be denied," and with that he fell to kissing me so violently, I could not get rid of him.

There was a bed in the room, and we were walking to and again, eager in the discourse: at last he takes me by surprise in his arms, and threw me on the bed and himself with me, and holding me fast in his arms, but without the least offer of any indecency, courted me to consent with such repeated entreaties and arguments, protesting his affection and vowing he would not let me go till I promised him, that at last I said, "Why, you resolve not to be denied, I think."

"No, no," says he, "I must not be denied, I will not be denied, I can't be denied."

"Well, well," said I, and giving him a slight kiss, "then you shall not be denied," said I. "Let me get up."

He was so transported with my consent, and the kind manner of it, that I began to think once he took it for a marriage, and would not stay for the form; but I wronged him, for he gave over kissing me, took me by the hand, pulled me up again, and then giving me two or three kisses again, thanked me for my kind yielding to him, and was so overcome with the satisfaction and joy of it, that I saw tears stand in his eyes.

I turned from him, for it filled my eyes with tears too, and I asked him leave to retire a little to my chamber. If ever I had a grain of true repentance for a vicious and abominable life for twenty-four years past, it was then. "Oh! what a felicity is it to mankind," said I to myself, "that they cannot see into the hearts of one another! How happy had it been for me, if I had been wife to a man of so much honesty and so much affection, from the beginning."

Then it occurred to me what an abominable creature am I; and how is this innocent gentleman to be abused by me? How little does he think that having divorced a whore, he is throwing himself into the arms of another; that he is going to marry one that has lain with two brothers, and has had three children by her own brother; one that was born in Newgate, whose mother was a whore, and is now a transported thief; one that has lain with so many men, and has had a child since he saw her. "Poor gentleman," said I, "what is he going to do?"

After this reproaching myself was over, it followed thus: "Well, if I must be his wife, if it please God to give me grace, I will be a true wife to him, and love him suitably to the strange excess of his passion for me. I will make him amends, if possible, by what he shall see, for the cheats and abuses I put upon him, which he does not see."

He was impatient for my coming out of my chamber, but finding me long, he went down stairs, and talked with the landlord about the parson.

The landlord, an officious though well-meaning fellow, had sent away for the neighbouring clergyman; and when my gentleman began to speak of it to him, and talk of sending for him, "Sir," says he to him, "my friend is in the house;" so without any more words he brought them together. When he came to the minister, he asked him if he would venture to marry a couple of strangers that were both willing. The parson said that Mr — had said something to him of it; that he hoped it was no clandestine business; that he seemed to be a grave gentleman, and he supposed madam was not a girl, so that the consent of friends should be wanted.

"To put you out of doubt of that," says my gentleman, "read this paper," and out he pulls the licence.

"I am satisfied," says the minister. "Where is the lady?"

"You shall see her presently," says my gentleman.

When he had said thus, he came up stairs, and I was by that time come out of my room, so he tells me the minister was below, and that he had talked with him, and that upon showing him the licence, he was free to marry us with all his heart; "but he asks to see you, so he asked if I would let him come up."

"It is time enough," said I, "in the morning, is it not?"

"Why," said he, "my dear, he seemed to scruple whether it was not some young girl stolen from her parents, and I assured him we were both of age to command our own consent; and that made him ask to see you."

"Well," said I, "do as you please." So up they bring the parson, and a merry sort of a gentleman he was. He had been told, it seems, that we had met there by accident, that I came in the Chester coach, and my gentleman in his own coach to meet me; that we were to have met last night at Stony Stratford, but that he could not reach so far. "Well, sir," says the parson, "every ill turn has some good in it; the disappointment, sir," says he to my gentleman, "was yours, and the good turn is mine, for if you had met at Stony Stratford I had not had the honour to marry you. Landlord, have you a common prayer-book in the house?"

I started as if I had been frightened. "Lord, sir," says I, "what do you mean? What! to marry in an inn, and at night too?"

"Madam," says the minister, "if you will have it be in the church you shall; but I assure you, your marriage will be as firm here as in the church. We are not tied by the canons to marry nowhere but in the church; and if you will have it in the church, it will be as public as a country fair; and as for the time of day, it does not at all weigh in this case; our princes are married in their chambers, and at eight or ten o'clock at night."

I was a great while before I could be persuaded, and pretended not to be willing at all to be married but in the church. But it was all grimace; so I seemed at last to be prevailed on, and my landlord and his wife and daughter were called up. My landlord was father and clerk and all together; and we were married, and very merry we were; though I confess the self-reproaches which I had upon me before lay close to me, and extorted every now and then a deep sigh from me, which my bridegroom took notice of, and endeavoured to encourage me, thinking, poor man, that I had some little hesitation at the step I had taken so hastily.

We enjoyed ourselves that evening completely, and yet all was kept so private in the inn, that not a servant in the house knew of it, for my landlady and her daughter waited on me, and would not let any one of the maids come up stairs, except while we were at supper. My landlady's daughter I called my bride-maid, and sending for a shop-keeper the next morning, I gave the young woman a good suit of knots, as good as the town would afford, and finding it was a lace-making town, I gave her mother a piece of bone-lace for a head.

One reason that my landlord was so close was, that he was unwilling the minister of the parish should hear of it; but for all that somebody heard of it, so as that we had the bells set at ringing the next morning early; and the music, such as the town would afford, under our window. But my landlord brazened it out, that we were married before we came thither; only that, being his former guests we would have our wedding supper at his house.

We could not find in our hearts to stir the next day; for, in short, having been disturbed by the bells in the morning, and having, perhaps, not slept over much before, we were so sleepy afterwards that we lay in bed till almost twelve o'clock.

I begged my landlady that we might not have any more music in the town nor ringing of bells, and she managed it so well that we were very quiet. But an odd passage interrupted all my mirth for a good while; the great room of this house looked into the street, and my new spouse being below stairs, I had walked to the end of the room, and it being a pleasant warm day, I had opened the window, and was standing at it for some air, when I saw three gentlemen come by on horseback, and go into an inn just against us.

It was not to be concealed, nor was it so doubtful as to leave me any room to question it, but the second of these three was my Lancashire husband. I was frightened to death, I never was in such consternation in my life, I thought I should have sunk into the ground; my blood ran chill in my veins, and I trembled as if I had been in a cold fit of an ague. I say there was no room to question the truth of it; I knew his clothes, I knew his horse, and I knew his face.

The first sensible reflection I made was, that my husband was not by to see my disorder, and that I was very glad of. The gentlemen had not been long in the house, but they came to the window of their room, as is usual; but my window was shut, you may be sure. However, I could not keep from peeping at them, and there I saw him again, heard him call out to one of the servants of the house for something he wanted, and received all the terrifying confirmations of its being the same person that were possible to be had.

My next concern was to know, if possible, what was his business there; but that was impossible. Sometimes my imagination formed an idea of one frightful thing, sometimes of another; sometimes I thought he had discovered me, and was come to upbraid me with ingratitude and breach of honour; and every moment I fancied he was coming up the stairs to insult me; and innumerable fancies came into my head of what was never in his head, nor ever could be, unless the devil had revealed it to him.

I remained in this fright near two hours, and scarce ever kept my eye from the window or door of the inn where they were. At last, hearing a great clatter in the passage of their inn, I ran to the window, and, to my great satisfaction, saw them all three go out again and travel on westward. Had they gone towards London, I should have been still in a fright, lest I should meet him on the road again, and that he should know me; but he went the contrary way, and so I was eased of that disorder.

We resolved to be going the next day, but about six o'clock at night we were alarmed with a great uproar in the street, and people riding as if they had been out of their wits; and what was it but a hue and cry after three highwaymen that had robbed two coaches and some other travellers, near Dunstable Hill; and notice had, it seems, been given that they had been seen at Brickill, at such a house, meaning the house where those gentlemen had been.

The house was immediately beset and searched, but there were witnesses enough that the gentlemen had been gone above three hours. The crowd having gathered about, we had the news presently; and I was heartily concerned now another way. I presently told the people of the house, that I dared to say those were not the persons, for that I knew one of the gentlemen to be a very good person, and of a good estate in Lancashire.

The constable, who came with the hue and cry, was immediately informed of this, and came over to me to be satisfied from my own mouth, and I assured him that I saw the three gentlemen as I was at the window, that I saw them afterwards at the window of the room they dined in; that I saw them afterwards take horse, and I could assure him I knew one of them to be such a man; that he was a gentleman of a very good estate and an undoubted character in Lancashire, from whence I was just now upon my journey.

The assurance with which I delivered this, gave the mob gentry a check, and gave the constable such satisfaction, that he immediately sounded a retreat, told his people these were not the men, but that he had an account they were very honest gentlemen, and so they went all back again. What the truth of the matter was I knew not, but certain it was that the coaches were robbed at Dunstable Hill, and five hundred and sixty pounds in money taken, besides some of the lace-merchants that always travelled that way had been visited too; as to the three gentlemen, that remains to be explained hereafter.

Well, this alarm stopped us another day, though my spouse was for travelling, and told me that it was always safest travelling after a robbery, for that the thieves were sure to be gone far enough off when they had alarmed the country; but I was afraid and uneasy, and indeed principally lest my old acquaintance should be upon the road still, and should chance to see me.

I never lived four pleasanter days together in my life; I was a mere bride all this while, and my new spouse strove to make me entirely easy in every thing. O! could this state of life have continued! how had all my past troubles been forgot, and my future sorrows have been avoided! But I had a past life of a most wretched kind to account for, some of it in this world as well as in another.

We came away the fifth day; and my landlord, because he saw me uneasy, mounted himself, his son, and three honest country fellows, with good fire-arms, and, without telling us of it, followed the coach, and would see us safe into Dunstable; we could do no less than treat them very handsomely at Dunstable, which cost my spouse about ten or twelve shillings, and something he gave the men for their time too, but my landlord would take nothing for himself.

This was the most happy contrivance for me that could have fallen out, for had I come to London unmarried, I must either have come to him for the first night's entertainment, or have discovered to him that I had not one acquaintance in the whole city of London that could receive a poor bride for the first night's lodging with her spouse: But now, being an old married woman, I made no scruple of going directly home with him, and there I took possession at once of a house well furnished, and a husband in very good circumstances, so that I had a prospect of a very happy life, if I knew how to manage it; and I had leisure to consider of the real value of the life I was likely to live; how different it was to be from the loose ungoverned part I had acted before, and how much happier a life of virtue and sobriety is than that which we call a life of pleasure.

O! had this particular scene of life lasted, or had I learnt from that time I enjoyed it to have tasted the true sweetness of it, and had not fallen into that poverty which is the sure bane of virtue, how happy had I been, not only here, but perhaps for ever. For while I lived thus I was really a penitent for all my life past; I looked back on it with abhorrence, and might truly be said to hate myself for it. I often reflected how my lover at the Bath, struck by the hand of God, repented and abandoned me, and refused to see me any more, though he loved me to an extreme; but I, prompted by that worst of devils, poverty, returned to the vile practice, and made the advantage of what they call a handsome face be the relief to my necessities, and beauty be a pimp to vice.

Now I seemed landed in a safe harbour, after the stormy voyage of life past was at an end; and I began to be thankful for my deliverance; I sat many an hour by myself, and wept over the remembrance of past follies, and the dreadful extravagances of a wicked life, and sometimes I flattered myself that I had sincerely repented.

But there are temptations which it is not in the power of human nature to resist, and few know what would be their case if driven to the same exigencies. As covetousness is the root of all evil, so poverty is, I believe, the worst of all snares. But I waive that discourse till I come to the experiment.

I lived with this husband in the utmost tranquillity. He was a quiet, sensible, sober man, virtuous, modest, sincere, and in his business diligent and just. His business was in a narrow compass, and his income sufficient to a plentiful way of living in the ordinary way. I do not say to keep an equipage and make a figure, as the world calls it, nor did I expect it or desire it; for as I abhorred the levity and extravagance of my former life, so I chose now to live retired, frugal, and within ourselves; I kept no company, made no visits; minded my family and obliged my husband; and this kind of life became a pleasure to me.

We lived in an uninterrupted course of ease and content for five years, when a sudden blow from an almost invisible hand blasted all my happiness, and turned me out into the world in a condition the reverse of all that had been before it.

My husband having trusted one of his fellow clerks with a sum of money too much for our fortunes to bear the loss of, the clerk failed, and the loss fell very heavy on my husband, yet it was not so great neither, but if he had had spirit and courage to have looked his misfortunes in the face, his credit was so good that, as I told him, he would easily recover it; for to sink under trouble is to double the weight, and he that will die in it shall die in it.

It was in vain to speak comfortably to him, the wound had sunk too deep, it was a stab that touched the vitals; he grew melancholy and disconsolate, and from thence lethargic, and died. I foresaw the blow, and was extremely oppressed in my mind, for I saw evidently that if he died I was undone.

I had had two children by him and no more; for to tell the truth, it began to be time for me to leave off bearing children, for I was now eight and forty, and I suppose if he had lived I should have had no more.

I was now left in a dismal and disconsolate case indeed, and in several things worse than ever. First, it was past the flourishing time with me when I might expect to be courted for a mistress; that agreeable part had declined some time, and the ruins only appeared of what had been; and that which was worse than all was this, that I was the most dejected, disconsolate creature alive. I that had encouraged my husband, and endeavoured to support his spirits under his trouble, could not support my own; I wanted that spirit in trouble which I told him was so necessary to him for bearing the burden.

But my case was indeed deplorable, for I was left perfectly friendless and helpless, and the loss my husband had sustained had reduced his circumstances so low, that though indeed I was not in debt, yet I could easily foresee that what was left would not support me long; that while it wasted daily for subsistence, I had no way to increase it one shilling, so that it would soon be all spent, and then I saw nothing before me but the utmost distress, and this represented itself so lively to my thoughts, that it seemed as if it was come before it was really very near; also my very apprehensions doubled the misery, for I fancied every sixpence that I paid for a loaf of bread was the last that I had in the world, and that to-morrow I was to fast and be starved to death.

In this distress I had no assistant, no friend to comfort or advise me. I sat and cried, and tormented myself night and day; wringing my hands, and sometimes raving like a distracted woman; and indeed I have often wondered it had not affected my reason, for I had the vapours to such a degree, that my understanding was sometimes quite lost in fancies and imaginations.

I lived two years in this dismal condition, wasting that little I had, weeping continually over my dismal circumstances, and, as it were only bleeding to death, without the least hope or prospect of help from God or man; and now I cried so long, and so often, that tears were, as I might say, exhausted, and I began to be desperate, for I grew poor apace.

For a little relief I had put off my house and took lodgings, and as I was reducing my living, so I sold off most of my goods, which put a little money in my pocket, and I lived near a year upon that, spending very sparingly, and eking things out to the utmost; but still when I looked before me, my very heart would sink within me at the inevitable approach of misery and want. O let none read this part without seriously reflecting on the circumstances of a desolate state, and how they would grapple with mere want of friends and want of bread; it will certainly make them think not of sparing what they have only, but of looking up to heaven for support, and of the wise man's prayer—"Give me not poverty lest I steal."

Let them remember that a time of distress is a time of dreadful temptation, and all the strength to resist is taken away. Poverty presses, the soul is made desperate by distress, and what can be done? It was one evening, when being brought, as I may say, to the last gasp, I think I may truly say I was distracted and raving, when prompted by I know not what spirit, and, as it were, doing I did not know what or why, I dressed me, for I had still pretty good clothes, and went out. I am very sure I had no manner of design in my head when I went out. I neither knew or considered where to go or on what business; but as the devil carried me out and laid his bait for me, so he brought me to be sure to the place, for I knew not whither I was going or what I did.

Wandering thus about I knew not whither, I passed by an apothecary's shop in Leadenhall street, where I saw lie on a stool just before the counter a little bundle wrapt in a white cloth; beyond it stood a maid servant with her back to it, looking up towards the top of the shop, where the apothecary's apprentice, as I suppose, was standing up on the counter, with his back also to the door, and a candle in his hand, looking and reaching up to the upper shelf for something he wanted, so that both were engaged mightily earnestly, and nobody else in the shop.

This was the bait; and the devil, who I said laid the snare, as readily prompted me as if he had spoke; for I remember, and never shall forget, it was like a voice spoken to me over the shoulder.

"Take the bundle—be quick—do it this moment."

It was no sooner said, but I stepped into the shop, and, with my back to the wench, as if I had stood up for a cart that was going by, I put my hand behind me and took the bundle, and went off with it, the maid or the fellow not perceiving me, or any one else.

It is impossible to express the horror of my soul all the while I did it. When I went away I had no heart to run, or scarce to mend my pace. I crossed the street indeed, and went down the first turning I came to, and I think it was a street that went through into Fenchurch street; from thence I crossed and turned through so many ways and turnings that I could never tell which way it was, nor where I went, for I felt not the ground I stepped on, and the farther I was out of danger the faster I went, till, tired and out of breath, I was forced to sit down on a little bench at a door, and then I began to recover, and found I was got into Thames street near Billingsgate. I rested me a little and went on. My blood was all on fire; my heart beat as if I was in a sudden fright; in short, I was under such a surprise that I still knew not whither I was going or what to do.

After I had tired myself thus with walking a long way about, and so eagerly, I began to consider and make home to my lodging, where I came about nine o'clock at night.

What the bundle was made up for, or on what occasion laid where I found it, I knew not; but when I came to open it, I found there was a suit of child-bed linen in it, very good and almost new, the lace very fine. There was a silver porringer of a pint, a small silver mug, and six spoons; with some other linen, a good smock, and three silk handkerchiefs; and in the mug, wrapt up in a paper, eighteen shillings and sixpence in money.

All the while I was opening these things I was under such dreadful impressions of fear, and in such terror of mind, though I was perfectly safe, that I cannot express the manner of it. I sat me down and cried most vehemently. "Lord," said I, "what am I now?—A thief! Why, I shall be taken next time and carried to Newgate and be tried for my life!" And with that I cried again a long time, and I am sure, as poor as I was, if I had durst, for fear, I would certainly have carried the things back again; but that went off after a while.

Well, I went to bed for that night, but slept little; the horror of the fact was upon my mind, and I knew not what I said or did all night and all the next day. Then I was impatient to hear some news of the loss, and would fain know how it was, whether they were a poor body's goods or a rich. "Perhaps," said I, "it may be some poor widow like me, that had packed up their goods to go and sell them for a little bread for herself and her poor child, and are now starving and breaking their hearts for want of that little they would have fetched;" and this thought tormented me worse than all the rest for three or four days. But my own distresses silenced all these reflections, and the prospect of my starving, which grew every day more frightful to me, hardened my heart by degrees. It was then particularly heavy upon my mind that I had been reformed, and had, as I hoped, repented of all my past wickedness; that I had lived a sober, grave, retired life for several years. But now I should be driven, by the dreadful necessity of my circumstances, to the gates of destruction, soul and body; and two or three times I fell upon my knees, praying to God, as well as I could, for deliverance. But I cannot but say my prayers had no hope in them. I knew not what to do. It was all fear without, and dark within; and I reflected upon my past life as not sincerely repented of, that heaven was now beginning to punish me on this side the grave, and would make me as miserable as I had been wicked.

Had I gone on here I had perhaps been a true penitent. But I had an evil councillor within, and he was continually prompting me to relieve myself by the worst means; so one evening he tempted me again by the same wicked impulse that had said "Take that bundle," and go and seek for what might happen.

I went out now by daylight, and wandered about I knew not whither, and in search of I knew not what, when the devil put a snare in my way of a dreadful nature indeed, and such a one as I have never had before or since. Going through Aldersgate street, there was a pretty little child had been at a dancing-school, and was going home all alone, and my prompter, like a true devil, set me upon this innocent creature. I talked to it, and it prattled to me again, and I took it by the hand and led it along till I came to a paved alley that goes into Bartholomew close, and I led it in there. The child said that was not its way home.

I said, "Yes, my dear, it is; I will show you the way home."

The child had a little necklace on of gold beads, and I had my eye upon that, and in the dark of the alley I stood, pretending to mend the child's clog that was loose, and took off her necklace, and the child never felt it, and so led the child on again.

Here, I say, the devil put me upon killing the child in the dark alley, that it might not cry; but the very thought frightened me so that I was ready to drop down, but I turned the child about and bade it go back again, for that was not its way home. She said she would, and I went through Bartholomew close, and then turned round to another passage that goes into Long lane; so away into Charterhouse square, and out into St John's street; then crossing into Smithfield, went down Chick-lane and into Field lane to Holborn bridge, when mixing with the crowd of people usually passing there, it was not possible to have been found out; and thus I enterprised my second sally into the world.

The thoughts of this booty put out all the thoughts of the first, and the reflections I had made wore quickly off. Poverty, as I have said, hardened my heart, and my own necessities made me regardless of anything. The last affair left no great concern upon me, for as I did the poor child no harm, I only said to myself. I had given the parents a just reproof for their negligence in leaving the poor little lamb to come home by itself, and it would teach them to take more care of it another time.

This string of beads was worth about twelve or fourteen pounds; I suppose it might have been formerly the mother's, for it was too big for the child's wear, but that perhaps the vanity of the mother to have her child look fine at the dancing-school had made her let the child wear it. And no doubt the child had a maid to take care of it; but she, like a careless jade, was taken up perhaps with some fellow that had met her, and so the poor baby wandered till it fell into my hands.

However, I did the child no harm; I did not so much as frighten it, for I had a great many tender thoughts about me yet, and did nothing but what, as I may say, mere necessity drove me to.

I had a great many adventures after this, but I was young in the business, and did not know how to manage, otherwise than as the devil put things into my head; and indeed he was seldom backward to me. One adventure I had which was very lucky to me; I was going through Lombard street in the dusk of the evening, just by the end of the Three King court, when on a sudden comes a fellow running by me as swift as lightning, and throws a bundle that was in his hand just behind me, as I stood up against the corner of the house at the turning into the alley. Just as he threw it in he said, "God bless you, mistress, let it lie there a little," and away he runs as swift as the wind: after him comes two more, and immediately a young fellow without his hat, crying "Stop thief," and after him two or three more. They pursued the two last fellows so close that they were forced to drop what they had got, and one of them was taken into the bargain, the other got off free.

I stood stock still all this while till they came back, dragging the poor fellow they had taken, and lugging the things they had found, extremely well satisfied they had recovered the booty, and taken the thief; and thus they passed by me, for I looked only like one who stood up while the crowd was gone.

Once or twice I asked what was the matter, but the people neglected answering me, and I was not very importunate; but after the crowd was wholly passed, I took my opportunity to turn about and take up what was behind me and walk away. This indeed I did with less disturbance than I had done formerly, for these things I did not steal, but they were stolen to my hand. I got safe to my lodging with this cargo, which was a piece of fine black lustring silk, and a piece of velvet; the latter was but part of a piece of about eleven yards; the former was a whole piece of near fifty yards.

I had pretty good luck thus far, and I made several adventures more, though with but small purchase, yet with good success; but I went in daily dread that some mischief would befall me, and that I should certainly come to be hanged at last. The impression this made on me was too strong to be slighted, and it kept me from making attempts that for aught I know might have been very safely performed; but one thing I cannot omit, which was a bait to me many a day. I walked frequently out into the villages round the town to see if nothing would fall in my way there; and going by a house near Stepney, I saw on the window board two rings, one a small diamond ring, and the other a plain gold ring; to be sure laid there by some thoughtless lady that had more money than forecast, perhaps only till she washed her hands.

I walked several times by the window to observe if I could see whether there was anybody in the room or no, and I could see nobody, but still I was not sure; it came presently into my thoughts to rap at the glass, as if I wanted to speak to somebody, and if anybody was there they would be sure to come to the window, and then I would tell them to remove those rings, for that I had seen two suspicious fellows take notice of them. This was a ready thought; I rapped once or twice and nobody came, when seeing the coast clear, I thrust hard against the square of glass, and broke it with very little noise, and took out the two rings, and walked away with them very safe. The diamond ring was worth about three pounds, and the other about nine shillings.

I was now at a loss for a market for my goods, and especially for my two pieces of silk. I was very loth to dispose of them for a trifle, as the poor unhappy thieves in general do, who, after they have ventured their lives for, perhaps, a thing of value, are forced to sell it for a song when they have done. But I was resolved I would not do this, whatever shift I made. However, I did not well know what course to take; at last I resolved to go to my old governess, and acquaint myself with her again. I had punctually supplied the five pounds a year to her for my little boy as long as I was able, but at last was obliged to put a stop to it. However, I had written a letter to her, wherein I had told her my circumstances were reduced very low; that I had lost my husband, and that I was not able to do it any longer, and begged that the poor child might not suffer too much for its mother's misfortunes.

I now made her a visit, and I found that she drove something of the old trade still, but that she was not in such flourishing circumstances as before; for she had been sued by a certain gentleman who had had his daughter stolen from him and who, it seems, she had helped to convey away; and it was very narrowly that she escaped the gallows. The expense also had ravaged her, and she was become very poor; her house was but meanly furnished, and she was not in such repute for her practice as before; however, she stood upon her legs, as they say, and as she was a stirring bustling woman, and had some stock left, she was turned pawn-broker, and lived pretty well.

She received me very civilly, and with her usual obliging manner told me she would not have the less respect for me for my being reduced; that she had taken care my boy was very well looked after, though I could not pay for him, and that the woman that had him was easy, so that I needed not trouble myself about him, till I might be better able to do it effectually.

I told her that I had not much money left, but that I had some things that were monies worth, if she could tell me how I might turn them into money. She asked me what it was I had. I pulled out the string of gold beads, and told her it was one of my husband's presents to me; then I showed her the two parcels of silk which I told her I had from Ireland, and brought up to town with me, and the little diamond ring. As to the small parcel of plate and spoons, I had found means to dispose of them myself before; and as for the child-bed linen I had, she offered me to take it herself, believing it to be my own. She told me she was turned pawn-broker, and that she would sell those things for me as pawned to her, and so she sent presently for proper agents that bought them, being in her hands, without any scruple, and gave good prices too.

I now began to think this necessary woman might help me a little in my low condition to some business, for I would gladly have turned my hand to any honest employment if I could have got it; but here she was deficient. Honest business did not come within her reach; if I had been younger, perhaps she might have helped me to a spark, but my thoughts were of that kind of livelihood as being quite out of the way after fifty, which was my case, and so I told her.

She invited me at last to come, and be at her house till I could find something to do, and it should cost me very little; and this I gladly accepted of, and now living a little easier, I entered into some measures to have my little son by my last husband taken care of; and this she made easy too, reserving a payment only of five pounds a year, if I could pay it. This was such a help to me, that for a good while I left off the wicked trade that I had so newly taken up; and gladly I would have got my bread by the help of my needle if I could have got work, but that was very hard to do for one that had no manner of acquaintance in the world.

However, at last I got some quilting-work for ladies' beds, petticoats, and the like; and this I liked very well and worked very hard, and with this I began to live; but the diligent devil, who resolved I should continue in his service, continually prompted me to go out and take a walk, that is to say, to see if anything would offer in the old way.

One evening I blindly obeyed his summons, and fetched a long circuit through the streets, but met with no purchase, and came home very weary, and empty; but not content with that, I went out the next evening too, when going by an alehouse I saw the door of a little room open, next the very street, and on the table a silver tankard, things much in use in public houses at that time. It seems some company had been drinking there, and the careless boys had forgot to take it away.

I went into the box frankly, and setting the silver tankard on the corner of the bench, I sat down before it and knocked with my foot; a boy came presently, and I bade him fetch me a pint of warm ale, for it was cold weather. The boy ran, and I heard him go down to the cellar to draw ale. While the boy was gone, another boy came into the room, and cried, "Do you call?" I spoke with a melancholy air, and said, "No, child, the boy is gone for a pint of ale for me."

While I sat here I heard the woman in the bar say, "Are they all gone in No. 5?" which was the box I sat in, and the boy said "Yes."

"Who fetched the tankard away?" says the woman.

"I did," says another boy; "that is it, pointing, it seems, to another tankard which he had fetched from another box by mistake; or else it must be that the rogue forgot that he had not brought it in, which certainly he had not."

I heard all this, much to my satisfaction, for I found plainly that the tankard was not missed, and that they concluded it was fetched away; so I drank my ale, called to pay, and as I went I said, "Take care of your plate, child," meaning a silver pint mug, which he brought me drink in. The boy said, "Yes, madam; very welcome," and away I came.

I came home to my governess, and now I thought it was a time to try her, that if I might be put to the necessity of being exposed, she might offer me some assistance. When I had been at home some time and had an opportunity of talking to her, I told her I had a secret of the greatest consequence in the world to commit to her, if she had respect enough for me to keep it a secret. She told me she had kept one of my secrets faithfully, why should I doubt her keeping another? I told her the strangest thing in the world had befallen me, and that it had made a thief of me, even without any design; and so told her the whole story of the tankard.

"And have you brought it away with you, my dear?" says she.

"To be sure I have," says I, and showed it her.

"But what shall I do now?" says I; "must not I carry it again?"

"Carry it again!" says she, "ay, if you are minded to be sent to Newgate for stealing it."

"Why," says I, "they cannot be so base to stop me when I carry it to them again?"

"You don't know those sort of people, child," says she; "they will not only carry you to Newgate, but hang you too, without any regard to the honesty of returning it; or bring in an account of all the other tankards they have lost for you to pay for."

"What must I do then?" says I.

"Nay," says she, "as you have played the cunning part and stole it, you must even keep it; there is no going back now; besides, child," says she, "don't you want it more than they do? I wish you could light of such a bargain once a week."

This gave me a new notion of my governess, and that since she was turned pawnbroker she had a sort of people about her that were none of the honest ones that I had met with there before.

I had not been long there, but I discovered it more plainly than before, for every now and then I saw hilts of swords, spoons, forks, tankards, and all such kind of ware brought in, not to be pawned, but to be sold downright; and she bought everything that came without asking any questions, but had very good bargains, as I found by her discourse.

I found also that in the following this trade she always melted down the plate she bought that it might not be challenged; and she came to me and told me one morning that she was going to melt, and if I would, she would put my tankard in, that it might not be seen by anybody.

I told her with all my heart; so she weighed it, and allowed me the full value in silver again; but I found she did not do the same to the rest of her customers.

Some time after this, as I was at work and very melancholy, she begins to ask me what the matter was, as she was used to do.

I told her my heart was heavy, I had little work, and nothing to live on, and knew not what course to take.

She laughed and told me I must go out again and try my fortune, it might be that I might meet with another piece of plate.

"Oh, mother," says I, "that is a trade I have no skill in, and if I should be taken I am undone at once."

Says she, "I could help you to a schoolmistress that shall make you as dexterous as herself."

I trembled at that proposal, for hitherto I had had no confederates, nor any acquaintance among that tribe; but she conquered all my modesty and all my fears; and in a little time, by the help of this confederate, I grew as impudent a thief, and as dexterous as ever Moll Cut-Purse was, though, if fame does not belie her, not half so handsome.

The comrade she helped me to dealt in three sorts of craft; viz. shop-lifting, stealing of shop-books and pocket-books, and taking off gold watches from the ladies' sides, and this last she did so dexterously that no woman ever arrived to the perfection of that art, so as to do it like her. I liked the first and the last of these things very well, and I attended her some time in the practice, just as a deputy attends a midwife without any pay.

At length she put me to practise. She had shown me her art, and I had many times unhooked a watch from her own side with great dexterity. At last she showed me a prize, and this was a young lady big with child, who had a charming watch; the thing was to be done as she came out of church. She goes on one side of the lady, and pretends, just as she came to the steps, to fall, and fell against the lady with so much violence as put her into a great fright, and both cried out terribly. In the very moment that she jostled the lady, I had hold of the watch, and holding it the right way, the start she gave drew the hook out, and she never felt it. I made off immediately, and left my schoolmistress to come out of her pretended fright gradually, and the lady too; and presently the watch was missed.

"Aye," says my comrade, "then it was those rogues that thrust me down, I warrant ye; I wonder the gentlewoman did not miss her watch before, then we might have taken them."

She humoured the thing so well that nobody suspected her, and I was got home a full hour before her. This was my first adventure in company; the watch was indeed a very fine one, and had a great many trinkets about it, and my governess allowed us twenty pounds for it, of which I had half; and thus I was entered a complete thief, hardened to a pitch above all the reflections of conscience or modesty, and to a degree which I must acknowledge I never thought possible in me.

Thus the devil who began, by the help of an irresistible poverty, to push me into this wickedness, brought me on to a height beyond the common rate, even when my necessities were not so great or the prospect of my misery so terrifying; for I had now got into a little vein of work, and as I was not at a loss to handle my needle, it was very probable, as acquaintance came in, I might have got my bread honestly enough.

I must say, that if such a prospect of work had presented itself at first when I began to feel the approach of my miserable circumstances—I say, had such a prospect of getting my bread by my working presented itself, then I had never fallen into this wicked trade, or into such a wicked gang as I was now embarked with; but practice had hardened me, and I grew audacious to the last degree, and the more so because I had carried it on so long, and had never been taken; for, in a word, my new partner in wickedness and I went on together so long without being ever detected, that we not only grew bold, but we grew rich, and had at one time one-and-twenty gold watches in our hands.

I remember that one day, being a little more serious than ordinary, and finding I had so good a stock beforehand as I had, for I had near two hundred pounds in money for my share, it came strongly into my mind, no doubt from some kind spirit, if such there be, that as at first poverty excited me, and my distresses drove me to these dreadful shifts, so seeing those distresses were now relieved, and I could also get something towards a maintenance by working, and had so good a bank to support me, why should I not now leave off, as they say, while I was well? that I could not expect to go always free, and if I was once surprised and miscarried I was undone.

This was, doubtless, the happy minute when, if I had hearkened to the blessed hint, from whatsoever hand it came, I had still a cast for an easy life; but my fate was otherwise determined; the busy devil that so industriously drew me in, had too fast hold of me to let me go back; but as poverty brought me into the mire so avarice kept me in till there was no going back. As to the arguments which my reason dictated for persuading me to lay down, avarice stepped in and said "Go on, go on; you have had very good luck; go on till you have gotten four or five hundred pounds and then you shall leave off; and then you may live easy without working at all."

Thus I, that was once in the devil's clutches, was held fast there as with a charm, and had no power to go without the circle till I was ingulphed in labyrinths of trouble too great to get out at all.

However, these thoughts left some impression upon me, and made me act with some more caution than before, and more than my directors used for themselves. My comrade, as I called her, but rather she should have been called my teacher, with another of her scholars, was the first in the misfortune, for happening to be upon the hunt for a purchase, they made an attempt upon a linen-draper in Cheapside, but were snapped by a hawk's-eyed journeyman, and seized with two pieces of cambric, which were taken also upon them.

This was enough to lodge them both in Newgate, where they had the misfortune to have some of their former sins brought to remembrance; two other indictments being brought against them, and the facts being proved upon them they were both condemned to die; they both pleaded their bellies and were both voted quick with child, though my tutoress was no more with child than I was.

I went frequently to see them and condole with them, expecting that it would be my turn next; but the place gave me so much horror, reflecting that it was the place of my unhappy birth and of my mother's misfortunes, that I could not bear it, so I left off going to see them; and, oh! could I but have taken warning by their disasters, I had been happy still, for I was yet free, and had nothing brought against me; but I could not be—my misfortunes were not yet filled up.

My comrade, having the brand of an old offender, was executed; the younger offender was spared, having obtained a reprieve, but lay starving a long while in prison, till at last she got her name into what they call a circuit pardon, and so she came off.

This terrible example of my comrade frightened me heartily, and for a good while I made no excursions ; but one night in the neighbourhood of my governess's house they cried fire ; my governess looked out, for we were all up, and cried immediately that such a gentlewoman's house was all of a light fire a-top, and so indeed it was.

Here she gave me a jog, "Now, child," says she, "there is a rare opportunity, the fire being so near that you may go to it before the street is blocked up with the crowd." She presently gave me my cue. "Go, child," says she, "to the house, and run in and tell the lady, or anybody you see, that you come to help them, and that you came from such a gentlewoman (that is one of her acquaintance farther up the street.)" She gave me the like cue to the next house, naming another name that was also an acquaintance of the gentlewoman of the house.

Away I went, and coming to the house I found them all in confusion, you may be sure. I ran in, and finding one of the maids, "Lord, sweetheart," said I, "how came this dismal accident? Where is your mistress, and how does she do? Is she safe? and where are the children? I come from Madam — to help you."

Away runs the maid—"Madam, madam," says she, screaming as loud as she could yell, "here is a gentlewoman come from Madam — to help us."

The poor woman half out of her wits, with a bundle under her arm and two children, comes towards me.

"Lord, madam," says I, "let me carry the poor children to Madam —; she desires you to send them ; she will take care of the poor lambs;" and immediately I takes one of them out of her hand, and she lifts the other up into my arms.

"Ay, do, for God's sake," says she, "carry them to her. Oh thank her for her kindness."

"Have you anything else to secure, madam?" says I, "she will take care of it."

"Oh dear! ay," says she, "God bless her, and thank her; take this bundle of plate and carry it to her too. Oh, she is a good woman. Oh Lord! we are utterly ruined—utterly undone:" and away she runs from me out of her wits and the maid after her, and away comes I with the two children and the bundle.

I was no sooner got into the street but I saw another woman come to me. "Oh!" says she, "mistress," in a piteous tone, "you will let fall the child. Come, come, this is a sad time, let me help you;" and immediately lays hold of the bundle to carry it for me.

"No," says I; "if you will help me, take the child by the hand, and lead it for me but to the upper end of the street; I will go with you and satisfy you for your pains."

She could not avoid going after what I said; but the creature, in short, was one of the same business with me and wanted nothing but the bundle. However, she went with me to the door, for she could not help it. When we were come there I whispered to her—"Go, child," said I, "I understand your trade,—you may meet with purchase enough."

She understood me, and walked off. I thundered at the door with the children, and as the people were raised before by the noise of the fire I was soon let in, and I said, "Is madam awake?"

pray tell her Mrs — desires the favour of her to take the two children in. Poor lady! she will be undone, their house is all of a flame."

They took the children in very civilly, pitied the family in distress, and away came I with my bundle. One of the maids asked me if I was not to leave the bundle too? I said "No, sweetheart, it is to go to another place. It does not belong to them."

I was a great way out of the hurry now, and so I went on, clear of anybody's inquiry, and brought the bundle of plate, which was very considerable, straight home, and gave it to my old governess. She told me she would not look into it, but bade me go out again to look out for more.

She gave me the like cue to the gentlewoman at the next house to that which was on fire, and I did my endeavour to go; but by this time the alarm of fire was so great, and so many engines playing, and the street so thronged with people, that I could not get near the house, whatever I could do; so I came back again to my governess's, and taking the bundle up into my chamber, I began to examine it. It is with horror that I tell what a treasure I found there; it is enough to say, that besides most of the family plate, which was considerable, I found a gold chain, an old-fashioned thing, the locket of which was broken, so that I suppose it had not been used for some years, but the gold was none the worse for that; also a little box of burying rings, the lady's wedding ring, and some broken bits of old lockets of gold, a gold watch, and a purse with about twenty-four pounds value in old pieces of gold coin, and several other things of value.

This was the greatest and the worst prize that ever I was concerned in; for indeed, though, as I have said above, I was hardened now beyond the power of all reflection in other cases, yet it really touched me to the very soul when I looked into this treasure, to think of the poor disconsolate gentlewoman, who had lost so much by the fire besides, and who would think, to be sure, that she had saved her plate and best things. How she would be surprised and afflicted when she would find that she had been deceived, and should find that the person who had taken her children and her goods had not come, as was pretended from the gentlewoman at the farther end of the street.

I say I confess the inhumanity of this action moved me very much, and made me relent exceedingly, and tears stood in my eyes upon that subject. But with all my sense of its being cruel and inhuman, I could never find in my heart to make any restitution. The reflection wore off, and I began quickly to forget the circumstances that attended the taking them.

Nor was this all, for though by this job I was become considerably richer than before, yet the resolution I had formerly taken of leaving off this horrid trade, when I had gotten a little more, did not return; but I must still get farther and more; and the avarice joined so with the success, that I had no more thoughts of coming to a timely alteration of life; though without it I could expect no safety, no tranquillity in the possession of what I had so wickedly gained; but a little more and a little more was the case still.

At length, yielding to the importunities of my crime, I cast off all remorse and repentance ; and all the reflections on that head turned to no more than this, that I might perhaps come to have one booty more that might complete my desires ; but though I certainly had that one booty, yet every hit looked towards another, and was so encouraging to me to go on with the trade, that I had no gust to the thoughts of laying it down.

In this condition, hardened by success, and resolving to go on, I fell into the snare in which I was appointed to meet with my last reward for this kind of life. But even this was not yet, for I met with several successful adventures more in this way of being undone.

I remained still with my governess, who was for a while really concerned for the misfortune of my comrade that had been hanged, and who, it seems, knew enough of my governess to have sent her the same way, and which made her very uneasy ; indeed she was in a very great fright.

It is true, that when she was gone, and had not opened her mouth to tell what she knew, my governess was easy as to that point, and perhaps glad she was hanged ; for it was in her power to have obtained a pardon at the expense of her friends : but, on the other hand, the loss of her, and the sense of her kindness in not making her market of what she knew, moved my governess to mourn her very sincerely. I comforted her as well as I could, and she in return hardened me to merit more completely the same fate.

However, as I have said, it made me the more weary, and particularly I was very shy of shop-lifting, especially among the mercers and drapers, who are a set of fellows that have their eyes very much about them. I made a venture or two among the lace folks and the milliners, and particularly at one shop, where I got notice of two young women who were newly set up, and had not been bred to the trade. There, I think, I carried off a piece of bone-lace worth six or seven pounds, and a paper of thread ; but this was but once, it was a trick that would not serve again.

It was always reckoned a safe job when we heard of a new shop, and especially when the people were such as were not bred to shops ; such may depend upon it that they will be visited once or twice at their beginning, and they must be very sharp indeed if they can prevent it.

I made another adventure or two, but they were but trifles too, though sufficient to live on. After this nothing considerable offering for a good while, I began to think that I must give over the trade in earnest ; but my governess, who was not willing to lose me, and expected great things of me, brought me one day into the company with a young woman and a fellow that went for her husband, though, as appeared afterwards, she was not his wife ; but they were partners, it seems, in the trade they carried on, and partners in something else too. In short, they robbed together, lay together, were taken together, and at last were hanged together.

I came into a kind of league with these two, by the help of my governess, and they carried me out into three or four adventures, where I saw them commit some coarse and unhandy robberies, in which nothing but a great stock of impudence on their side, and gross negligence on the people's side who were robbed, could have made them successful ; so I resolved from that time forward to be very cautious how I adventured upon anything with them ; and indeed when two or three unlucky projects were proposed by them, I declined the offer, and persuaded them against it.

One time they particularly proposed robbing a watchmaker of three gold watches, which they had eyed in the daytime, and found the place where he laid them ; one of them had so many keys of all kinds, that he made no question to open the place where the watchmaker had laid them, and so we made a kind of an appointment ; but when I came to look narrowly into the thing, I found they proposed breaking into the house, and this, is a thing out of my way, I would not embark in ; so they went without me. They did get into the house by main force, and broke up the locked place where the watches were, but found but one of the gold watches and a silver one, which they took, and got out of the house again very clear ; but the family being alarmed cried out thieves, and the man was pursued and taken ; the young woman had got off too, but unhappily was taken at a distance, and the watches found upon her ; and thus I had a second escape, for they were convicted and both hanged, being old offenders, though but young people ; as I said before, that they robbed together and lay together, so now they hanged together, and there ended my new partnership.

I began now to be weary, having so narrowly escaped a scurring, and having such an example before me ; but I had a new tempter, who prompted me every day, I mean my governess ; and now a prize presented, which, as it came by her management, so she expected a good share of the booty. There was a great quantity of Flanders lace lodged in a private house, where she had got intelligence of it ; and Flanders lace being then prohibited, it was a good booty to any custom-house officer that could come at it. I had a full account from my governess, as well of the quantity, as of the very place where it was concealed ; and I went to a custom-house officer, and told him I had such a discovery to make to him of such a quantity of lace, if he would assure me that I should have my due share of the reward. This was so just an offer that nothing could be fairer ; so he agreed, and taking a constable and me with him, we beset the house. As I told him I could go directly to the place, he left it to me ; and the hole being very dark, I squeezed myself into it with a candle in my hand, and so reached the pieces out to him, taking care, as I gave him some, to secure as much about myself as I could conveniently dispose of. There was near three hundred pounds' worth of lace in the hole, and I secured about fifty pounds' worth of it to myself. The people of the house were not owners of the lace, but a merchant who had entrusted them with it, so that they were not so surprised as I thought they would be.

I left the officer overjoyed with his prize, and fully satisfied with what he had got, and appointed to meet him at a house of his own directing, where I came after I had disposed of the cargo I had about me, of which he had not the least suspicion. When I came to him he began to capitulate with me, believing I did not understand the right I had to a share in the prize, and would fain have put me off with twenty pounds; but I let him know that I was not so ignorant as he supposed I was, and yet I was glad, too, that he offered to bring me to a certainty. I asked one hundred pounds, and he rose up to thirty; I fell to eighty pounds, and he rose up again to forty. In a word, he offered fifty pounds, and I consented, only demanding a piece of lace, which I thought came to about eight or nine pounds, as if it had been for my own wear, and he agreed to it; so I got fifty pounds in money paid to me that same night, and made an end of the bargain; nor did he ever know who I was, or where to inquire for me; so that if it had been discovered that part of the goods had been embezzled, he would have made no challenge upon me for it.

I very punctually divided this spoil with my governess, and I passed with her from this time for a very dexterous manager in the nicest cases. I found that this last was the best and easiest sort of work that was in my way; and I made it my business to inquire out prohibited goods, and after buying some, usually betrayed them. None of these discoveries amounted to anything considerable, like that I related just now; but I was willing to act safe, and was still cautious of running the great risks which I found others did, and in which they miscarried every day.

The next thing of moment was an attempt at a gentlewoman's gold watch. It happened in a crowd, at a meeting-house, where I was in very great danger of being taken. I had full hold of her watch, but giving a great jostle, as if somebody had thrust me against her, and in the juncture giving the watch a fair pull, I found it would not come, so I let it go that moment, and cried out as if I had been killed, that somebody had trod upon my foot, and that there was certainly pickpockets there; for somebody or other had given a pull at my watch, for you are to observe, that on these adventures we always went very well dressed, and I had very good clothes on, and a gold watch by my side, as like a lady as other folks.

I had no sooner said so, but the other gentlewoman cried out a pickpocket too, for somebody, she said, had tried to pull her watch away.

When I touched her watch I was close to her, but when I cried out I stopped as it were short, and the crowd bearing her forward a little, she made a noise too, but it was at some distance from me, so that she did not in the least suspect me; but when she cried out a pickpocket, somebody cried "Ah, and here has been another; this gentlewoman has been attempted too."

At that very instant, a little farther in the crowd, and very luckily too, they cried out a pickpocket again, and really seized a young fellow in the very fact. This, though unhappy for the wretch, was very opportunely for my case, though I had carried it off handsomely enough before; but now it was out of doubt, and all the loose part of the crowd ran that way, and the poor boy was delivered up to the rage of the street, which is a cruelty I need not describe, and which, however, they are always glad of, rather than to be sent to Newgate, where they lie often a long time, till they are almost perished, and sometimes they are hanged; and the best they can look for, if they are convicted, is to be transported.

This was a narrow escape to me, and I was so frightened, that I ventured no more at gold watches for a great while. There was indeed a great many concurring circumstances in this adventure which assisted to my escape; but the chief was, that the woman whose watch I had pulled at was a fool, that is to say, she was ignorant of the nature of the attempt, which one would have thought she should not have been, seeing she was wise enough to fasten her watch so that it could not be slipped off; but she was in such a fright that she had no thought about her proper for the discovery, for she, when she felt the pull, screamed out and pushed herself forward, and put all the people about her into disorder, but said not a word of her watch, or of a pickpocket, for at least two minutes' time, which was time enough for me and to spare; for as I had cried out behind her, as I have said, and bore myself back to the crowd as she bore forward, there were several people, at least seven or eight, the throng being still moving on, that were got between me and her in that time; and then I crying out a pickpocket rather sooner than she, or at least as soon, she might as well be the person suspected as I, and the people were confused in their inquiry; whereas, had she, with the presence of mind needful on such an occasion, as soon as she felt the pull, not screamed out in the manner she did, but turned immediately round and seized the next person that was behind her, she had infallibly taken me.

This is a direction not of the kindest sort to the fraternity, but it is certainly a key to the clue of a pickpocket's motions; and whoever can follow it will as certainly catch the thief as he will be sure to miss if he does not.

I had another adventure which puts this matter out of doubt, and which may be an instruction to posterity in the case of a pickpocket. My good old governess, to give a short touch at her history, though she had left off the trade, was, as I may say, born a pickpocket; and, as I understood afterwards, had run through all the several degrees of that art, and yet had never been taken but once, when she was so grossly detected, that she was convicted and ordered to be transported; but being a woman of a rare tongue, and withal having money in her pocket, she found means, the ship putting into Ireland for provisions, to get on shore there, where she lived and practised her old trade for some years, when falling into another set of bad company, she turned midwife and procuress, and played a hundred pranks there, which she gave me a little history of in confidence between us as we grew more intimate; and it was to this wicked creature that I owed all the art and dexterity I arrived to, in which there were few that ever went beyond me, or that practised so long without any misfortune.

It was after these adventures in Ireland, and when she was pretty well known in that country, that she left Dublin and came over to England, where the time of her transportation not being yet expired, she left her former trade for fear of falling into bad hands again, for then she was sure to have gone to wreck. Here she set up the same trade she followed in Ireland, in which she soon, by her admirable management and a good tongue, arrived to the height which I have already described; and, indeed, began to be rich, though her trade fell off afterwards.

I mention thus much of the history of this woman here, the better to account for the concern she had in the wicked life I was now leading, into all the particulars of which she led me, as it were, by the hand, and gave me such directions, and I so well followed them, that I grew the greatest artist of my time, and worked myself out of every danger with such dexterity, that when several more of my comrades ran themselves into Newgate by a time they had been half a year at the trade, I had now practised upwards of five years, and the people at Newgate did not so much as know me; they had heard much of me indeed, and often expected to see me there; but I always got off, though many times in the extremest danger.

One of the greatest dangers I was now in was that I was too well known among the trade, and some of them whose hatred was owing rather to envy than to any injury I had done them, began to be angry that I should always escape when they were always caught and hurried to Newgate. These were they that gave me the name of MOLL FLANDERS, for it had no more affinity with my real name, or with any of the names I had ever gone by, than black is of kin to white, except that once, as before, I called myself Mrs Flanders when I sheltered myself in the Mint; but that these rogues never knew, nor could I ever learn how they came to give me the name, or what the occasion of it was.

I was soon informed that some of these who were gotten fast into Newgate had vowed to impeach me; and as I knew that two or three of them were but too able to do it, I was under a great concern about it, and kept within doors for a good while; but my governess, who I always made partner in my success, and who now played a sure game with me, for that she had a share of the gain, and no share in the hazard, I say my governess was something impatient of my leading such a useless, unprofitable life, as she called it; and she laid a new contrivance for my going abroad, and this was to dress me up in men's clothes, and so put me into a new kind of practice.

I was tall and personable, but a little too smooth-faced for a man; however, as I seldom went abroad but in the night, it did well enough; but it was a long time before I could behave in my new clothes; I mean as to my craft. It was impossible to be so nimble, so ready, so dexterous at these things in a dress so contrary to nature; and as I did everything clumsily, so I had neither the success nor the easiness of escape that I had before, and I resolved to leave it off; but that resolution was confirmed soon after by the following accident.

As my governess had disguised me like a man, so she joined me with a man, a young fellow that was nimble enough at his business, and for about three weeks we did very well together. Our principal trade was watching shopkeepers' counters, and slipping off any kind of goods we could see carelessly laid anywhere, and we made several very good bargains, as we called them, at this work. And as we kept always together, so we grew very intimate, yet he never knew that I was not a man; nay, though I several times went home with him to his lodgings, according as our business directed, and four or five times lay with him all night. But our design lay another way, and it was absolutely necessary to me to conceal my sex from him, as appeared afterwards. The circumstances of our living, coming in late, and having such and such business to do as required that nobody should be trusted with coming into our lodgings, were such as made it impossible to me to refuse lying with him, unless I would have owned my sex, and, as it was, I effectually concealed myself.

But his ill and my good fortune soon put an end to this life, which I must own I was sick of, too, on several other accounts. We had made several prizes in this new way of business, but the last would have been extraordinary. There was a shop in a certain street which had a warehouse behind it that looked into another street, the house making the corner of the turning. Through the window of the warehouse we saw lying on the counter or show-board which was just before it, five pieces of silks, besides other stuffs; and though it was almost dark, yet the people being busy in the fore shop with customers, had not had time to shut up those windows, or else had forgot it.

This the young fellow was so overjoyed with that he could not restrain himself. It lay all within his reach, he said, and he swore violently to me that he would have it, if he broke down the house for it. I dissuaded him a little, but saw there was no remedy, so he ran rashly upon it, slipped a square out of the sash window dexterously enough, and without noise, and got out four pieces of the silks, and came with them towards me, but was immediately pursued with a terrible clatter and noise. We were standing together indeed, but I had not taken any of the goods out of his hand, when I said to him hastily, "You are undone! fly, for God's sake!" He ran like lightning and I too, but the pursuit was hotter after him, because he had the goods, than after me. He dropt two of the pieces, which stopped them a little, but the crowd increased and pursued us both. They took him soon after with the other two pieces upon him, and then the rest followed me. I ran for it, and got into my governess's house, whither some quick-eyed people followed me so warmly as to fix me there. They did not immediately knock at the door, by which I got time to throw off my disguise, and dress me in my own clothes; besides, when they came there, my governess, who had her tale ready, kept the door shut, and called out to them and told them there was no man come in there; the people affirmed there did a man come in there, and swore they would break open the door.

My governess, not at all surprised, spoke calmly to them; told them they should very freely come and search her house, if they would bring a constable, and let none in but such as the constable would admit, for it was unreasonable to let in the whole crowd. This they could not refuse, though they were a crowd; so a constable was fetched immediately, and she very freely opened the door. The constable kept the door, and the men he appointed searched the house, my governess going with them from room to room. When she came to my room she called to me, and said aloud, "Cousin, pray open the door; here are some gentlemen that must come and look into your room."

I had a little girl with me, which was my governess's grand-child, as she called her; and I bade her open the door, and there sat I at work with a great litter of things about me, as if I had been at work all day, being myself quite undressed, with only night clothes on my head, and a loose morning gown wrapt about me. My governess made a kind of excuse for their disturbing me, telling me partly the occasion of it, and that she had no remedy but to open the door to them, and let them satisfy themselves, for all she could say to them would not satisfy them. I sat still and bid them search the room if they pleased, for if there was anybody in the house, I was sure they were not in my room; and as for the rest of the house, I had nothing to say to that; I did not understand what they looked for.

Everything looked so innocent and so honest about me, that they treated me civiler than I expected; but it was not till they had searched the room to a nicety, even under the bed, in the bed, and everywhere else where it was possible anything could be hid; when they had done this, and could find nothing, they asked my pardon for troubling me, and went down.

When they had thus searched the house from bottom to top, and then from top to bottom, and could find nothing, they appeased the mob pretty well; but they carried my governess before the justice. Two men swore that they saw the man whom they pursued go into her house. My governess rattled and made a great noise that her house should be insulted, and that she should be used thus for nothing; that if a man did come in he might go out again presently for aught she knew, for she was ready to make oath that no man had been within her doors all that day as she knew of, and that was very true indeed; that it might be indeed that as she was above stairs any fellow in a fright might find the door open, and run in for shelter when he was pursued, but that she knew nothing of it; and if it had been so he certainly went out again, perhaps at the other door, for she had another door into an alley, and so had made his escape and cheated them all.

This was indeed probable enough, and the justice satisfied himself with giving her an oath that she had not received or admitted any man into her house to conceal him, or protect or hide him from justice. This oath she might justly take, and did so, and so she was dismissed.

It is easy to judge what a fright I was in upon this occasion, and it was impossible for my governess ever to bring me to dress in that disguise again; for, as I told her, I should certainly betray myself.

My poor partner in this mischief was now in a bad case, for he was carried before my lord mayor, and by his worship committed to Newgate, and the people that took him were so willing, as well as able, to prosecute him, that they offered themselves to enter into recognizances to appear at the sessions, and pursue the charge against him.

However, he got his indictment deferred, upon promise to discover his accomplices, and particularly the man that was concerned with him in this robbery, and he failed not to do his endeavour, for he gave in my name, whom he called Gabriel Spencer, which was the name I went by to him, and here appeared the wisdom of my concealing my name and sex from him, which if he had ever known I had been undone.

He did all he could to discover this Gabriel Spencer; he described me—he discovered the place where he said I lodged, and in a word all the particulars that he could of my dwelling; but having concealed the main circumstances of my sex from him I had a vast advantage, and he never could hear of me; he brought two or three families into trouble by his endeavouring to find me, but they knew nothing of me, any more than that I had a fellow with me that they had seen, but knew nothing of; and as for my governess, though she was the means of his coming to me, yet it was done at second hand, and he knew nothing of her. This turned to his disadvantage, for having promised discoveries, and not being able to make it good, it was looked upon as a trifling with the justice of the city, and he was the more fiercely pursued by the shopkeepers who took him.

I was, however, terribly uneasy all this while and that I might be quite out of the way, I went away from my governess's for a while, but not knowing whither to wander, I took a maid servant with me, and took the stage coach to Brickill to my old landlord and landlady, where I was married to my late husband the banker. Here I told them a formal story, that I expected my husband every day from Ireland, and that I had sent a letter to him that I would meet him at Brickill at their house, and that he would certainly land, if the wind was fair, in a few days, so that I was come to spend a few days with them till he should come, for he would either come post or in the West Chester coach, I knew not which; but whichever it was, he would be sure to come to that house to meet me.

My landlady was mighty glad to see me, and my landlord made such a stir with me that if I had been a princess I could not have been better used, and here I might have been welcome a month or two if I had thought fit.

But my business was of another nature; I was very uneasy (though so well disguised that it was scarce possible to detect me) lest this fellow should some how or other find me out; and though he could not charge me with this robbery, having persuaded him not to venture, and having also done nothing in it myself but run away, yet he might have charged me with other things, and have bought his own life at the expense of mine.

This filled me with horrible apprehensions; I had no resource, no friend, no confidant but my old governess, and I knew no remedy but to put my life in her hands, and so I did, for I let her know where to send to me, and had several letters from her while I stayed here; some of them almost scared me out of my wits; but at last she sent me the joyful news that he was hanged, which was the best news to me that I had heard a great while.

I had stayed here five weeks, and lived very comfortably indeed (the secret anxiety of my mind excepted), but when I received this letter I looked pleasantly again, and told my landlady that I had received a letter from my spouse in Ireland, that I had the good news of his being very well, but had the bad news that his business would not permit him to come away so soon as he expected, and so I was like to go back again without him.

My landlady complimented me upon the good news, however, that I had heard he was well. "For I have observed, madam," says she, "you have not been so pleasant as you used to be; you have been over head and ears in care for him, I dare say," says the good woman; "it is easy to be seen there is an alteration in you for the better," says she.

"Well, I am sorry he cannot come yet," says my landlord, "I should have been heartily glad to have seen him; but I hope when you have certain news of his coming you will take a step hither again, madam," says he. "You shall be very welcome whenever you please to come."

With all these fine compliments we parted, and I came merry enough to London, and found my governess as well pleased as I was; and now she told me she would never recommend any partner to me again, for she always found, she said, that I had the best luck when I ventured by myself; and so indeed I had, for I was seldom in any danger when I was by myself, or if I was I got out of it with more dexterity than when I was entangled with the dull measures of other people, who had perhaps less forecast, and were more rash and impatient than I; for though I had as much courage to venture as any of them, yet I used more caution before I undertook a thing, and had more presence of mind when I was to bring myself off.

I have often wondered even at my own hardness another way, that when my companions were surprised, and fell so suddenly into the hands of justice, and that I so narrowly escaped, yet I could not all that while enter into one serious resolution to leave off this trade; and especially considering that I was now very far from being poor, that the temptation of necessity, which is generally the introduction of all such wickedness, was now removed; for I had near five hundred pounds by me in ready money, on which I might have lived very well if I had thought fit to have retired; but I say I had not so much as the least inclination to leave off; no, not so much as I had before when I had but two hundred pounds beforehand, and when I had no such frightful examples before my eyes as these were. From hence it is evident to me, that when once we are hardened in a crime no fear can affect us, no example give us any warning.

I had, indeed, one comrade whose fate went very near me for a good while, though I wore it off too in time; that case was indeed very unhappy. I had made a prize of a piece of very good damask in a mercer's shop, and went clear off myself, but had conveyed the piece to this companion of mine when we went out of the shop, and she went one way, and I went another. We had not been long out of the shop, but the mercer missed his piece of stuff, and sent his messengers, one one way and one another, and they presently seized her that had the piece of damask upon her; as for me, I had very luckily stepped into a house where there was a lace-chamber up one pair of stairs, and had the satisfaction, or the terror indeed, of looking out of the window upon the noise they made, and seeing the poor creature dragged away in triumph to the justice, who immediately committed her to Newgate.

I was careful to attempt nothing in the lace-chamber, but tumbled their goods about pretty much to spend time, then bought a few yards of edging, and paid for it, and came away very sad-hearted indeed for the poor woman who was in tribulation for what I only had stolen.

Here, again, my own caution stood me in good stead, namely, that though I often robbed with these people I never let them know who I was or where I lodged; nor did they ever find out my lodging, though they often endeavoured to watch me to it. They all knew me by the name of Moll Flanders, though even some of them neither believed I was she nor knew me to be so. My name was public among them, indeed, but how to find me out they knew not, not so much as how to guess at my quarters, whether they were at the east end of the town or the west; and this wariness was my safety upon all occasions.

I kept close a great while upon the occasion of this woman's disaster. I knew that if I should do anything that should miscarry, and should be carried to prison, she would be there and ready to witness against me, and perhaps save her life at my expense. I considered that I began to be very well known by name at the Old Bailey, though they did not know my face, and that if I should fall into their hands I should be treated as an old offender; and for this reason I was resolved to see what this poor creature's fate should be before I stirred abroad, though several times in her distress I conveyed money to her for her relief.

At length she came to her trial, and she pleaded she did not steal the things; but that one Mrs Flanders, as she heard her called, (for she did not know her) gave the bundle to her after they came out of the shop, and bade her carry it home to her lodging. They asked her where this Mrs Flanders was? but she could not produce her, neither could she give the least account of me; and the mercer's men swearing positively that she was in the shop when the goods were stolen; that they immediately missed them, and pursued her, and found them upon her; thereupon the jury brought her in guilty; but the court considering that she really was not the person that stole the goods, an inferior assistant, and that it was very possible she could not find out this Mrs Flanders, meaning me, though it would save her life, which indeed was true; I say, considering all this, they allowed her to be transported, which was the utmost favour she could obtain, only that the court told her that if she could in the meantime produce the said Mrs Flanders, they would intercede for her pardon; that is to say, if she could find me out and hang me, she should not be transported. This I took care to make impossible to her, and so she was shipped off in pursuance of her sentence a little while after.

I must repeat it again, that the fate of this poor woman troubled me exceedingly; and I began to be very pensive, knowing that I was really the instrument of her disaster; but the preservation of my own life, which was so evidently in danger, took off all my tenderness; and seeing she was not put to death, I was very easy at her transportation, because she was then out of the way of doing me any mischief, whatever should happen.

The disaster of this woman was some months before that of the last recited story, and was indeed partly the occasion of my governess proposing to dress me up in men's clothes that I might go about unobserved, as indeed I did; but I was soon tired of that disguise, as I said, for indeed it exposed me to too many difficulties.

I was now easy as to all fear of witnesses against me, for all those that had either been concerned with me, or that knew me by the name of Moll Flanders, were either hanged or transported; and if I should have had the misfortune to be taken I might call myself anything else as well as Moll Flanders, and no old sins could be placed to my account; so I began to run a tick again with the more freedom, and several successful adventures I made, though not such as I had made before.

We had at that time another fire happened not a great way off from the place where my governess lived, and I made an attempt there, as before; but as I was not soon enough before the crowd of people came in, and could not get to the house I aimed at, instead of a prize I got a mischief, which had almost put a period to my life, and all my wicked doings together; for the fire being very furious, and the people in a great fright in removing their goods, and throwing them out of windows, a wench from out of a window threw a feather-bed just upon me. It is true, the bed being soft, it broke no bones, but as the weight was great, and made greater by the fall, it beat me down and laid me dead for a while; nor did the people concern themselves much to deliver me from it, or to recover me at all; but I lay like one dead or neglected a good while; till somebody going to remove the bed out of the way, helped me up; it was indeed a wonder the people in the house had not thrown other goods out after it, and which might have fallen upon it, and then I had been inevitably killed; but I was reserved for further afflictions.

This accident, however, spoiled my market for that time, and I came home to my governess much hurt and bruised, and frightened to the last degree, and it was a good while before she could set me upon my feet again.

It was now a merry time of the year, and Bartholomew fair was begun. I had never made any walks that way, nor was the common part of the fair of much advantage to me, but I took a turn this year into the cloisters, and among the rest, I fell into one of the raffling shops. It was a thing of no great consequence to me, nor did I expect to make much of it; but there came a gentleman extremely well dressed, and very rich, and as 'tis frequent to talk to everybody in those shops, he singled me out, and was very particular with me. First he told me he would put in for me to raffle, and did so; and some small matter coming to his lot, he presented it to me; I think it was a feather muff. Then he continued to keep talking to me with a more than common appearance of respect; but still very civil and much like a gentleman.

He held me in talk so long till at last he drew me out of the raffling place to the shop door, and then to take a walk in the cloister, still talking of a thousand things cursorily, without anything to the purpose; at last he told me that, without compliment, he was charmed with my company, and asked me if I durst trust myself in a coach with him; he told me he was a man of honour, and would not offer any thing to me unbecoming him as such. I seemed to decline it a while, but suffered myself to be importuned a little, and then yielded.

I was at a loss in my thoughts to conclude at first what this gentleman designed; but I found afterwards he had had some drink in his head, and that he was not very unwilling to have some more. He carried me in the coach to the Spring-garden at Knight's-bridge, where we walked in the gardens, and he treated me very handsomely, but I found he drank very freely; he pressed me also to drink, but I declined it.

Hitherto he kept his word with me, and offered me nothing amiss; we came away in the coach again, and he brought me into the streets, and by this time it was near ten o'clock at night, and he stopped the coach at a house, where it seems he was acquainted, and where they made no scruple to show us up stairs into a room with a bed in it. At first I seemed to be unwilling to go up, but after a few words I yielded to that too, being indeed willing to see the end of it, and in hopes to make something of it at last. As for the bed, &c., I was not much concerned about that part.

Here he began to be a little freer with me than he had promised; and I by little and little yielded to everything, so that in a word he did what he pleased with me; I need say no more. All this while he drank freely too, and about one in the morning we went into the coach again. The air and the shaking of the coach made the drink he had got more up in his head than it was before, and he grew uneasy in the coach, and was for acting over again what he had been doing before; but as I thought my game now secure, I resisted him and brought him to be a little still, which had not lasted five minutes, but he fell fast asleep.

I took this opportunity to search him to a nicety: I took a gold watch, with a silk purse of gold, his fine full-bottom perriwig, and silver-fringed gloves, his sword and fine snuff-box, and gently opening the coach door, stood ready to jump out while the coach was going on; but the coach stopping in a narrow street beyond Temple-bar to let another coach pass, I got softly out, fastened the door again, and gave my gentleman and the coach the slip both together, and got off very securely.

This was an adventure indeed unlooked for, and perfectly undesigned by me; though I was not so past the merry part of life as to forget how to behave when a fop so blinded by his appetite should not know an old woman from a young one. I did not indeed look so old as I was by ten or twelve years; yet I was not a young wench of seventeen, and it was easy enough to be distinguished. There is nothing so absurd, so surfeiting, so ridiculous as a man heated by wine in his head, and a wicked gust in his inclination together; he is in possession of two devils at once, and can no more govern himself by his reason than a mill can grind without water. His vice tramples upon all that was in him that had any good in it, if any such thing there was; nay, his very sense is blinded by its own rage, and he acts absurdities even in his view; such as drinking more when he is drunk already; picking up a common woman, without regard to what she is or who she is, whether sound or rotten, clean or unclean, whether ugly or handsome, whether old or young, and so blinded as not really to distinguish. Such a man is worse than a lunatic; prompted by his vicious corrupted head, he no more knows what he is doing than this wretch of mine knew when I picked his pocket of his watch and his purse of gold.

These are men of whom Solomon says, "they go like an ox to the slaughter till a dart strike through their liver;" an admirable description, by the way, of the foul disease, which is a poisonous deadly contagion mingling with the blood, whose centre or fountain is in the liver, from whence by the swift circulation of the whole mass, that dreadful nauseous plague strikes immediately through his liver, and his spirits are infected, his vitals stabbed through as with a dart.

It is true this poor unguarded wretch was in no danger from me, though I was greatly apprehensive at first of what danger I might be in from him; but he was really to be pitied in one respect, that he seemed to be a good sort of a man in himself, a gentleman that had no harm in his design, a man of sense and of fine behaviour, a comely handsome person, a sober solid countenance, a charming beautiful face, and everything that could be agreeable; only had unhappily had some drink the night before, had not been in bed, as he told me when we were together; was hot, and his blood fired with wine, and in that condition his reason, as it were asleep, had given him up.

As for me, my business was his money, and what I could make of him; and after that if I could have found out any way to have done it, I would have sent him safe home to his house and to his family, for it was ten to one but he had an honest, virtuous wife and innocent children, that were anxious for his safety, and would have been glad to have gotten him home, and have taken care of him till he was restored to himself; and then with what shame and regret would he look back upon himself! How would he reproach himself with associating himself with a whore? picked up in the worst of all holes, the cloister, among the dirt and filth of all the town. How would he be trembling for fear he had got the pox, for fear a dart had struck through his liver, and hate himself every time he looked back upon the madness and brutality of this debauch! How would he, if he had any principles of honour, as I verily believe he had; I say how would he abhor the thought of giving any ill distemper, if he had it, as for aught he knew he might, to his modest and virtuous wife, and thereby sowing the contagion in the life-blood of his posterity?

Would such a gentleman but consider the contemptible thoughts which the very women they are concerned with in such cases as these have of them, it would be a surfeit to them. As I said above, they value not the pleasure, they are raised by no inclination to the man; the passive jade thinks of no pleasure but the money; and when he is, as it were, drunk in the ecstasies of his wicked pleasure, her hands are in his pockets searching for what she can find there; and of which he can no more be sensible in the moment of his folly, than he can fore-think of it when he goes about it.

I knew a woman that was so dexterous with a fellow, who indeed deserved no better usage, that, while he was busy with her another way, conveyed his purse, with twenty guineas in it, out of his fob-pocket, where he had put it for fear of her, and put another purse with gilded counters in it, in the room of it. After he had done, he says to her, "Now, hav'nt you picked my pocket?"—She jested with him, and told him she supposed he had not much to lose. He put his hand to his fob, and with his finger felt his purse was there, which fully satisfied him, and so she brought off his money. And this was a trade with her; she kept a sham gold watch, and a purse of counters in her pocket to be ready on all such occasions, and I doubt not practised it with success.

I came home with this last booty to my governess, and really, when I told her the story, it so affected her that she was hardly able to forbear tears, to think how such a gentleman run a daily risk of being undone, every time a glass of wine got into his head.

But as to the purchase I got, and how entirely I stript him, she told me it pleased her wonderfully well. "Nay, child," said she, "the usage may, for aught I know, do more to reform him than all the sermons that ever he will hear in his life;" and if the remainder of the story be true, so it did.

I found the next day she was wonderfully inquisitive about this gentleman. The description I gave her of him, his dress, his person, his face, all concurred to make her think of a gentleman whose character she knew. She mused awhile, and I going on in the particulars, says she, "I'll lay a hundred pounds I know the man."

"I am sorry if you do," says I; "for I would not have him exposed on any account in the world; he has had injury enough already, and I would not be instrumental to do him any more."

"No, no," says she, "I will do him no injury, but you may let me satisfy my curiosity a little; for if it is he, I warrant you I find it out." I was a little startled at that, and I told her, with an apparent concern in my face, that by the same rule he might find me out, and then I was undone. She returned warmly, "Why, do you think I will betray you, child? No, no," says she, "not for all he is worth in the world. I have kept your counsel in worse things than these; sure you may trust me in this." So I said no more.

She laid her scheme another way, and without acquainting me with it, but she was resolved to find it out; so she goes to a certain friend of hers who was acquainted in the family that she guessed at, and told her she had some extraordinary business with such a gentleman, (who, by the way, was no less than a baronet, and of a very good family), and that she knew not how to come at him without somebody to introduce her. Her friend promised her readily to do it, and accordingly goes to the house, to see if the gentleman were in town.

The next day she came to my governess and tells her that Sir — was at home, but that he had met with a disaster, and was very ill, and there was no speaking to him.—“What disaster?” says my governess, hastily, as if she was surprised at it.—“Why,” says her friend, “he had been at Hampstead to visit a gentleman of his acquaintance, and as he came back again he was set upon and robbed, and having got a little drink too, as they suppose, the rogues abused him, and he is very ill.”—“Robbed?” says my governess; “and what did they take from him?”—“Why,” says her friend, “they took his gold watch and his gold snuff-box, his fine perriwig, and what money he had in his pocket, which was considerable, to be sure, for Sir — never goes without a purse of guineas about him.”

“Pshaw,” says my old governess, jeering, “I warrant you he has got drunk now, and got a whore, and she has picked his pocket, and so he came home to his wife and tells her he has been robbed; that’s an old sham; a thousand such tricks are put upon the women every day.”

“Fie,” says her friend; “I find you do not know Sir —. Why, he is as civil a gentleman, there is not a finer man, nor a soberer, graver, modester person in the whole city. He abhors such things; there’s nobody that knows him will think such a thing of him.”—“Well, well,” says my governess, “that’s none of my business; if it was, I warrant you I should find there was something of that kind in it. Your modest men, in common opinion, are sometimes no better than other people, only they keep a better character, or, if you please, are the best hypocrites.”

“No, no,” says her friend, “I can assure you Sir — is no hypocrite; he is really an honest, sober gentleman, and he has certainly been robbed.”—“Nay,” says my governess, “it may be that he has; it’s no business of mine I tell you. I only want to speak with him; my business is of another nature.”—“But,” says her friend, “let your business be of what it will, you cannot see him yet, for he is not yet to be seen, for he is very ill, and bruised very much.”—“Ay,” says my governess, “nay, then he has fallen into bad hands to be sure.” And then she asked very gravely, “Pray, where is he bruised?”—“Why, in the head,” says her friend, “and one of his hands and his face, for they used him barbarously.”—“Poor gentleman,” says my governess, “I must wait then till he recovers,” and adds, “I hope it will not be long, for I very much want to speak with him.”

Away she comes to me and tells me this story. “I have found out your fine gentleman, and a fine gentleman he was,” says she, “but mercy on him, he is in a sad pickle now; I wonder what the devil you have done to him; why, you have almost killed him.”—I looked at her with disorder enough. “I killed him?” says I; “you must mistake the person; I am sure I did nothing to him; he was very well when I left him,” said I, “only drunk and fast asleep.”—“I know nothing of that,” says she, “but he is in a sad pickle now;” and so she told me all that her friend had said.—“Well, then,” says I, “he fell into bad hands after I left him, for I left him safe enough.”

About ten days after, or a little more, my governess goes again to her friend, to introduce her to this gentleman. She had inquired other ways in the meantime, and found that he was about again, if not abroad again, so she got leave to speak to him.

She was a woman of an admirable address, and wanted nobody to introduce her. She told her tale much better than I shall be able to tell it for her, for she was a mistress of her tongue, as I said already. She told him that she came, though a stranger, with a sincere desire of doing him a service, and he should find she had no other end in it; that as she came purely on so friendly an account, she begged a promise from him, that if he did not accept what she should officiously propose, he would not take it ill that she meddled with what was not her business. She assured him that as what she had to say was a secret that belonged to him only, so whether he accepted the offer or not, it should remain a secret to all the world, unless he exposed it himself; nor should his refusing her service in it make her so little show her respect as to do him the least injury, so that he should be entirely at liberty to act as he thought fit.

He looked very shy at first, and said he knew nothing that related to him that required much secrecy; that he had never done any man any wrong, and cared not what anybody might say of him; that it was no part of his character to be unjust to anybody, nor could he imagine in what any man could render him any service; but that if it was as she said, he could not take it ill from any one that they should endeavour to serve him; and so, as it were, left her at liberty either to tell him, or not to tell him, as she thought fit.

She found him so perfectly indifferent, that she was almost afraid to enter into the point with him; but, however, after some other circumlocutions, she told him, that by a strange and unaccountable accident she came to have a particular knowledge of the late unhappy adventure he had fallen into; and that in such a manner, that there was nobody in the world but herself and him that were acquainted with it; no, not the very person that was with him.

He looked a little angry at first. “What adventure?” said he.—“Why, sir,” said she, “of your being robbed coming from Knightsbridge, Hampstead, sir, I should say,” says she. “Be not surprised, sir,” says she, “that I am able to tell you every step you took that day, from the Cloister in Smithfield to the Spring Gardens at Knightsbridge, and thence to the — in the Strand, and how you were left asleep in the coach afterwards: I say, let not this surprise you, for sir, I do not come to make a booty of you. I ask nothing of you, and I assure you the woman that was with you knows nothing who you are, and never shall ; and yet perhaps I may serve you further still ; for I did not come barely to let you know that I was informed of these things, as if I wanted a bribe to conceal them ; assure yourself, sir," said she, "that whatever you think fit to do or say to me, it shall be all a secret as it is, as much as if I were in my grave."

He was astonished at her, and said gravely to her, "Madam, you are a stranger to me ; but it is very unfortunate that you should be let into the secret of the worst action of my life, and a thing I am so justly ashamed of, that the only satisfaction of it to me was that I thought it was known only to God and my own conscience."

"Pray, sir," says she, "do not reckon the discovery of it to me to be any part of your misfortune ; it was a thing, I believe, you were surprised into, and perhaps the woman used some art to prompt you to it ; however, you will never find any just cause," said she, "to repent that I came to hear of it, nor can your own mouth be more silent in it than I have been, and ever shall be."

"Well," says he, "but let me do some justice to the woman too ; whoever she is, I do assure you she prompted me to nothing, she rather declined me ; it was my own folly and madness that brought her into it too. As to what she took from me, I could expect no less from her in the condition I was in, and to this hour I know not whether she robbed me or the coachman. If she did it, I forgive her ; I think all gentlemen that do so should be used in the same manner ; but I am more concerned for some other things than I am for all that she took from me."

My governess now began to come into the whole matter, and he offered himself freely to her. First, she said to him, in answer to what he said about me : "I am glad, sir, you are so just to the person that you were with ; I assure you she is a gentlewoman and no woman of the town, and however you prevailed on her so far as you did, I am sure it is not her practice. You ran a great venture indeed, sir, but if that be any part of your care, I am persuaded you may be perfectly easy, for I dare assure you no man has touched her before you, since her husband, and he has been dead now almost eight years."

It appeared that this was his grievance, and that he was in a very great fright about it ; however, when my governess said this to him, he appeared very well pleased, and said : "Well, Madam, to be plain with you, if I was satisfied of that, I should not so much value what I lost ; for as to that, the temptation was great, and perhaps she was poor and wanted it."—"If she had not been poor, sir," says my governess, "I assure you she would not have yielded to you ; and as her poverty first prevailed with her to let you do as you did, so the same poverty prevailed with her to pay herself at last, when she saw you was in such a condition, that if she had not done it, perhaps the next coachman or chairman might have done it."

"Well," says he, "much good may it do her ; I say again, all the gentlemen that do so ought to be used in the same manner, and then they would be cautious themselves. I have no more concern about it, but on the score which you hinted at before, madam."

Here he entered into some freedoms with her on the subject of what passed between us, which are not so proper for a woman to write, and the great terror that was upon his mind with relation to his wife, for fear he should have received an injury from me, and should communicate it further ; and asked her at last if she could not procure him an opportunity to speak with me. My governess gave him further assurances of my being a woman clear from any such thing, and that he was as entirely safe in that respect as he was with his own lady ; but as for seeing me, she said it might be of dangerous consequence ; but, however, that she could talk with me, and let him know my answer ; using at the same time some arguments to persuade him not to desire it, and that it could be of no service to him, saying she hoped he had no desire to renew a correspondence with me, and that on my account it was a kind of putting life into his hands.

He told her he had a great desire to see me ; that he would give her any assurances that were in his power not to take any advantage of me ; and that, in the first place, he would give me a general release from all demands of any kind. She insisted, as it might tend to a further divulging the secret, and might in the end be injurious to him, entreating him not to press for it, so at length he desisted.

They had some discourse upon the subject of the things he had lost, and he seemed to be very desirous of his gold watch, and told her if she could procure that for him, he would willingly give as much for it as it was worth ; she told him she would endeavour to procure it for him, and leave the valuing it to himself.

Accordingly the next day she carried the watch, and he gave her thirty guineas for it, though it seems it cost much more. Then he spoke something of his perriwig, which it seems cost him threescore guineas, and his snuff box, and in a few days more she carried them too, which obliged him very much, and he gave her thirty more. The next day I sent him his fine sword and cane GRATIS, and demanded nothing of him, but I had no mind to see him, unless it had been so, that he might be satisfied I knew who he was, which he was not willing to.

Then he entered into a long tale with her, of the manner how she came to know all this matter. She framed a long talk of that part : how she had it from me, that I had told the whole story to, and that was to help me to dispose of the goods, and this confidante brought the things to her, she being by profession a pawnbroker ; and she hearing of his worship's disaster, guessed at the thing in general ; that having gotten the things into her hands, she had resolved to come and try as she had done. She then gave him repeated assurances that it should never go out of her mouth, and though she knew the woman very well, yet she had not let her know, meaning me, anything of it ; that is to say, who the person was, which, by the way, was false ; but, however, it was not to his damage, for I never opened my mouth of it to anybody.

I had a great many thoughts in my head about my seeing him again, and was often sorry that I had refused it. I was persuaded, that if I had seen him and let him know that I knew him, I should have made some advantage of him, and perhaps have had some maintenance from him; and though it was a life wicked enough, yet it was not so full of danger as this I was engaged in. However, these thoughts wore off, and I declined seeing him again for that time; but my governess saw him often, and he was very kind to her, giving her something almost every time he saw her. One time, in particular, she found him very merry, and, as she thought, he had some wine in his head; and he pressed her again very earnestly to let him see that woman that, as he said, had bewitched him so that night. My governess, who, from the beginning, was for my seeing him, told him, as he was so desirous of it, that she could almost yield to it, if she could prevail with me; adding, that if he would please to come to her house in the evening, she would endeavour it, upon his repeated assurances of forgetting what was passed.

Accordingly she came to me and told me all the discourse; in short, she soon pressed me to consent in a case which I had some regret in my mind for declining before; so I prepared to see him. I dressed me to all advantage possible, I assure you, and for the first time used a little art. I say for the first time, for I had never yielded to the baseness of paint before, having always had vanity enough to believe I had no need of it.

At the hour appointed he came; and, as she observed before, so it was plain still that he had been drinking, though very far from being what we call in drink. He appeared exceedingly pleased to see me, and entered into a long discourse with me upon the old affair. I begged his pardon very often for my share in it; protested I had not any such design when first I met him; that I had not gone out with him but that I took him for a very civil gentleman, and that he made me so many promises of offering no incivility to me.

He alleged the wine he drank, and that he scarce knew what he did, and that if he had not been so, I should never have found him take the freedom with me that he had done. He protested to me that he had never touched any woman but me since he was married to his wife, and it was a surprise to him. Then he complimented me upon being so particularly agreeable to him, and the like, and talked so much of that kind, till I found he had talked himself almost in a temper to do the same thing over again. But I took him up short; I protested I had never suffered any man to touch me since my husband died, which was near eight years. He said he believed it to be so truly; and added, that madam had intimated as much to him, and that it was his opinion of that part which made him desire to see me; and that since he had once broken in upon his virtue with me, and found no ill consequences, he could be safe in venturing there again; and so, in short, it went on to what I expected, and to what will not bear relating.

My old governess had foreseen it as well as I, and therefore led him into a room which had not a bed in it, and yet had a chamber within it which had a bed, whither we withdrew for the rest of the night; and, in short, after some time being together, he went to bed and lay there all night. I withdrew, but came again undressed before it was day, and lay with him the rest of the time.

Thus you see having committed a crime once, is a second handle to the committing of it again. All the the reflections wear off when the temptation renews itself: had I not yielded to see him again, the corrupt desire in him had worn off, and it is very probable he had never fallen into it with anybody else, as I really believe he had not done before.

When he went away I told him I hoped he was satisfied that he had not been robbed again. He told me he was satisfied in that point, and could trust me again; and putting his hand in his pocket gave me five guineas, which was the first money I had gained in that way for many years.

I had several visits of the like kind from him, but he never came into a settled way of maintenance, which was what I should have been best pleased with. Once, indeed, he asked me how I did to live. I answered him pretty quick that I assured him I had never taken that course that I took with him; but that indeed I worked at my needle and could just maintain myself; that sometimes it was as much as I was able to do, and I shifted hard enough.

He seemed to reflect upon himself that he should be the first person to lead me into that which he assured me he had never intended himself; and it touched him a little, he said, that he should be the cause of his own sin and mine too. He would often make just reflections also upon the crime itself, and upon the particular circumstances of it with respect to himself,—how wine introduced the inclinations,—how the devil led him to the place, and found out an object to tempt him, and he made the moral always himself.

When these thoughts were upon him he would go away and, perhaps, not come again in a month's time, or longer; but then, as the serious part wore off the lewd part would wear in, and then he would come prepared for the wicked part. That we lived for some time; and though he did not keep me, as they call it, yet he never failed doing things that were handsome, and sufficient to maintain me without working, and, which was better, without following my old trade.

But this affair had its end too; for after about a year I found that he did not come so often as usual, and at last he left it off altogether without any dislike, or bidding adieu; and so there was an end of that short scene of life, which added no great store to me, only to make more work for repentance.

However, during this interval I confined myself pretty much at home; at least, being thus provided for, I made no adventure, no, not for a quarter of a year after he left me; but then finding the fund fail, and being loath to spend upon the main stock, I began to think of my old trade, and to look abroad into the street again, and my first step was lucky enough.

Now I dressed myself up in a very mean habit, for, as I had several shapes to appear in, I was now in an ordinary stuff gown, a blue apron and a straw hat; and I placed myself at the door of the Three Cups Inn in St John street.

There were several carriers used the inn, and the coaches for Barnet, for Totteridge, and other towns that way, stood always in the street in the evening, when they prepared to set out; so that I was ready for anything that offered for either one or other. The meaning was this:—people come frequently with bundles and small parcels to those inns, and call for such carriers or coaches as they want to carry them into the country; and there generally attend women, porters' wives or daughters, ready to take in such things for their respective people that employ them.

It happened very oddly that I was standing at the inn gate, and a woman that had stood there before, and which was the porter's wife belonging to the Barnet stage coach having observed me, asked if I waited for any of the coaches. I told her yes, I waited for my mistress that was coming to go to Barnet. She asked me who was my mistress, and I told her any madam's name that came next me. But as it seemed I happened upon a name, a family of which name lived at Hadley, just beyond Barnet.

I said no more to her, or she to me a good while; but by and by somebody calling her at a door a little way off, she desired me that if anybody called for the Barnet coach I would step and call her at the house, which it seems was an ale-house; I said yes very readily, and away she went.

She was no sooner gone, but comes a wench and a child, puffing and sweating, and asks for the Barnet coach. I answered presently, here.—“Do you belong to the Barnet coach?” says she.—“Yes, sweetheart,” said I; “what do ye want?”—“I want room for two passengers,” says she.—“Where are they, sweetheart?” said I.—“Here's this girl, pray let her go into the coach,” says she, “and I'll go and fetch my mistress.”—“Make haste then, sweetheart,” says I, “for we may be full else.” The maid had a great bundle under her arm; so she put the child into the coach, and I said, “You had best put your bundle into the coach too.”—“No,” says she, “I am afraid somebody should slip it away from the child.”—“Give it me, then,” said I; “and I will take care of it.”—“Do then,” says she; “and be sure you take care of it.”—“I'll answer for it,” said I, “if it were for twenty pounds' value.”—“There, take it then,” says she, and away she goes.

As soon as I had got the bundle, and the maid was out of sight, I goes on towards the ale-house where the porter's wife was; so that if I had met her I had then only been going to give her the bundle, and to call her to her business, as if I was going away and could stay no longer; but as I did not meet her I walked away, and turning into Charterhouse lane made off through Charterhouse yard into Long lane, then crossed into Bartholomew close, so into Little Britain, and through the Blue Coat Hospital into Newgate street.

To prevent being known I pulled off my blue apron and wrapt the bundle in it, which before was made up in a piece of painted calico, and very remarkable I also wrapt up my straw-hat in it, and so put the bundle upon my head; and it was very well that I did thus, for coming through the Blue Coat Hospital who should I meet but the wench that had given me the bundle to hold; it seems she was going with her mistress, who she had been to fetch to the Barnet coach.

I saw she was in haste, and I had no business to stop her; so away she went, and I brought my bundle safe home to my governess. There was no money, nor plate, or jewels in the bundle; but a very good suit of Indian damask; a gown and petticoat, a laced head and ruffles of very good Flanders lace, and some linen, and other things, such as I knew very well the value of.

This was not indeed my own invention, but was given me by one that had practised it with success, and my governess liked it extremely; and indeed I tried it again several times, though never twice near the same place; for the next time I tried it in Whitechapel, just by the corner of Petticoat lane, where the coaches stand that go out to Stratford and Bow, and that side of the country, and another time at the Flying Horse, without Bishopsgate, where the Cheston coaches then lay, and I had always the good luck to come off with some booty.

Another time I placed myself at a warehouse by the water side, where the coasting vessels from the north come, such as from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Sunderland, and other places. Here the warehouse being shut, comes a young fellow with a letter; and he wanted a box and hamper that was come from Newcastle-upon-Tyne. I asked him if he had the marks of it, so he shows me the letter, by virtue of which he was to ask for it, and which gave an account of the contents, the box being full of linen, and the hamper full of glass ware. I read the letter, and took care to see the name and the marks, the name of the person that sent the goods, and the name of the person that they were sent to; then I bade the messenger come in the morning, for that the warehouse-keeper would not be there any more that night.

Away went I, and getting materials in a public house, I wrote a letter from Mr John Richardson, of Newcastle, to his dear cousin Jemmy Cole in London, with an account that he had sent by such a vessel (for I remembered all the particulars to a tittle) so many pieces of huckaback linen, so many ells of Dutch Holland and the like, in a box, and a hamper of flint glasses from Mr Henzill's glass-house, and that the box was marked I. C. No. 1, and the hamper was directed by a label on the cording.

About an hour after I came to the warehouse, found the warehouse-keeper, and had the goods delivered me without any scruple; the value of the linen being about twenty-two pound.

I could fill up the whole discourse with the variety of such adventures which daily invention directed to, and which I managed with the utmost dexterity, and always with success.

At length, as when does the pitcher come safe home that goes so often to the well, I fell into some broils, which, though they could not affect me fatally, yet made me known, which was the worst thing, next to being found guilty, that could befall me.

I had taken the disguise of a widow's dress; it was without any real design in view, only waiting for anything that might offer. It happened that, as I often did, while I was going along a street in Covent-garden, there was a great cry of "stop thief!" Some artists had, it seems, put a trick upon a shopkeeper; and being pursued, some of them fled one way, and some another; and one of them was, they said, dressed up in widow's weeds, upon which the mob gathered about me, and some said I was the person, others said no; immediately came the mercer's journeyman, and he swore aloud I was the person, and so seized on me. However, when I was brought back by the mob to the mercer's shop, the master of the house said freely, that I was not the woman that was in his shop, and would have let me go immediately; but another fellow said gravely, "Pray, stay till Mr ——" (meaning the journeyman) "comes back, for he knows her;" so they kept me by force near half an hour. They had called a constable, and he stood in the shop as my gaoler; and in talking with the constable, I inquired where he lived and what trade he was; the man not apprehending in the least what happened afterwards, readily told me his name and trade, where he lived; and told me as a jest, that I might be sure to hear of his name when I came to the Old Bailey.

The servants likewise used me saucily, and had much to do to keep their hands off me. The master, indeed, was more civil to me than they, but he would not let me go, though he owned he could not say I was in his shop before.

I began to be a little surly with him, and told him I hoped he would not take it ill if I made myself amends upon him another time; and desired I might send for friends to see me have right done. "No, no," he said, "he could give no such liberty; I might ask it when I came before the justice of peace; and, seeing I threatened him, he said, "He would take care of me in the meantime, and would lodge me safe in Newgate." I told him it was his time now, but it would be mine by and by, and governed my passion as well as I was able. However, I spoke to the constable to call me a porter, which he did, and then I called for pen, ink, and paper, but they would let me have none. I asked the porter his name and where he lived, and the poor man told it me very willingly. I bid him observe and remember how I was treated there; that he saw I was detained there by force. I told him I should want him in another place, and it should not be the worse for him to speak. The porter said he would serve me with all his heart; "But, madam," says he, "let me hear them refuse to let you go, then I may be able to speak the plainer."

With that I spoke aloud to the master of the shop, and said, "Sir, you know in your own conscience that I am not the person you look for, and that I was not in your shop before; therefore I demand that you detain me here no longer, or tell me the reason of your stopping me." The fellow upon this grew surlier than before, and said he would do neither till he thought fit. "Very well," said I to the constable and to the porter, "you will be pleased to remember this, gentlemen, another time." The porter said, "Yes, madam;" and the constable began not to like it, and would have persuaded the mercer to dismiss him and let me go. "Good sir," says the mercer to him, tauntingly, "are you a justice of peace, or a constable? I charged you with her, pray do your duty." The constable told him, a little moved, but very handsomely, "I know my duty and what I am, sir; I doubt you hardly know what you are doing." They had some other hard words, and, in the meantime, the journeymen, impudent and unmanly to the last degree, used me barbarously; and one of them, the first that seized upon me, pretended he would search me, and began to lay hands on me. I spit in his face, called out to the constable, and bid him take notice of my usage. "And pray, Mr Constable," said I, "ask that villain's name," pointing to the man. The constable reproved him decently, told him that he did not know what he did, for he knew that his master acknowledged I was not the person; "And," says the constable, "I am afraid your master is bringing himself and me too into trouble—if this gentlewoman comes to prove who she is and where she was—and it appears that she is not the woman you pretend to."—"Damn her," says the fellow again, with an impudent hardened face, "she is the lady, you may depend upon it; I'll swear she is the same body that was in the shop, and that I gave the piece of satin that is lost into her own hand. You shall hear more of it when Mr William and Mr Anthony (those were other journeymen) come back; they will know her again as well as I."

Just as the insolent rogue was talking thus to the constable, comes back Mr William and Mr Anthony, as he called them, and a great rabble with them, bringing along with them the true widow that I was pretended to be; and they came sweating and blowing into the shop, and, with a great deal of triumph, dragging the poor creature in a most butcherly manner up towards the master, who was in the back shop, and cried out aloud, "Here's the widow, sir; we've caught her at last!"—"What do ye mean by that?" says the master, "Why, we have her already; there she sits," says he; "and Mr——" says he "can swear that is she." The other man, whom they called Mr Anthony, replied, "Mr—— may say what he will, and swear what he will, but this is the woman, and there's the remnant of satin she stole; I took it out of her clothes with my own hand."

I sat still now, and began to take better heart, but smiled, and said nothing. The master looked pale; the constable turned about and looked at me. "Let them alone, Mr Constable," said I, "let them go on." The case was plain, and could not be denied; so the constable was charged with the right thief, and the mercer told me very civilly he was sorry for the mistake, and hoped I would not take it ill; that they had so many things of this nature put upon them every day, that they could not be blamed for being very sharp in doing themselves justice. "Not take it ill, sir!" said I; "how can I take it well? If you had dismissed me when your insolent fellow seized on me in the street, and brought me to you, and when you yourself acknowledged I was not the person, I would have put it by and not taken it ill, because of the many ill things I believe you have put upon you daily; but your treatment of me since has been insufferable, and especially that of your servant; I must and will have reparation for that."

Then he began to parley with me; said he would make me any reasonable satisfaction, and would fain have had me told him what it was I expected. I told him I should not be my own judge—the law should decide it for me; and as I was to be carried before a magistrate, I should let him hear there what I had to say. He told me there was no occasion to go before the justice now; I was at liberty to go when I pleased; and, calling to the constable, told him he might let me go, for I was discharged. The constable said calmly to him—"Sir, you asked me just now if I knew whether I was a constable or a justice, and bade me do my duty, and charged me with this gentlewoman as a prisoner. Now, sir, I find you do not understand what is my duty, for you would make me a justice indeed; but I must tell you it is not in my power. I may keep a prisoner when I am charged with him, but it is the law and the magistrate alone that can discharge that prisoner; therefore it is a mistake, sir; I must carry her before a justice now, whether you think well of it or not." The mercer was very high with the constable at first; but the constable happening to be not a hired officer, but a good, substantial kind of a man (I think he was a corn-chandler, and a man of good sense), stood to his business—would not discharge me without going to a justice of the peace, and I insisted upon it too. When the mercer saw that—"Well," says he to the constable, "you may carry her where you please; I have nothing to say to her."—"But, sir," says the constable, "you will go with us, I hope, for it is you that charged me with her."—"No, not I," says the mercer; "I tell you I have nothing to say to her."—"But, pray sir, do," says the constable, "I desire it of you for your own sake, for the justice can do nothing without you." "Pry-thee fellow," says the mercer, "go about your business; I tell you I have nothing to say to this gentlewoman; and I charge you in the king's name to dismiss her."—"Sir," says the constable, "I find now I don't know what it is to be a constable; I beg of you, don't oblige me to be rude to you."—"I think I need not; you are rude enough already," says the mercer."—"No, sir," says the constable, "I am not rude; you have broken the peace in bringing an honest woman out of the street when she was about her lawful occasions; confining her in your shop, and ill-using her by your servants; and now you say I am rude to you. I think I am civil to you, in not commanding you, or charging you in the king's name, to go with me, and charging every man I see that passes by your door to aid and assist me in carrying you by force; this you cannot but know I have power to do, and yet I forbear it, and once more entreat you to go with me." Well, he would not for all this, and gave the constable ill language. However, the constable kept his temper, and would not be provoked; and then I put in, and said, "Come, Mr Constable, let him alone; I shall find ways enough to fetch him before a magistrate—I don't fear that; but there's the fellow," says I; "he was the man that seized on me as I was innocently going along the street, and you are the witness of his violence unto me since; give me leave to charge you with him, and carry him before the justice."—"Yes, madam," says the constable; and turning to the fellow—"Come, young gentleman," says he to the journeyman, "you must go along with us; I hope you are not above the constable's power, though your master is."

The fellow looked like a condemned thief, and hung back, and then looked at his master, as if he could help him; and he, like a fool, encouraged the fellow to be rude; and he, truly, resisted the constable, and pushed him back with a great force when he went to lay hold of him; at which the constable knocked him down, and called out for help, and immediately the shop was filled with people, and the constable seized the master and man, and all his servants.

The first ill consequence of this fray was, that the woman who was really the thief made off, and got clear away in the crowd, and two others that they had stopped also. Whether they were really guilty or not, that I can say nothing to.

By this time, some of his neighbours having come in, and seeing how things went, had endeavoured to bring the mercer to his senses, and he began to be convinced that he was in the wrong; and so at length we went all very quietly before the justice, with a mob of about five hundred people at our heels; and all the way we went I could hear the people ask what was the matter; and others reply, and say, "A mercer had stopped a gentlewoman instead of a thief, and had afterwards taken the thief, and now the gentlewoman had taken the mercer, and was carrying him before the justice." This pleased the people strangely, and made the crowd increase, and they cried out as they went, "Which is the rogue? Which is the mercer?" and especially the women. Then, when they saw him, they cried out, "That's he! that's he!" and every now and then came a good dab of dirt at him; and thus we marched a good while, till the mercer thought fit to desire the constable, to call a coach to protect himself from the rabble; so we rode the rest of the way, the constable and I, and the mercer and his man.

When we came to the justice, which was our ancient gentleman in Bloomsbury, the constable giving first a summary account of the matter, the justice bade me speak, and tell what I had to say. And first, he asked my name, which I was very loath to give, but there was no remedy; so I told him my name was Mary Flanders; that I was a widow, my husband being a sea-captain, having died on a voyage to Virginia; and some other circumstances I told, which he could never contradict; and that I lodged at present in town with such a person, naming my governess; but that preparing to go over to America, where my husband's effects lay, and that I was going that day to buy some clothes to put myself into second mourning, but had not yet been in any shop, when that fellow (pointing to the mercer's journeyman) came rushing upon me with such fury as very much frightened me, and carried me back to his master's shop; where, though his master acknowledged I was not the person, yet he would not dismiss me, but charged the constable with me.

Then I proceeded to tell how the journeyman treated me; how they would not suffer me to send for any of my friends; how afterwards they found the real thief, and took the very goods they had lost upon her, and all the particulars as before.

Then the constable related his case; his dialogue with the mercer about discharging me; and, at last, his servant's refusing to go with him when I had charged him with him, and the mercer's encouraging him to do so; and, at last, his striking the constable, and the like, all as I have told it already.

The justice then heard the mercer and his man. The mercer, indeed, made a long harangue of the great loss they have daily by lifters and thieves; that it was easy for them to mistake; and that when he found it he would have dismissed me, &c., as above. As to the journeyman, he had very little to say, but that he pretended other of the servants told him that I was really the person.

Upon the whole, the justice first of all told me very particularly that I was discharged; that he was very sorry that the mercer's man should, in his eager pursuit, have so little discretion as to take up an innocent person for a guilty one; that if he had not been so unjust as to detain me afterwards, he believed I would have forgiven the first affront; that, however, it was not in his power to award me any reparation, other than by openly reproving them, which he should do; that he supposed I should apply to such methods as the law directed; in the meantime he would bind him over.

But as to the breach of the peace committed by the journeyman, he told me that he should give me some satisfaction for that, for he should commit him to Newgate for assaulting the constable, and for assaulting of me also.

Accordingly he sent the fellow to Newgate for that assault, and his master gave bail, and so we came away; but I had the satisfaction of seeing the mob wait upon them both as they came out, hallooing and throwing stones and dirt at the coaches as they rode in, and so I came home.

After this bustle, coming home and telling my governess the story, she fell a-laughing at me. "Why are you so merry?" says I; "the story has not so much laughing room in it as you may imagine; I am sure I have had a great deal of hurry and fright too with a pack of ugly rogues."

"Laugh," says my governess; "I laugh, child, to see what a lucky creature you are. Why, this job will be the best bargain to you that ever you made in your life, if you manage it well. I warrant you, you shall make the mercer pay five hundred pounds for damages, besides what you shall get of the journeyman."

I had other thoughts of the matter than she had, and especially because I had given in my name to the justice of peace; and I knew that my name was so well known among the people at Hicks's hall, the Old Bailey, and such places, that if this cause came to be tried openly, and my name came to be inquired into, no court would give much damages for the reputation of a person of such a character. However, I was obliged to begin a prosecution in form, and accordingly my governess found me out a very creditable sort of a man to manage it, being an attorney of very good business and of good reputation, and she was certainly in the right of this; for had she employed a pettyfogging, hedge solicitor, or a man not known, I should have brought it to but little.

I met this attorney, and gave him all the particulars at large, as they are recited above; and he assured me it was a case, as he said, that he did not question but that a jury would give very considerable damages; so taking his full instructions he began the prosecution, and the mercer, being arrested, gave bail. A few days after his giving bail, he comes with his attorney to my attorney to let him know that he desired to accommodate the matter; that it was all carried on in the heat of an unhappy passion; that his client, meaning me, had a sharp, provoking tongue, and that I used them ill, gibing at them and jeering them, even while they believed me to be the very person, and that I had provoked them, and the like.

My attorney managed well on my side; made them believe I was a widow of fortune; that I was able to do myself justice, and had great friends to stand by me too, who had all made me promise to sue to the utmost, and that if it cost me a thousand pounds I would be sure to have satisfaction, for that the affronts I had received were insufferable.

However, they brought my attorney to this, that he promised he would not blow the coals; that if I inclined to an accommodation, he would not hinder me, and that he would rather persuade me to peace than to war, for which they told him he should be no loser, all which he told me very honestly, and told me that if they offered him any bribe I should certainly know it; but, upon the whole, he told me very honestly that if I would take his opinion he would advise me to make it up with them; for that as they were in a great fright, and were desirous, above all things, to make it up, and knew that let it be what it would they must bear all the costs, he believed they would give me freely more than any jury would give upon a trial. I asked him what he thought they would be brought to; he told me he could not tell as to that, but he would tell me more when I saw him again.
